Something Doing For Awhile Yet It seems likely that before another issue of The California Outlook reaches its readers the thirty-ninth session of the Legislature of California will have passed into history, but that will not mean that public attention will be permitted to fold its hands for an all summer siesta for Congress will convene in extraordinary session the fourth of April and Champ Clark will prove recreant to expectations if he does not furnish subject matter for discussion the whole country over. No, the times at hand are not to be piping. When men dared to undertake to govern themselves, they forsook the path of least resistance and undertook as troublesome a trail as the famed road that led to Jordan. Political agitation is as essential to democracy as baby talk is to the intelligence of the race, without which we should all be dunderheads to our dying days. As the mother instinctively throws into her face and gestures, when she talks to her baby, all the animation of mind and soul of which she is capable, that she may awaken and draw out a slumbering capacity for understanding, so the men of affairs must make incessant appeals to that public mind which would, if it dared, concern itself with its own matters, and leave government to those who like it. But that way lies despotism, special privilege, the destruction of free institutions and the degradation of the race. Therefore, whether we would or no, we must let go of the Legislature of our State only to lay hold of the Congress of our Nation, and so keep up with the procession of events.

Victory for Local Option Victory for local option, even with the supervisorial district as the unit of option, marks a growth in decency of California. The unit of option was not as important as that the people have option of some sort. Under any kind of option, precinct, township, supervisor district or county, a twelvemonth will see three-fourths of the superficial area of California made as dry as hay. With the liquor traffic driven into the towns, and the towns so controlling that traffic as to make it as little of an evil as it can be made, the sentiment of the State may rest content for a decade or more, but if the liquor interests refuse to be decent, if they insist in running their business all the night through and all the year round, with joints and gin mills every three or four doors, it will not be four years before California will be where Texas is today, on the brink of state-wide prohibition. If one would know what the future of prohibition in California is likely to be, let him ask of the brewers, the wholesale liquor dealers and the Royal Arch. They can force the issue of prohibition upon the people of California so quickly as to make their own heads swim. The Twentieth-Century California will not consent to be governed by or through the saloon interest. That is the issue in a nutshell.

General Forrest As an Educator After the close of the Civil War the redoubtable Confederate cavalryman, General Nathan Bedford Forrest got possession of President's Island below Memphis, Tennessee, and went into cotton planting. He arranged with the city of Memphis to commit to his charge its petty offenders, mainly negroes, and he put them at work in his cotton field. One day while a visitor in the office of the clerk of the United States court, a deputy put this question to him: "I suppose, General, that you do something for the education of the young negroes confided to your care, do you not?" "Indeed I do," was the reply, "I educate 'em, I educate 'em; I put hoes into their hands and send them to the field and whenever a nigger gets so that he can hoe cotton and make a hand at it I regard his education as complete."

These recollections were called to mind by the report that the superintendent of the reform school at Ione has proposed that the State convert the institution into a factory for supplying bricks to other institutions of the state. As well might the State University be converted into smelter and machine shops because machines and mining appliances are requisite for educational uses. Brick-making would be a useful trade to be taught at the Preston school of industry, and brick-laying also, but the instant that at such a school any trade becomes an industry, it is inevitable that the boy will be devoted to the industry and not the industry to the boy. No head of a reform school, however good his intentions, is fit for the place he occupies unless he fully realizes that his school is first, last and all the time, a school, and that not an act should be performed that has not an educational purpose for its aim. It is a duty which the State government owes to the delinquent youth of the State to see to it that only men imbued with the educational spirit in its broadest sense have such institutions in their charge.

An $80,000 Building At a $20,000 Cost It was stated a little while ago that this same institution had succeeded in erecting a building that would, had it been let by contract, have cost $80,000, for a cash expenditure of one-fourth of that sum. From a financial point of view this looks like a splendid economy, and it may have been so or it may not have been so—all dependent upon whether or not the work of building was performed for its educational or for its industrial value. It would be possible to so build a dormitory or assembly hall as to make its erection splendidly educational, but the first parts of it might, under that form of construction, begin to grow old before the finishing touches were put on the last parts. The State is not warranted in accepting this alleged economy at its face value without inquiring to know if the lads who built it were kept in the day school half of each day, if the boys were passed from job to job as rapidly as they had learned to perform each operation automatically (after which no operation has any educational value in it) or if, having learned to perform one operation in the building, they were kept doing that one thing until the job was completed. Of course there is an educational value in learning to perform sustained labor, but that is seldom learned under compulsion. If the State would have efficiency in its institutional life, as well as economy in construction, it must interest itself in its institutions and hold its officials accountable for more results than can be expressed in dollars.

WE'LL BE BACK

Watch Max Thelen Grow Here is a young man, lately made attorney for the railroad commission, whom it will prove edifying to keep an eye on, not that he needs watching, but only that he can bear it without flinching and the better he is watched the more brilliantly he will shine. This is not saying that he loves the limelight, but only that he is a light unto himself, and to others. Finely equipped by nature he has been diligent in utilizing his faculties, has worked hard, even roughed it, taken no direction of least resistance, sought no soft snap, and now comes to this position because he is fitted for it and because there is a chance in it for a man to do a man's work. More than all these admirable achievements and qualities is the fact that his principles are sound, his heart right, his love of Right Things sincere. If he lives and keeps his health Max Thelen will be heard from in the life of this State and in a way that will be creditable to the State as well as to himself. Watch Max Thelen grow.

The Watchman Got Off Wrong It would be monotonous, and not very edifying, were The Watchman to make confession of all the times he has gotten off wrong in his prophecies, but the case in point affords him so much pleasure that it takes all the sting out of making the amende honorable. When the corporation tax was tacked onto the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill The Watchman made haste to declare that

Roosevelt's Masterful Address

Delivered in Temple Auditorium, Los Angeles, as Guest of the City Club

Theodore Roosevelt delivered the principal address of his Los Angeles visit in Temple Auditorium on Wednesday last.

Mr. Roosevelt spoke under the auspices of the City Club of Los Angeles and was introduced by Meyer Lissner, chairman of the Republican State Central Committee.

Francis J. Heney, who had come to Los Angeles to see his friend, Colonel Roosevelt, was present at the meeting, and was given a great ovation. Led by Mayor Alexander, of Los Angeles, the immense audience gave three cheers for the famous graft prosecutor.

The opening remarks were delivered by Judge Frank G. Finlayson, president of the City Club, who spoke as follows:

This magnificent meeting, held under the auspices of the City Club, an organization for the dissemination of progressive principles, is to be addressed by America's foremost private citizen, the dauntless champion of human rights and equality of opportunity without distinction of class, creed, race or rank. It is but fitting that this militant champion of right and justice should be introduced by one who has been a leader in the assaults upon the citadel of organized greed and syndicated privilege; and it therefore affords me great pleasure to call upon our fellow townsman, Mr. Meyer Lissner, himself a captain of the hosts of reform, to present to you our city's distinguished guest.

Introducing Col. Roosevelt, Mr. Lissner said:

When a few enthusiastic young men in this city started the movement for municipal housecleaning that eventually accomplished its purpose, the organizing paper that they presented for signature to leading citizens was headed by a quotation from Theodore Roosevelt.

The success locally achieved was what encouraged the tackling of the larger job—the overthrow and destruction of the corporation political machine that for more than a generation had held this State in political bondage. And the banner under which California won her political freedom was emblazoned with the two greatest names in a century of American history—it read, "Lincoln-Roosevelt League."

Under that standard the strongest political character ever produced by the Pacific Coast made the most strenuous campaign in the history of the State; and from Shasta to Imperial and from the Sierras to the sea the Roosevelt brand of Americanism was preached by the people's Governor—Hiram Johnson.

It is stating the simple truth to say that the wonderful governmental transformation in our beloved State was inspired and consummated through the encouragement supplied by the words and deeds of our honored guest. Nor was our experience in this regard exceptional. For we all recognize that his influence has furnished the controlling motive for practically all that has been achieved in recent years for political betterment in the United States.

To introduce such a man to such an audience is indeed a cherished honor. It is my great privilege to present the most distinguished American citizen, Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. Roosevelt's address was, in full, as follows:

Mr. Lissner, Mr. Mayor, and you, my fellow citizens, men and women of Los Angeles, of Southern California: I am more than glad to be in California at this time, for I feel that California has come mighty near to realizing my governmental ideals. And I haven't come to teach anything like as much as to learn.

To be here in the city that you are administering, Mr. Mayor, to be here in the State that is being administered by Gov. Johnson, is necessarily an inspiration for any man who believes in justice and fair play, achieved by genuine popular rule.

Your circumstances here in California are peculiar. For over a generation you had been corporation ridden; your political destiny had been largely decided by a great corporation and its allied corporations. The conditions were peculiar, and therefore in this state there was need, a vital need, of remedies which might not have been necessary under other conditions in other communities.

I congratulate the present legislature upon the extraordinary amount of admirable constructive work which it has done.

I cannot at the moment recall any other legislature or any other state which has as great a sum of substantial constructive legislative achievement to its credit as your legislature. As it is generally the habit only to speak ill of legislatures, I am glad to be able to deviate from the rule.

Your race track gambling law; your laws for ballot reform; your county home rule; for the initiative and referendum—I shall speak of the recall by itself later—your passing of the employers' liability law; your railway regulation law, including the physical valuation and providing imprisonment for violations of the law; your conservation laws; your establishment of a board of control over public institutions; your state public utilities laws, and your admirable reform of the criminal procedure, by which you have rendered it impossible to fix a jury by getting at just one or two men—

(Turning to Francis J. Heney) Mr. Heney, we would have had one or two more convictions if we had had that law.

And your providing in the interest of law, of justice, of order, that no criminal case hereafter shall be reversed unless the appelate court find a miscarriage of judgment in the case—these and other laws that have been passed by the present legislature have worked a veritable transformation in your government system and have established a standard toward which other States should strive.

The Case of Lorimer

And let me also speak with the heartiest and most unqualified approval of action your Legislature took in not only asking for a certain provision of law but in emphasizing just what they meant to get at in that provision: They passed a law to provide for popular choice for United States Senators, and than they indicated the kind of Senator whom they didn't think it wise for the popular choice to light upon, by their condemnation of Mr. Lorimer and of the action of the Senate of the United States in keeping Mr. Lorimer in a seat.

The other day when I spoke to a Senator with whom I disagreed on that matter, he said with great dignity that the United States Senate was the judge of the qualifications of any of its members; and I told him, "Yes, and that my object was to put the people of the United States in the position of being the judge of the qualifications of the Senators that so decided."

I call your attention to two or three queer features connected with the vote in the United States Senate, and first of all, as an American citizen, keenly desirous of seeing the honor of the United States Senate upheld, I wish to thank the Legislature of California for having shown itself more sensitive to the honor of the United States Senate than the United States Senate itself was.

I call your attention, then, to two or three facts. Mr. Lorimer stays in the United States Senate because the Senators who are no longer Senators, when they had but forty-eight hours more to serve, said he could continue after they had left. A majority of the present colleagues of Mr. Lorimer, who voted for or against him that day, voted against him. He was kept in his seat by the Senators whom the people had decided they no longer wished to see in the Senate of the United States.

And again, the statement was made in debating the proposed amendment to provide for the election of United States Senators by popular vote, that we would destroy the character of the United States Senate if we altered the present method of electing Senators. Good! Now, I will call your attention to two facts in the vote: Of the Senators who voted against and defeated that proposed amendment, five-sixths showed just the kind of attribute they wished to see in a United States Senator by voting in favor of the retention of Mr. Lorimer in the United States Senate. In other words, five-sixths of the Senators who voted against the popular election of United States Senators voted for Mr. Lorimer, who had been chosen under the very worst system that can obtain under the old rules in a State Legislature.

I thank California, I thank its Legislature, for the attitude they took in this matter.

Johnson Has Carried Out Promises

Now, I congratulate California upon the type of public servant whom it has put into the chair as Governor. And I congratulate you especially because you have now as Governor a man who, by his deeds as Governor, has made good every word he uttered on the stump.

There is only one character I abhor a little more than the liar in private life, and that is the liar in public life. And there is only one promise, the breaking of which I think worse than the breaking of a private promise, and that is the breaking of a promise made on the stump; for that is a promise made not only to one individual alone; it is made to the whole people. And it is no credit to us as a nation that we have grown accustomed to look with sneering laughter at the difference between the promise of a candidate and the performance of the public official if the candidate succeeds.

It is to our discredit, my friends, if we ask impossible promises. Remember that, too. If you ask a candidate to promise what we know he can't do, then you are doing your best to damage your public life, to damage the character of your public servants.

Mr. Johnson belongs in that group of reformers who remain reformers of exactly the same stripe after being elected that they were before being elected. Mr. Johnson has made good every promise to which he committed himself upon the stump, and he, therefore, has not only rendered a great service to California; he has rendered a great service to the nation at large. For no American public man can show conspicuous qualities, either for good or evil, without affecting not only the community in which he dwells, but our people as a whole. A public servant who does what is evil is a menace to every one in this nation; and the public servant who does what is good has earned a right to the respect of all men, wherever they dwell within the limits of the Republic.

The Short Ballot

There is one reform we haven't yet adopted—I understand your Legislature is going to vote on it soon—which I most earnestly hope they will adopt; and that is the principle of the short ballot.

Now, I want you to think of this for yourselves, and I don't want you to be misled by clap-trap. I want you to think of what I say to you and place no value upon it excepting as it appeals to your reason.

The time has come when we can no longer tolerate slovenly inefficiency in our government; and there has been altogether too much such inefficiency in the past in the government of nation, state and city. We are becoming too big, our business interests and our human interests too important, longer to tolerate it. And in order to get rid of such inefficiency we need to chose the right man; to have that man given ample power, and then to hold him responsible for the way he handles that power.

In other words, my plan is for a system under which you will know the men that you are electing to office; under which they will have full power in office; and, third, under which you will have full power over them.

Public servants must be given ample power to enable them to do their work. Remember that. If we tie the hands of a public man so that he can't do well, you tie his hands so that he can't do ill. Don't you try for a moment to restrain the public man in office by shackling him. Leave his hands free. Give him the chance to do a job. Turn him out if he doesn't do the job well.

Just so it is in private life. If I want a man under me to do a job, I will give him the power to do it, and then I will say, "Now, I want you to do that bit of work." And if he says, "Yes—yes—how—how am I to do it?" I will say, "I will take another man. I will try some one else to do it." And if I am trusted to do a job, I want to be given the power to do it, and then you hold me accountable for it. Let any man hold me accountable for it, but give me a chance to make or to mar that job myself.

Now, you cannot exercise—I say, you cannot—I mean we, all of us—we cannot exercise a wise choice if we are asked to vote on a multitude of names. Now, I want each of you to think it out of his own experience. Don't you take what I am saying. You take your own experience. If you are given a ticket with 30 or 40 names on it to vote, how many of them will you know anything about? You can't know anything about them. You will know about a few men, but the ordinary citizen, who is pretty busy earning his own livelihood, anyhow, can't be expected to be able to fix in his mind the identity of 40 obscure politicians.

The public servants for whom you vote should be so few in number that the people may know whom it is they are choosing to administer any particular office.

A long ballot, covered with many names, is of all possible devices the one best adapted to give professional politicians, bread-and-butter politicians, the utmost possible advantage over ordinary citizens in the choice of public officers.

The professional, the bread-and-butter man, whose business it is, can and will take the time to know about every man on such a ballot. It is his business. You and I won't, normally, take the time. I will put it stronger than that, you and I can't normally take the time. We can't remember, we can't be expected to remember, the identity of a great number of individuals no one of whom is to do a very important piece of work. We must make the names few in number, and the work to be done by each man so important that it will rivet the attention of the ordinary man.

If the ordinary citizen is awake to his own interest, he will insist upon having a ballot upon which only a few names appear; each candidate being a candidate for an office so important as to make it reasonably certain that those who vote for him vote with a full understanding both of the man and of the office. In other words, I believe that the short ballot gives the people real instead of nominal power; and both gives the man in office the power to do efficient work, if he is honest and capable, and, at the same time, places him in such a position that, if he fails, the people will be immediately able to place the failure and to hold accountable the man responsible for it.

Recall

The other day in Arizona I gave the reasons why as regards most communities and under normal conditions I do not believe in the recall of the judiciary; and at the same time stated that I admitted the melancholy fact that there were states where judges have so acted in the past as to make it justifiable and necessary for the people to adopt measures for retiring them from office. And I added that, in my judgment, the recall of judges should not be adopted until by actual experiment the people were driven to it as a necessary but regrettable method of doing away with some even worse evils.

When I uttered these last sentences I was thinking particularly of your condition here in California. As thorough a knowledge of the facts as an outsider could obtain had convinced me some time ago that here in California the conditions were actually such as to render it imperative on your part to provide methods for retiring any judge when you became convinced that his retention on the bench was no longer in the interest of justice and fair dealing from the standpoint of the people at large.

Personally, I would have preferred to see you devise some other method than that which your Legislature has proposed for adoption by the people. But the question now is whether you will keep conditions unchanged here, or adopt the constitutional amendment proposed. There is no other alternative; and such being the case, I feel most strongly that it is in the interest of justice, of honesty and of popular government to adopt the proposal as the Legislature has submitted it.

Now, friends, I have spoken hitherto only in praise of what you have done and are doing. I now want to speak as a friend to his friends, as a man who believes as you do, who has in common with you the aspirations, the desires for genuine equality, economic, industrial, social, political; who shares your belief in popular government, and your desire to have that a real and not a nominal government; who believes as you do in striving to shape legislation so as to bring nearer the day that honesty and fair dealing as between man and man shall prevail; as your fellow, your companion in the fight for decent government and civic righteousness, I want most earnestly to speak certain words of warning to you:

Reform Should Have a Sure Foundation

I trust you have entered not upon a spasm of reform. I trust that you have entered upon a career of reform, upon a movement for progressive betterment of our citizenship which will be steady and continuous; and in any such movement I want you to remember that there is just as much need of breeching-work as of trace-work. You have got to hold back, when necessary, just as much as you have got to pull forward. If the wagon gets upset it is not going to be any comfort that it got upset because the horses were running away and not because they balked.

You have achieved substantial popular government, and, therefore, a failure on your part to do what is just and right will be even more detrimental than a failure on the part of a machine-ridden, corporation-ridden, State would be. Because you are the people; you are the source. The river can't rise higher than the spring; and if you, when you have the power, don't do your duty, then, it will, indeed, be a lamentable day for all the believers in popular government.

I will go with you, with any man throughout this Union to any requisite length to prevent corporations exercising any control over the public.

Special Interests vs. The People

Where I live, I have had to be in genuine war against the special interests. I believe that the great task immediately before our people is to drive out of their entrenched positions of power all the special interests; to drive them out; and I don't care what form the entrenchment takes. I don't care whether it is a corporation that receives improper protection from the tariff, or whether it is a corporation that has flourished rankly because of the lack of law to control it, in nation or State. Whatever the cause, I will go with you to remove the cause. Whatever the corporation, and no matter how admirable in private character and how amiable in private life and how cultivated and pleasant the head of the corporation, I will go with you to eliminate that corporation from every position of political control.

But in return I not merely ask, but demand, that, when you get the control, you, in your turn, scorn the act of doing injustice or suffering injustice to be done to any corporation.

If you haven't sufficient—if we—I will change it—If we, the people, haven't sufficient virtue and self-control to do justice to a corporation, then we have forfeited our right to exercise full control over the corporation. And I hold that this people has the virtue, has the self-control, has the foresight, has the wisdom, to enable it to exercise such control. I demand that the people be given the full power and therefore I ask the people, for their own sake, to exercise that power with justice, with wisdom, with moderation.

The Difference in Corporations

Now, then, people ask me why I want two different laws for a big corporation and for a small one. Now, the answer is perfectly easy. You and I, each one of us here, deal with various individuals in his private life: with the grocer, baker, butcher, car-

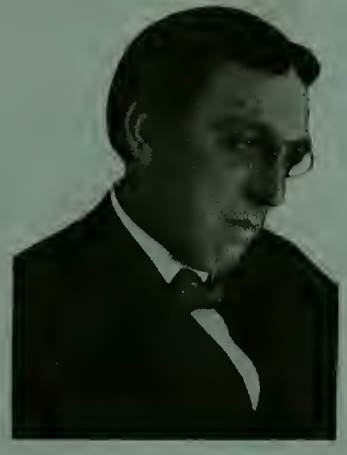
WALTER L. FISHER New Secretary of the Interior

William Kent

The Man Who Eliminated the Traction Companies from the Politics fo Chicago



By Congressman William Kent

Walter L. Fisher graduated from a small freshwater college in Indiana, of which his father was president The earliest records show that he fought single handed against the Indiana Legislature in the interests of a fraternity to which he belonged, and won out. Thereafter he went to Chicago, and having been admitted to the bar took up his first public work as attorney for the city in the matter of special assessments. He distinguished himself in this capacity and then went into a law partnership. He gradually grew to be recognized as one of the leading younger members of the bar. At the time when his firm was gaining recognition, he was urged to take up the work of the Municipal Voters' League which for five years had been endeavoring to clean up the Chicago City Council and incidentally to break the back of the traction interests which dominated the city. There had been two former generations of reformers at work on this problem. George Cole and Hoyt King as secretary. The city had fought the work, along with an executive committee, which was continuous. After three years they laid down the axe which was picked up by myself as president and Pond as secretary. After two years we quit the work and were succeeded by Charles R. Crane as president and Walter Fisher as secretary. The city had fought the long fight against new franchises and in favor of just terms from the traction people without ever having formulated any definite idea as to what constituted justice. Fisher, first as politician in the League and latterly as statesman in outlining a definite policy to be pursued, brought the long struggle to an end in a manner eminently satisfactory to the people of Chicago and equally unsatisfactory to the successive owners of the watered stocks of the traction companies.

As a politician, Fisher showed wonderful ability. He was able, as it were, at the same time to play the complicated game of chess and to realize and appreciate the equally necessary game of poker; for, however learned a man may be in the wisdom of the schools, or how clear his vision, he can never afford to overlook the human element typified in the great American game. For the first time in this country Fisher worked out the just "modus vivendi" between the people and the public utility corporations. He realized that the public utility corporation was but an agent of all the people and as such was entitled to fair treatment of investment, to just compensation for services rendered in the way of organization and management and to the elimination of the element of risk as far as that might be eliminated, and no more.

The able transportation committee of the City Council had long thought over possible solutions. It had drawn an ordinance which it thought was the best obtainable. Fisher, who was called in consultation, promptly demolished the whole structure, as a result of which a municipal ownership mayor, Edward F. Dunne, appointed him special counsel for the city of Chicago in matters pertaining to the traction settlement.

He worked out a theory and submitted it to Mayor Dunne, William R. Hearst and the most radical leaders in the city. All accepted his reasoning as something incontrovertible, but all believed his proposed settlement impossible of achievement. The fundamental virtues of this agreement were first of all, the elimination of all questions of capitalization; secondly, a fair appraisal of physical valuation including the value of unexpired franchises; thirdly, five per cent. return on all capital invested or to be invested in rehabilitating the transportation service, and last of all, an equal division of the net—not the gross—proceeds, between the city and the transportation companies. Fisher fought this proposition through alone and unaided, and beat out just as many lawyers from Chicago and New York or Philadelphia as the traction people chose to hire. The Hearst papers violated the pledge of Mr. Hearst and fought against the settlement; Mayor Dunne, who had promised to abide by it, threw it overboard. The great plea raised by the radicals was that net receipts were only another name for "nit" receipts, and Fisher was frequently told that if he would change from net to gross, he would not be opposed. But he had a sense of fairness that comes from an honest and logical mind, and stated baldly that the city under the proposed agreement would be in partnership with the traction company and therefore would have no right to search the till ahead of its partner. He procured expert advice upon all the engineering problems and on the difficult mathematical problem of estimating the value of unexpired franchises. The ordinance was formulated and put before the people at a referendum vote which was voluntary. It was carried overwhelmingly in the face of the most rabid and unfair radical opposition. This arrangement has eliminated the traction companies from the politics of Chicago. Their property can at any time be bought by the city at a ten per cent. premium over cost, or sold to another corporation that will make more favorable terms with the city at twenty per cent. more than cost. The securities issued under this city partnership are so highly rated as to sell above par, and there is no trouble about securing all the money that is necessary to conduct the business of intramural transportation in Chicago

Walter L. Fisher

I have given much space to this traction settlement because it was the fruition of many years of war in Chicago and never would have been brought about except by the sheer ability and wonderful patience of the man who now has been appointed Secretary of the Interior. He fought this fight with perfect courage and unending patience and devotion through about seven years of his life, which was well worth doing. An amusing incident occurred in this connection.

One of the traction companies had been so thoroughly watered by Yerkes and his associates that it proceeded to go extensively bankrupt. Around this unfortunate carcass the lawyers flocked in vast numbers. Fearing lest the court would curtail their fees they went to Fisher asking him to testify as to the extent and value of their services. He promptly replied that he would be glad to do so, but added: "You must remember that I had to bear the fight against all of you; that I beat you out; that my services were recompensed by the city of Chicago at the rate of $10,000 a year, in this connection and also in connection with the other companies. I should be glad to recommend that you should pro rate equally in spite of the fact that you were beaten out." The lawyers secured their fees without Fisher's testimony.

It has always seemed to me that the settlement arrived at and the theory under which the settlement was made furnish a solution of our woes in connection with all those who supply public utilities, whether it be railroads or those interested in the development of power—and Fisher feels the same way. Under his administration of the Interior Department there will be an end to heedless exploitation of natural resources. If there is a risk to be assumed and the people cannot make good, those taking upon themselves this risk will be allowed more reward in the event of success; but under no conditions will there be a toleration of perpetual grants that will be oppressive to all the people in the interests of the few. To my mind there are but two men in the United States who are on a parity of intellect and service in the public cause with Walter Fisher, and they are Louis Brandeis of Boston and Gifford Pinchot. Fisher's mind is as clear as that of Root, and always and under all conditions he realizes his full responsibility as a citizen. Over and over again he has been offered enormous fees to take up the cause of private interests which might possibly be hostile to the public welfare, and although never heretofore in public office excepting for the brief period of his stay in the special assessments department and his short career as special counsel for the City of Chicago, he has refused and is firm in refusing any cases that might even by implication seem to bind him. We may wonder how it happens that he succeeded Secretary Ballinger. Everyone who knows Walter Fisher knows that the task now imposed upon him was not of his seeking, and that in this, as in every other position he has held, he has never made any concessions whatever to a singularly clear and an absolutely honest conscience.

WILL WOMEN VOTE?

Monrovia Answers YES

While the women of Washington have been making Pacific Coast history by securing the ballot and showing emphatically that they will exercise its privilege without fear or favor, it is darkly hinted by opponents of suffrage in California that only a small minority of women in this state will go to the polls if given the opportunity.

As yet, the suffragists of California have been obliged to offer nothing more decisive in refutation of this challenge than their well organized and thus far successful effort to secure enfranchisement.

The women of the little foothill city of Monrovia, however, have within the past week given an object lesson along these lines.

It became necessary, through a disagreement between the two factions of the school board and citizens committee appointed to select a site for a fine new school building, to turn the matter back to the people for decision. A straw ballot was called for, the vote being opened to all adults within the district, both men and women.

There are about 750 registered male voters in Monrovia and it is safe to assume that there is an equal number of women who may be similarly qualified. Out of the total number more than two-thirds exercised the privilege, but what is more, there were twenty more women than men who went to the polls and voted—the total number of women casting ballots being 546.

The law of contrasts will serve to enforce the lesson when it is known that the present school board of that foothill town was elected at the last election by the vote of exactly 18 of the regular qualified male voters, that number alone ont of 600 having enough interest in the school affairs of the district to exercise their voting privilege.

At the recent election there was no electioneering on the part of any one concerned, the women going quietly to the polls in the most matter of fact manner and with the same dignity and earnestness as when performing any other duty demanded in the interests of their homes and children.

The voting women represented every class of society in the town, including those prominent in social and club life, shop keepers, teachers, work women, and even Mexican mothers who carried their babies, and came with their husbands to cast their first ballot.

SACRAMENTO.—For the first time in the history of the State of California, and probably for the first time in the political history of the United States, a Legislature has actually done its share, within the limits imposed upon it by the constitution, in the work of redeeming the campaign pledges made by the party which elected the majority in that Legislature. Encouraged and supported by a Governor who, in his inaugural address, made it plain that he would exert every effort to see that his party, as represented at Sacramento, would fulfil its platform pledges, unequivocally endorsed by him in hundreds of public utterances, the Legislature has applied itself diligently to the task from the first days of the session.

As I write, March 16, Senator Wolfe, chief obstructionist of the thirty-ninth session, is sounding one of his almost daily notes of warning, his eyes viewing with alarm, etc., etc. "Constitutional John" Curtin, too, has allowed to pass few occasions when he might point to the great dangers that lie in the passage of various progressive measures.

The daily diet has not been very palatable, but, like the tang in a fresh grape-fruit, it has been innocuous. Like the old woman who thought to wipe up the ocean with a mop, these pessimistic statesmen have been unable to prevent the onflow of the tide—the popular movement toward investing the people with the powers that were originally theirs.

The Local Option Fight

The bitterest fight of the session culminated Thursday of last week when the Local Option bill was passed by the Senate. Technically, the report of the Committee of Free Conference was adopted by a vote of twenty-eight to twelve. Readers of The California Outlook are familiar with the main features of the prolonged and desperate struggle made by the liquor interests to prevent the passage of any Local Option bill and failing in this, so to amend the Wyllie-Estudillo bill as to render it as ineffective as possible. Although a compromise was ultimately reached, the measure as finally sent to the Governor, with the city and the supervisorial district as units, is a great victory for local option.

On the motion to adopt the report of the Committee of Free Conference, which meant the passage of the bill, Senator Wolfe took the lead in the fight against the bill, Senator Juilliard, who led the fight for the change from county to township unit, having decided to support the measure as it left the conference committee. With the skill born of years of parliamentary experience Wolfe brought into play all the devices known to legislative procedure, but without avail. In his desperation he verged dangerously near a challenge to President Wallace over a parliamentary point; but a glint in the eyes of the Lieutenant-Governor—an expression rarely seen upon the face of the mild-mannered though courageous presiding officer—may have been caught by Wolfe, with its "discretion is the better part of valor" suggestion, for the Senator from San Francisco changed his attitude in the twinkling of an eye.

Incidentally, as the session draws to a close occasions multiply when Lieutenant-Governor Wallace is compelled to prove his mettle, and demonstrate his splendid capacity as a presiding officer. The old-timers in the Senate have learned at last that all efforts to "put one over" on him are futile, and such tactics have ceased.

Home Rule for Counties

After a desperate fight for reconsideration of the vote by which Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 5, providing a scheme for home rule for counties through county charters, was adopted, the Senate stuck to its original opinion that this innovation had sufficient merit to warrant its submission to popular vote. Senator Shanahan, regarded as one of the Progressives, led the opposition, basing his fight on the proposition that the people should not have put up to them a proposal that certain offices should be filled by election and certain other offices by appointment by the board of supervisors. In the final vote by which reconsideration was refused those standing with him were Senators Beban, Bryant, Estudillo, Hare and Wolfe. Estudillo's vote was the only surprise. That the four San Francisco Senators should oppose the plan was a foregone conclusion.

The Assembly probably will have adopted the amendment before this issue of The California Outlook is published. There is no doubt that the measure will be approved by the Governor, and that it will be accepted by the vote of the state and by a tremendous majority. There has been a desire on the part of the masses of people to get better control of their local government, and this constitutional provision will give them the machinery for such relief. All the Los Angeles Senators voted against reconsideration except Hurd, who was recorded as absent.

Bearing the Brunt

Those citizens of California who are in sympathy with the Johnson policies as enunciated in his inaugural address, owe a debt of gratitude to Senator Boynton, president pro tem. of the Senate, for the nerve-wrecking labors to which he has applied himself without intermission during the session of the Legislature which will end next week. No more loyal friend and advocate of these Progressive policies is found in the present Legislature. No man has shown a greater capacity for hard and effective work. Though not physically robust, Senator Boynton has labored assiduously to whip into shape those bills known as backbone measures and to secure their passage. While many other Senators, capable of greater physical endurance, have enjoyed week-end vacations for purposes of recuperation, Senator Boynton has kept valiantly and unselfishly at the task before him, frequently doing detail work that should have been performed in part by others.

Senator Cutten, chairman of the Finance Committee of the upper House; Assemblyman Cogswell, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the lower House; Senator Hewitt, Senator Gates, Senator Thompson, Senator Burnett, Senator Caminetti and Assemblymen Randall, Benedict, Beatty, Joel, Bohnett, Cattell, Chandler, Sutherland and Young also come in for high commendation for their indefatigable and successful efforts in this connection.

Turning a Somersault

To revert once more—and I hope it may be the last time—to Senator Wolfe: He succeeded during the final fight over Local Option in turning a political somersault that was at the same time ludicrous and tragic—ludicrous in the eyes of the Progressives who are familiar with the history of the preceding session, tragic in the eyes of the tricksters who put over the fake direct primary bill in 1909. On this occasion Wolfe was hoist by his own petard.

To cut a long story short he reversed himself completely, condemning the Progressives for employing tactics of a nature somewhat similar to though vastly less offensive than those employed by Wolfe, Leavitt and Wright on the occasion of the memorable deadlock over the amendments to the direct primary bill two years ago.

Wolfe's long suit is "following precedents"—especially when the precedent is to his liking. In this particular instance he objected to following, even one inch, the precedent established in 1909, through the courtesy of Lieutenant-Governor Warren Porter.

Talk of precedents will probably not engage much attention during the few remaining days of the session.

Side Lights

Senator Avey of Redlands has the reputation of being the shyest man in the Senate. On the other side of the capitol Mott of Santa Paula and Judson of San Diego county divide honors.

The chief exploders are Hurd of Los Angeles in the Senate, and Bishop of Orange county in the Assembly. For dramatic qualities they are capable of outlunging even the stentorian-toned statesman from Amador—Signor A. Caminetti.

Hewitt of Los Angeles and Burnett of San Francisco are, under ordinary circumstances, free from excessive provocation, about the most mild-mannered in debate in the upper house. Hinshaw of Los Angeles and Polsley of Tehama are the Quakers of the Assembly. But be it not forgotten that they are able to divest themselves of all impedimenta when both cheeks have been slapped.

Sanford, the gray eagle of Mendocino, has earned another title—that of joker-in-chief to the Senate.

Halohan of Watsonville, Shanahan of Redding, Black of Palo Alto, Tyrrell of Oakland, Roseberry of Santa Barbara and Thompson of Los Angeles are possessors of a superlative degrees of seriousness. Halohan leads by a nose.

Beatty, Halohan, Shanahan, Burnett, Stetson, Randall, Chandler and Crosby are the physical giants of the Legislature. None can shrink below the six-foot one and a half mark. Joel and Preisker are the "kids." None will confess to his exact age, but all are believed to be considerably shy of thirty.

McDonald of San Francisco, who represents the district that sent Hopkins to the Assembly two years ago, is one of the best fighters in the lower house. He was elected on this platform: "I can say 'no' to the most powerful man in my district." He can, and does.

Against Secret Divorces

If a bill which has passed the lower House and is now before the Senate pass, the secret filing of divorce pleadings will no longer be permissible. The bill passed the Assembly in the face of powerful opposition on the part of lawyers practicing in the smaller cities and towns, who fear that their clients in divorce actions might receive undesired publicity if the present restrictions are removed. The advocates of the measure contend that it will serve to some extent to stamp out some of the fraud frequently occurring in the past in divorce matters. They regard the public as a third party to all divorces and believe that the press should have the right to print the news concerning these actions. Frequently there are filed suits by persons living outside the county in which actions are brought. In such instances notice to the defendant is published for thirty days in some obscure weekly, thus giving the defendant little opportunity to be informed of the suit. With the enactment of such a law many people doubtless will hesitate before rushing into the divorce courts if they fear that their cases will be open to public scrutiny.

LEGISLATIVE REMOVAL VERSUS THE RECALL

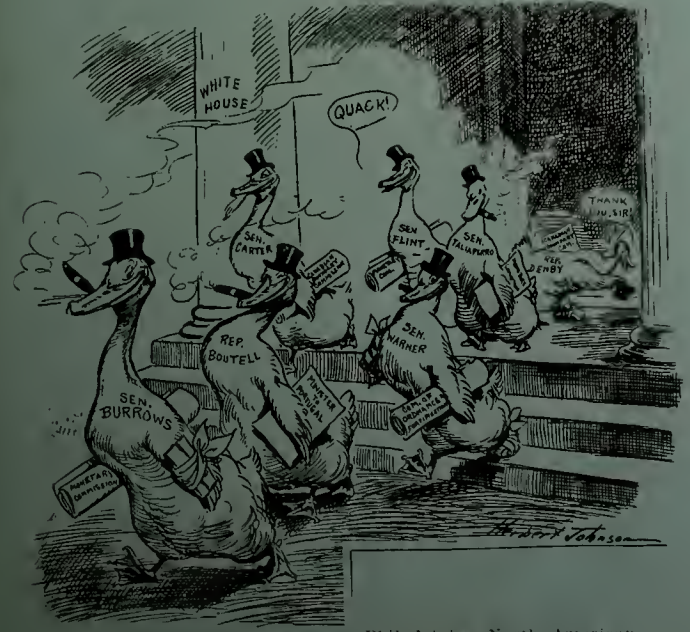
William Denman of San Francisco opposes the recall of Judges by The People, but favors removal by concurrent resolution of the Legislature, "tools of the Southern Pacific," or, presumably, for any other sufficient reason.

This does not seem consistent. In principle, a summary removal by the Legislature does not differ materially from recall by The People.

Section 10, of Article VI of the State Constitution, allows the removal of Judges of the Superior, District Appellate and Supreme Courts by a concurrent resolution adopted by a two-thirds vote of each House. The Judge complained of must be served with a copy of the complaint, and be given a hearing.

This right of removal has never been exercised by the Legislature, but in practice it would be very much in the nature of impeachment, likewise provided for in the Constitution, and the proceedings would probably be long drawn by the taking of testimony, filing of briefs, oral argument by counsel, speech-making on both sides, and so forth. Like impeachment, removal by concurrent resolution would take the form of a criminal trial, with the customary objections to evidence and all manner of technical obstructions and delays. The time consumed by any such proceeding is a serious consideration for the Legislature, which always is indisposed to add to its own burdens.

One reason why the recall by popular vote is preferable to either impeachment or removal proceedings by the Legislature is that it does not require legal proof of actual criminality. It is sufficient for The People that they have lost confidence in the integrity or the independence of a Judge. Very rarely would it be possible to prove a Judge actually guilty of venality or other criminal motive for a judicial act, but the electors are free to draw their own conclusions, and to register a vote of want of confidence.—Sacramento Bee.



LOS ANGELES CITY CLUB NOMINATIONS

Nominations for officers of the City Club of Los Angeles were announced at the regular weekly luncheon last Saturday by the nominating committee and will be balloted on next week. These are: Meyer Lissner, president; Gen. E. C. Bellows, first vice-president; Dr. Elbert Wing, second vice-president; F. C. Nelles, treasurer; Frank G. Henderson, secretary; W. E. Hughes and H. M. Newmark, who, with the officers, will constitute the board of governors.

A CLEANING OUT

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

Pasadena High School: Pasadena will try it again—and this is the third time—on getting a favorable vote on bonds for a site and buildings for a high school. The city has grown so amazingly fast that the present structure which was completed only a few years ago is completely overwhelmed. The need for a new building is unanimously admitted, but the trouble comes on the matter of location. After the first defeat an effort was made to get around the difficulty by allowing the people to vote on a choice of several sites, the school board having agreed to accept the one having the most votes. But the vote on the bonds failed to give the required two-thirds. The outlook is said to be more favorable this time, although the petty bickerings over the question of site still continue. Pasadena, a city of 40,000 people, has 800 children in its high school, and this in spite of the fact that Throop takes care of as many more. When Chicago was a city of 400,000 people—ten times as large as Pasadena is now—it had high school accommodations for only 750.

Competition Cut Off: Pennsylvania is a state that is like a reactionary dream of heaven. Recently Charles M. Schwab, planning for the operation of an enormous coke plant near Bethlehem, looked around to see what he could do to dispose of the by-product of gas for heating and lighting, of which his establishment would make enough to supply a score of cities and towns. He soon made the cheerful discovery that the gas companies of these various towns all had franchises that were practically perpetual and were absolute monopolies. It did not matter how low he was willing to serve gas; he could not lay a main. More than that; he found that the companies none of them paid taxes. An effort is now being made to get a law passed that will admit of taxing them. Another case of harrassing the corporations that have brought us our prosperity.

Bettering Conditions of Social Evil: Chicago has a vice commission of 30 people, including pastors of churches, physicians, city officials and college professors, who have been studying the social evil in that city and its treatment in other cities. In the meantime the chief of police has instituted three reforms that have lessened in some degree the evil done by the red light district. All sale of liquor is forbidden, under severe penalties, the business is not advertised by gaudy curtains or colored lights, the women are not allowed to attract attention in public, and no children are allowed to enter the district. The strict abolition of the liquor traffic, it is said, has done a good deal to make conditions better.

Road for Delaware: The president of the Dupont Powder Company offers to loan the state a million dollars for use in constructing a good road from one end of the state to the other. It would take more than a million to do that for California, but the "Blue Hen" is not very long and still less broad.

Historical Memories: The municipal council of Paris proposes to put on the street markers at the corners a few words describing the individual or place or event for which the street is named: as, for example "Rue Marengo, French Victory, 1800." This is to be done especially for the benefit of the growing generation.

Guesswork Metering: St. Paul recently had occasion to discharge a number of men who had been reading meters for water charges, and the surprising discovery was made that many of them never opened the meter at all but contented themselves with guessing it by previous records. To be safe from "kicks" they always figured under the probable figure. When the new men came on the job, there was a great uproar over the sudden increase in the size of water rates. Hereafter each man's work will be tested occasionally.

Public Comfort in Seattle: Seattle has a public comfort station which was constructed by the park department about a year ago in the center of the city, at the intersection of two of the principal streets. Some objection was made to the choice of this location by neighboring property owners and tenants, but the structure is so handsome, and has been kept in such perfect order that all are now satisfied, and, in fact, would strenuously resist its removal. The structure cost $25,000 and is used by 5000 people daily.

Charter Changes in New York: In common with other progressive cities, New York frequently amends and changes its charter. The change scheduled to come off this year removes the borough presidents from the board of estimates, so that they can give all their time to the administration of the business of their respective boroughs, and establishes a special commission to serve as a board of estimate independent of the rest of the city government. Detroit uses this same plan, and its budget is unusually complete and accurate.

Inter-Telephone Connection: The Sunset or Pacific Telephone Company in Los Angeles announces that it will connect up its subscribers with Home telephones in a list of 24 cities in Southern California. Some of these are places of considerable size like Redlands, Corona and Whittier. For some time the people of Los Angeles have been asking the telephone companies to establish an inter-system telephone bureau, but they have insisted it was impossible.

Detroit's Electric Light Plant: Detroit has been lighting its streets with its own plant since 1895, and officials of that city say that the people would not give up the system now for any consideration. They are getting their lamps for $50 a lamp a year as against $75 to $85 for most places. Detroit has 4565 arc lamps, which is an exceptionally large number in proportion to population. The plant is valued at $1,400,000.

Street Car Company's Share: Because the street car company operating in Springfield, Ohio, resisted the demand of the city that it should pay its share of the cost of street cleaning, the city attorney made a special investigation of the matter and found that the company was not doing its part of the paving by three feet, so that hereafter it will be considerably the loser for having opened the issue.

To Diminish the Fire Risk: The manager for the Board of Underwriters in Chicago suggests that the 1200 pensioned firemen, who are mostly old and unable to do hard work be made inspectors on salaries a little larger than their pension. Having served a long time on the force, they would be familiar with fire conditions and would be of great service, he thinks, in preventing fires.

Wanted, a Practicable Drinking Fountain: New York has abolished the public drinking cup from its city schools but discovers that no really practical device has yet been produced to take its place. The trouble with most of the drinking fountains is that the little folks will rub their lips against them, and some of them are decidedly worse than the cups they are to replace.

Moving Picture Shows: There are now about 10,000 moving picture concerns in this country with a daily attendance of about 4,000,000. It is estimated that one-tenth of these attendants are school children. Ninety per cent of the films sent out are now carefully reviewed by committees to throw out questionable scenes. These moving picture shows have put the melodrama out of business.

Firemen Great Readers: The Boston Public Library makes a regular service of books to all the fire houses. Last year the circulation in this department was 17,400. It is suggested by the heads of the Fire Department that books be included that will help the men to be more efficient in their work. New York is doing this.

Municipal Reference Bureau: The work of the Municipal Reference Bureau of the University of Wisconsin has proved so effective that the City Club of Milwaukee has petitioned the state Legislature to appropriate $150,000 to carry on the work on a much larger scale, extending it to all the cities of the state.

Gasoline in Sewer: Kansas City, Kansas, recently had a sewer blow-up, after the manner of many other places. It cut off four large electric conduits, put out all lights in the city for three hours, and left cars at a standstill. Like most of these explosions, it is charged up to gasoline from the garages.

Clean-Up Day: The entire state of Texas devoted March 11th to the work of cleaning up. Organizations were formed in cities and towns for that purpose. Some of the cities used the 11th merely as an official beginning for a clean-up campaign and lasted several days.

Use of Initiative: The people of Dallas, Texas, desires the wires put underground in the business district, and finding the commissioners unwilling to take so radical a course without a vote of the people, they are circulating initiative petitions for that purpose.

Sentiment for Municipal Ownership: Finding that their lighting plant has paid them a net profit of $70,000 in the last five years, the people of Escanaba, Michigan, are now planning to establish a municipal water plant.

Hard Luck: News dispatches tell us that the biggest fireworks manufacturing establishment in the country has gone into insolvency by reason of the "sane Fourth" movement. Well, at least that shows the reform has taken hold in good earnest.

Road Building on a Large Scale: The people of Pennsylvania will probably soon have a chance to vote on a constitutional amendment that will allow the issuing of $50,000,000 in bonds for the construction of good roads.

Farm for Vagrants: Toledo is planning a vagrancy farm after the style of the Cleveland one that has been so successful.

Municipal Golf Links: Denver opened municipal golf links in one of its parks last fall and they have been well patronized.

SENATORIAL SKITS

Number 7

By The Onlooker

THE SENATORIAL SUNBURST

In this series of Senatorial Skits, the next skittee is Senator Edward J. Tyrrell, the same that represents the County of Alameda in general and the part thereof in particular known as the Emeryville district. We started to add that old reliable stage "prop" of verbiage, "and thereby hangs a tale," but we are moved to amend by striking out the word "tale" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "bonfire," so that the phrase shall now read, "and thereby hangs a general conflagration." And a right interesting and significant little Bunsen burner of a tale it is, too, if properly told.

For the sake of those who know it all but have temporarily forgot we will remind them that the Emeryville district of Oakland is distinguished chiefly as an emporium for the breeding, training and exhibition of cavalry horses by disinterested patriots who have no other purpose than this in developing the rapid thoroughbred. The fact that thousands of persons from San Francisco and Oakland, to say nothing of curious people even from such remote quarters as Sheepshead Bay, Lexington and Juarez, used to insist on crowding to the grounds in such numbers that a fence two dollars high finally had to be built to keep them out, has nothing whatever to do with pure, patriotic purposes heretofore attached to the persons engaged in thorough-bredding cavalry stock. Neither has the further distressing fact that certain of these curious people even vulgarly bet cash that a certain thoroughbred is the thorough-breddest for one mile, and that so many people got this habit that the great moral engines daily printed occult figures known as the "dope sheet" for the "inside info" of pikers, mutts, and touts. (We don't know what half these words mean, but we want "local color" so we have copied them out of the sporting page.) Neither does the fact that embezzlement and suicide flourished among these vulgar persons. None of these things, we repeat, altered or diminished the pure patriotism of the thoroughbredders.

But a lot of unpatriotic people seemed unable to understand the sterling worth of the Emeryville institution, and they kept pounding away at the Legislature to stop, at least, the vulgar part of it, the betting. Whereupon the proprietors of Emeryville protested that they hated vulgarity above all things, but that their altruistic endeavors to run a West Point for cavalry horses must be maintained at any price; that betting had nothing to do with cavalry horses; therefore, do not legislate against betting. This logic is, of course, unanswerable, but, to the astonishment of Emeryville, it did not quiet the noise of the reformers.

None was more astonished than Senator Frank Leavitt, who now isn't where Tyrrell is. Leavitt was one of the ablest assets of the Emeryville Patriotic Society. It was perfectly clear to that society that one of the most helpful devices to promote cavalry stock improvement was to have an expert mechanic in the State Legislature. Hence Frank Leavitt's annual pass to Sacramento, for Leavitt was such a mechanic, fully up on every kind of machine, from the machinery of government at Sacramento to the cute but necessary little machine in the Sixteenth Senatorial district. In the Legislature he was peculiarly adept at the difficult mechanical feat known as putting the screws to reform.

Something, however, happened to Patriotism, Limited, and to the local machine at the same time. This happened last summer. Leavitt smiled the chauffeur's superior "oh-this-is-easy" smile and crawled under the machine with a monkey wrench in his hand. Just what happened he never knew, but something exploded and when he emerged, minus his eyelashes and his shirt, all he could see was a correct imitation of the sun at noonday refulging from the seat whereon he formerly had sat. In other words, Tyrrell was starring as "Checkers" in "The Man on the Box," meaning the ballot box.

It happened this way. Mayor Frank K. Mott, of Oakland, led a lone and joyless life as a consistently successful real estate operator and seeker for political preferment—mayoralty of Oakland usually preferred. Constant success had discouraged him, incapacity for defeat had beaten down his once high spirits. Gloom possessed him and he longed for a ray of sunshine. As if in answer to his hopes, he met Tyrrell. Joy returned. "Come," he cried, "come, little sunbeam, and be my private secretary." And Tyrrell went. He secretaried by day and studied law by night, and studied politics all the time because he couldn't be with Mayor Mott and help it.

Along came the political disturbances of last summer. Mayor Mott was shoveling sand to brace his own ditchbanks, but he paused long enough to mop his brow and remark to Tyrrell:

"Ed, this reform wave is your hunch. Buck Leavitt. If you're beat, it's good advertising for a young lawyer anyway. If you beat, it's a sate in the Sinit."

Tyrrell took the hunch and went to the tailor. "An English walking suit," said Tyrrell. "Something dignified without being too dressy, something grown-up but not too old, impressive but not inhuman. Something Senatorial, in short."

He got it. Maybe it turned the trick. Anyway something did, and Tyrrell, E. J., now flaunts the impressive coat-tails in the seat that Leavitt once adorned, and casts the golden glow of his gleaming glory of hair upon all that part of the Senate chamber south of the Tropic of Curtin. And even if he did nothing but glow, little glowworm, glimmer, all through the session, he would still be one of the most useful members of the present Legislature, simply by virtue of occupying a seat to the exclusion of that wily mechanic and cavalry officer, Frank Leavitt.

Grand Army Reminiscences

John T. Bell in The Modesto News

Under the caption, "The Idler," John T. Bell maintains a column in the Modesto News full of human interest, the following stories are representative of his work:

A group of Grand Army men were telling stories of their experiences in Southern prisons. Said one: "In April, 1865, I was a prisoner at Andersonville. An order was received to make out a list of prisoners for exchange. The preparing of these lists was always made a matter of barter by the prison officials. I happened to learn of this chance when there were but a few names lacking to complete the number. The only thing I had to offer was a rubber comb. My proffer of this was accepted and I hurried back among the prisoners to find my comrade, who happened to have it in his possession. Upon returning with the comb I nearly fainted when I found I was just too late—that the list had been made up while I was gone. Those prisoners were taken to Vicksberg, where, with others, they were put on the steamer Sultana. Just above Memphis, on her way North, there was an explosion on the Sultana and over 1800 of the 2100 prisoners and sick soldiers on the boat lost their lives."

"In company with a comrade I broke out of a prison down South," said another, "and we made our way slowly through the woods, traveling only in the night. We were so nearly starved that one morning when we saw a house in a clearing I told my comrade that I proposed to go there and ask for something to eat and run the risk of capture. He remained in hiding while I went to the house and told the good, motherly looking woman that I saw there, that I was a Confederate soldier on furlough. She said I was a Yankee, and then I told her the truth, that I was nearly starved, and that I had a comrade hid in the woods. She told me to bring him in, which I did, and she gave us a good breakfast, put a lot of food in a flour sack for us, and said that she hoped we would get away all right. Do you know, gentlemen, what I did? I just simply put my arms around that good woman's neck and cried, and she cried, and I told that skeleton of a comrade of mine that I considered it a direct interposition of Providence, and that we would succeed in reaching the Union lines. And we did."

"You needn't think that you are the only Union soldier that made his escape from a Confederate prison," remarked the third of the party. "I broke away, too. When I went into the service in 1861 I was a good boy. I had just been confirmed a member of the Episcopal church, and I took into the service a prayer book that was presented to me by Bishop Doane, who was our neighbor and family friend. I carried that book in my breast pocket all through my army life. In getting away through the country I threw myself one day on the mercy of a Southern family, which proved to be very bitter against the Yankees. The woman refused to give me anything to eat, and I was confident that she would turn me over to the Confederate soldiers. In the course of conversation she asked me where I was from, and when I told her she wanted to know if I knew Bishop Doane. I showed her my prayer book with my name written in it in the bishop's handwriting, and told her of the close relations of the good bishop and our family. That fixed me. She was a great admirer of the bishop, and she at once set about preparing a meal for me, and also gave me food to carry on the way."

California Fifty Years Ago

Fifty years ago this week California was a very different place from the California of today: you have only to read the papers of that day to know it; all was peace and fraternal concord; the Legislature met only to register the will of the people and return home to receive the encomiums and other horticultural tributes of unanimously admiring constituencies; California north and California south lay down like the lion and the lamb, together; nothing was discordant, all was calm——

As, for example, an excerpt from the Sacramento Union of Tuesday, March 19, 1861, would indicate. The Legislature was in session (and the Union report, by the way, was better done than most modern reports of the body) and Mr. Johnson introduced into the Assembly a resolution calling on California's representatives in Congress to use every means to prevent the proposed abandonment of the Overland mail contract by the Butterfield route, especially since "the counties of Monterey, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara and Los Angeles have recently expended in the aggregate $60,000 in repairing roads through those counties in order to facilitate the transit of said Overland mail."

We may remark in passing that Mr. Johnson was from San Luis Obispo. Evidently the gentleman started something with his resolution. Instantly gentlemen from other parts of California rose up and said unkind things about Southern California; said they were trying, by this resolution, to head Congress off from establishing the direct Central route for mail, said Southern California was hogging a good thing, and said that the Butterfield route curved so far south from a straight line from Kansas City west that it was called the "ox-bow" route.

At about this stage of the concordant proceedings suggested in the first paragraph, Mr. Amyx arose, and we gather from the record that he was Amyxer, all right, for he is down on record as having said this, quite haughtily: "That when gentlemen undertook to direct the conduct of the House by a misrepresentation of the resolutions he was bound to notice it. It suited the gentlemen from El Dorado and Sacramento (sh, ha! here's the rub) to oppose the resolutions because they had been against the Southern Route from the first." Take that!

And so they went to it, fifty years ago. So far as we see from the records, the phrase "Sunny Southland" had not been invented, but north and south they fought it out, just the same. So different from the present, remember. The Johnson resolution was finally amended, of course, as a compromise straddle. Also so very different.

A touch of grisly humor—when read in the light of later happenings—occurs in this same report of the Senate proceedings for that day. The Senate was considering the General File, and was taking up Senate Bill No. 90, "An Act to amend an Act entitled an Act to regulate the settlement of estates of deceased persons." The Union reporter notes that the bill contained 100 sections, and that the matter was so tedious that a quorum could scarcely be maintained, when—but read the verbatim report:

"In came the news boys with the Sacramento Union, Extra, containing Lincoln's Inaugural Address; the boys made a rapid sale. The Chair (Mr. De Long) called Senators to order, but without much apparent effect.

"Mr. Ryan moved that the Senate take a recess for twenty minutes.

"Mr. Thornton called the attention of his friend from San Francisco (Mr. Burbank) to a very ominous fact indeed—that we were considering the estates of deceased persons when Lincoln's Inaugural Address came in. (Laughter.)"

This was 1861, not 1866, else they would have been grim jesters indeed.

The more blithesome spirit of humor was in full evidence in California fifty years ago. Tenderly we lift from the half-century-old columns this sample of the then prevailing style of humor, lifted by the Union itself from the Visalia Delta. It reads:

"Never Married Before.—Report tells of a young lady, out in the country, and her 'lovyer,' who came in town a few evenings since with the avowed intention of committing matrimony. All went smoothly until they arrived at the bridge, when 'Miss in her teens' weakened. The fact was, she had never been married before, and the idea of being married in town frightened her."

If the modern reader thinks that isn't funny, he needn't laugh. But it is historically interesting, for it proves that our old friend, the phrase, "committing matrimony," was in good standing fifty years ago. Another old friend that was well and hearty and as good an advertiser as ever (Collier's and the Ladies' Home Journal, please copy) was Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup, advertised twice in every issue. While we are on the subject we may note that Sanford's Liver Invigorator was a staple remedy of those days, probably efficacious because of the acute and accurate directions, which were: "Mix water in the mouth with the Invigorator, and swallow both directly." This undoubtedly saved mental strain on the part of those patients who might be concerned about swallowing the water at the same time as the Invigorator, after carefully mixing the two in the mouth. Modern Pe-ru-na, we may interpolate, gives no directions at all as to a chaser, clearly a case of retrogression in California life in the last fifty years.

The subtle art of the photographer had the same subtle wiles as now, in those good old days, but there were evidently certain differences in technique, as the following advertisement will show:

"To Be or Not to Be; that's the question—whether it is not better to go to Beal's (an old established artist) and get a GOOD LIKENESS, or to go to some new beginner and get a shadow or a counterfeit, not like the original. Only one dollar for LEATHER PICTURES, suitable to send in a letter, at Beal's, No. 113 J street, on the same floor as Light & Pierson, Dentists."

Now "leather pictures" is a little beyond us; so is the unexplained relation between photography and dentistry. But we recognize another old friend—the "new beginner" was with the patient public fifty years ago.

Not all the oddities of Californian composition, a half century back, appeared in advertisements. The following news item has a certain "freeness" about it that charms while it does not elucidate:

"Jealousy.—Thomas Peard, of Boston Ravine, Nevada County, shot at one Elsick, lately, for paying too much attention to his wife. Elsick was not hit."

Showing That Grandfather Fell for the Same Games That Stung Us Yesterday

For one, we confess our utter inability to appreciate the quixotic gallantry of Peard. Why should he care if Elsick paid too much attention to his wife? Hasn't any man a perfect right to pay attention to his wife if he wants to? And who shall judge how much attention he shall pay? It appears to us that Peard's judgment was as bad as his aim. All that aside, what would a modern news editor say of a reporter who calmly remarks in a "story" that "ONE" Elsick, forsooth, was shot at "LATELY"? In those peaceful days, the strenuous scoop must have been somnolent compared with modern practice.

Those who are interested in the history of the Capitol will note the following, from the Union of March 20, 1861:

"A fine perspective colored drawing of the State Capitol, as it will appear when completed according to the present design, has been hung up in the Governor's office."

Another item from the same issue reminds us that Sacramento is still the home of culture: Van Winkle and Duncan, who described themselves as dealers in iron, steel, smith's coal and hardware, announced that they had just received various merchandise, "ex Ships Malay, Great Republic, Syren, etc.," and the first thing they list as received is "100 tons Refined Bar Iron." Even the blacksmiths' materials were agents of cultivation in those Arcadian days.

The Union for the next day announced the election of James A. McDougall to be United States Senator, breaking a long deadlock.

A glimpse at the prevailing fad in cults is gained from Friday's paper of that week in '61. This advertisement appeared on that day: "Lecture at the Presbyterian Church, on Sixth street, on Saturday Evening, March 23, at Seven o'clock, on WASHINGTON, COURTSHIP AND MATRIMONY, phrenologically analyzed, by F. Coombs, attired as Washington. Tickets, fifty cents for Gentleman and Ladies."

Once again we confess to subtleties too profound for us. The relation between Washington and the tenderer emotions as analyzed by phrenology, puts one over on us, to use the slang of the hour. And lest the careless reader miss it, notice that one gentleman and uncounted ladies may be admitted for the price of one admission, only fifty cents.

Now for a touch of true early Californian flavor. On Saturday of that week, McGinnis & Co. advertise a "Grand Musical and Gift Entertainment, $52,500 in Gifts! To be Distributed at the Metropolitan Theatre, in Sacramento, on Saturday Evening, June 22d, 1861, on which occasion the following Valuable Mining Claims! and other property will be distributed among Ticket Holders."

The first three gifts are then enumerated, being the "Arabella," the "Keystone" and the "Howard" claims. But the fourth gift is the gem: "A Saloon, containing one splendid Marble Bed Billiard Table, the Bar and fixtures, and a Dancing Hall, 26x70 feet, attached; is doing a flourishing business and is known as the 'Virginia Hall,' Valued at $3,000."

Turning from the Sacramento Union to the San Francisco Bulletin, we find at once the precursor of the "longest leased liar in the world" in this notice at the head of each dispatch:

"By Magnetic Telegraph

("Per telegraph to St. Louis; thence by telegraph to Fort Kearney; thence by Pony Express to Sacramento; thence by telegraph to San Francisco.)"

As the paper says itself, "happily very little is stirring in town," our eyes rove to the advertisements. Here we find, in the Help Wanted column:

"WANTED—Girl to wait in saloon, $75; girls for general housework, $25 and $30; a woman cook, $30."

We wonder, with a touch of sentimental sadness, if that girl is still waiting in the saloon. We know blooming well that the lady who wanted the woman cook at $30 is waiting, still.

Here we find proof of the world's stability. Time writes no wrinkle on the azure brow of women's thirst for fashion (metaphor mixed, but who cares?), as witness this from Bulletin of March 20, 1861:

"A new fashion of ladies' stockings has come out in England. They are of woolen or cotton, but are particolored, as red and white, red and black, mauve and gray. When harmonizing with the dress, the effect is said to be very pretty."

No wonder we read in the next day's Bulletin, "A SHOCK—Sensitive men in the County Clerk's room felt the shock of an earthquake at 7 minutes to 3 this afternoon." Shades of our maternal ancestors! Woolen! Red and black!

One more and we quit. In the telegraphic news from Los Angeles, in the Bulletin of March 20, 1861, we read:

"A meeting of the citizens of this city was held in the Court House on Saturday last for the purpose of reducing the rates of freight and passengers between San Francisco and San Pedro. No definite action was taken." Valiant spirits of '61, commend ye to the braves of this day. Definite action still seems to sleep.

"Did they call on the author of that new play for a speech?"

"No, an apology."—Detroit Free Press.

Make It Easier for the Public to Get Its Rights

The new railroad bill and a vigorous State Railroad Commission should make it more difficult for a carrier of any kind to take advantage of the plight or innocence of passengers. There will be law enough, but it will lie a good deal with the Commission to make its provisions known and to inform the public how it may secure remedies under them. The law should be so simple in operation that it would be worth the while of any person to make a complaint and have the wrong redressed in order that the many may benefit by it.

This the Commission can do. Through its offices independent lawsuits for infractions of any kind may become unnecessary. — Sacramento Bee.

The Blessing of Ballinger

Louis D. Brandeis sat in his Boston law office, with a row of railroad scalps dangling at his belt, when a reporter came in and told him Ballinger had retired to private life.

"I think it's a blessing," he said in answer to a question. He added: "This Ballinger business isn't half as unfortunate as lots of people think. Why, it aroused the whole country to the need of conservation, and we shall save our natural resources in consequence."

It's true, too. Ballinger has been a great blessing. He deserves a statue, carved from a hunk of coal, with the inscription: "If it hadn't been for him Uncle Sam might have slept till the thieves had got away with Alaska."—San Diego Sun.

Trust Offers Advertising as a Reward for Silence

Kissing goes by favor. So does trust advertising, sometimes, but not always. The American Woolen Company knows of an eminent exception. This particular corporation has for years got along without using any printer's ink for purely advertising purposes. All its necessary advertising has been done by merchants handling its goods. Recently it changed its system and inserted advertisements in a score of the monthly and weekly publications of wide circulation. These advertisements made no mention of prices, but were ostensibly for the purpose of calling the attention of the public to the fact that the American Woolen Company manufactures woolen goods. Plainly, there was something behind this unusual departure from that corporation's ordinary business methods, and it remained for Collier's Weekly to discover and reveal the hidden purpose.

The American Woolen Company sent an advertisement to Collier's Weekly, and it was printed on a page opposite a criticism of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law by Mark Sullivan. In this criticism deserved attention was paid to Henry Cabot Lodge, the Massachusetts Senator, who holds Schedule K of the tariff law as sacred as the Declaration of Independence. The American Woolen Company was offended. Through a representative of Wood, Putnam & Wood, its advertising agents, Collier's was diplomatically rebuked for "slamming an advertiser." The rebuke was contained in two letters conveying a thinly disguised warning not to do it again.

Collier's refuses to be silenced, even though it is aware that the American Woolen Company has set aside $100,000 for "advertising purposes." In its current number it exposes the whole scheme, and pertinently inquires: "Can the Wool Trust Gag the Press?"—San Francisco Bulletin.

Putting the House in Order

It is practically impossible to foresee the effects of the Panama Pacific Exposition on the State of California, but if the stir it has already created is any indication of what is to come for the next four years, this state will be aroused as it has not been since its formation. There are evidences everywhere that every community in the State has some plan on foot whereby it may get its due share of the advantages of the big fair.

The Santa Rosa Press Democrat recently commented on the house cleaning of a number of California towns in preparation for the Exposition that ought to interest and apply to Ukiah. The Democrat says in this connection:

"Thirty towns in California have begun to 'clean house' in preparation for the Panama-Pacific Exposition and the vast throng of visitors that the exposition will bring. An astonishing amount of municipal improvement is already under way in the northern end of the State. Many places have already felt the impetus, and are improving their streets, constructing their needed public buildings, improving their school property, acquiring new fire departments, parks, sewers, water works, and whatever is lacking in each individual case."—Ukiah Times.

New Fetich of Capital

Convinced that the tightening of the grip of the Interstate Commerce Commission about the railroads, the Tobacco Trust, the Oil Trust, the Beef Trust and the other great industrial combinations which have of late run afoul of the federal laws, has ended future melon-cutting, New York's moneyed men are going in strong for rubber raising.

J. Pierpont Morgan, Thomas F. Ryan, the Vanderbilts, the Goelets and half a dozen of the other owners of large fortunes in Gotham have set the pace and others it is said will follow. The enormous dividends, ranging as high as 300 per cent, paid to English investors last year by a number of the companies operating rubber plantations in the Far East has sharpened their financial appetites to razor edge and persuaded them to feel that the world is on the verge of an era of rubber production likened only to the early days of American Steel, which, it is claimed, added a thousand new names to our roster of millionaires and evolved a Carnegie as the development of the oil industry evolved a Rockefeller. * * *—San Luis Obispo Tribune.

Jobs for the "Lame Ducks"

President Taft has provided a fat job for all the lame ducks except Englebright, and he has by no means abandoned hope. In some respects the President seems inclined to be guided by the will of the people, especially in the matters of tariff reform and reciprocity, but he is wholly disregarding public sentiment by taking care of the men whom the people so emphatically repudiated at the polls.—Yolo Democrat.

Malicious

"At a political meeting held in this city in November, Meyer Lissner announced that it was his purpose to make 'the tail wag the dog.' That is to say, the government of the State was to be shaped and administered from Los Angeles."—San Francisco Call.

This statement is not true. Also it would not be important, except that it is part of a vicious, malicious and unscrupulous personal attack on Meyer Lissner, which has become part of the continuous policy of the Call. Mr. Lissner is too important and too useful a man to be undermined without injury to the public interest. He is the official head of the Republican party in California. He is the only man in California who, without pay, office, or desire for either, is devoting all his time and abilities to the public service. Those abilities are of a very high order, with a market value, in private employment, far above the salary the state pays to any of its public servants. California gets the use of them for nothing, conjoined with an unselfish devotion to the public weal which is an asset such as few states have and none that have it can spare. California cannot spare it; and therefore, to seek to weaken Mr. Lissner, in any section of California, by wanton lying about him, is to try to injure California.—Fresno Republican.

Street Ornamentation

Tree Warden Reed, of Riverside, Addresses Los Angeles City Club

Taking as his subject "Street Ornamentation," Mr. J. H. Reed, City Tree Warden of Riverside, Cal., addressed the Los Angeles City Club last Saturday.

Mr. Reed's address was both entertaining and instructive, showing the commercial as well as the aesthetic value the planting of trees gave to a city. He spoke as follows:

The principal means of beautifying public streets throughout the world is by tree planting. There is nothing that relieves the monotony and ughness of bare streets so quickly and thoroughly as properly chosen, well cared for trees, nothing that adds so much to their beauty and to their comfort. The added every-day satisfaction that streets lined with trees give to the residents of any city pays all the cost of the trees many times over. But they have another value that will appeal to some who may not care for the esthetic. Street tree-planting has high commercial value to any city. Other things being equal, the city that has made itself, or is making itself, most attractive as a place of residence, will secure the largest portion of the thousands of well-to-do, desirable people seeking homes in California every year, and in constantly increasing numbers. We must not forget that many of the families that are most desirable as additions to our population come from tree lined villages and towns of New England and the Middle States, and the dull, naked streets of our towns repel rather than attract.

Riding with one of our conservative merchants the other day, I called his attention to a row of trees along two continuous blocks and asked for what amount of cash in hand the city could afford to have those trees dug out, restoring the street to the condition it was in three years ago when the street trees were planted. "Not for a thousand dollars," was the prompt reply. Those trees have cost our city, including planting and care, less than fifty dollars. Since we commenced our systematic work in Riverside, we have planted what is equivalent to over 500 such blocks.

I found two things in the East that give some idea of the value placed on street trees there. In most of their cities, when a tree is killed or badly damaged by gas from defective pipe or other like cause, the damage is assessed to the companies by the courts, and I found no instance where it had been placed lower than $40.00 per tree, and usually it is from $50.00 to $100.00. The other thing was the expensive apparatus owned by some cities for moving full grown trees to fill vacancies in rows of old trees, the moving costing from $40.00 to $100.00 each.

Being shown over what is considered one of the most beautiful cities in California by one of its prominent business men and after going over some of the early, well planted, beautiful streets, over which all visitors are taken, I said, "Now let us go over some of your average streets." We found that the partially planted or wholly bare streets covered very much the larger portion of that city. I said to my friend, "Supposing these streets had been planted when the others were, and had been as well cared for, what effect would it have had on the city's valuation today?" "Fifty per cent," he replied.

I consider ten to twenty dollars each a very low estimated value for every suitable tree on a public street, properly placed and cared for, when it is two years old, as a purely revenue producing asset to any residence city.

I have dwelt on this matter of economic value of street trees, because I believe that, if it was better appreciated, it would lead to greatly increased, systematic planting in our California cities. But after all, the purely esthetic value of street beautification, to an intelligent community, is really much greater than the economic.

Municipal Control

Now, if I am right in these premises, how to secure the best results in the quickest and most economical manner is the important consideration.

After five years of somewhat comprehensive study of the matter in a large number of cities, and the same length of time in actual experience in my own town, both before and after it was secured, I am absolutely convinced that the only way street tree-planting and care can be satisfactorily carried on in our cities, is under municipal control. I believe the reason why the large majority of the residence streets in most of our California cities today are either bare or unsatisfactorily planted is because this efficient method of securing general and proper planting and care has but recently attracted serious attention.

In most cities there are people with more or less cultivated tastes and means of gratifying them. They not only build artistic homes and beautify the grounds around them, but extend their improvements by beautifying the adjoining street margins. Others of like tastes make their homes near by, hence we find in many places the street margins of entire blocks—sometimes of whole neighborhoods, beautifully improved. The attractiveness of these special spots, though but a small fraction of the whole, is sufficient sometimes to give the city itself the reputation of being beautiful, because these certain streets are the only parts usually visited, while really the main portions of the cities are anything but beautiful.

Those of you who have observed our California cities generally, as to their beautification, will, I think, recognize this condition as existing in most of them—a few streets well planted and cared for, but the larger portion either entirely unplanted or planted here and there to miscellaneous and often unsatisfactory varieties, indifferently cared for.

This condition is the inevitable result of leaving the tree-planting and care in part or wholly to adjoining property owners or occupants, and without any good reason, The parking space belongs to the city just the same as that portion of the street occupied by the sidewalk, and the trees on it should be controlled by the city the same as is the sidewalk. In fact it is more important that they should be, as they are or should be a permanency. If the sidewalk is wrong, it is easily and quickly replaced, while if the wrong tree is planted, it must be endured indefinitely or removed and wait years for another to grow.

It is recognized, of course, that the individual interest of any given property owner in the pavement or street trees immediately in front of his premises, is greater than that of any other individual, but the general interest in that bit of sidewalk and the trees bordering it, is much greater than any individual interest, and this general interest can only be conserved by city control.

A city can not afford to have a whole block or an entire street disfigured because certain property owners insist on having no trees on their frontages or some variety quite unsuited for the purpose. Especially is this true in view of the fact that property owners are constantly changing locations, while the city's interest in the street is permanent.

In the case of pavement, the wishes of the bordering property owners are consulted as to kind, etc., and their wishes are complied with as far as the best interests of the street, present and future, will allow. So their wishes as to variety of trees and their management should be consulted, but not to the extent of allowing each to plant what he pleases or none at all, as he sees fit. This is as disastrous to the beauty of a street, as to have the sidewalk in patches, a part cement, a part gravel, and the balanee of plain mother earth. Yet this is just what you see on the majority of streets where trees are planted at all.

Municipal control corrects all this. It first sets about getting the streets planted, not some special streets, but in all sections of the city as fast as possible, as much along the streets bordering laborers' cottages, as along the tourist drives or in the show sections of the city, with a view of making the city beautiful in its entirety for the benefit of its own people first, and for the admiration of visitors next.

First Steps

After a definite plan is decided on, the first step toward systematic street tree-planting should be to decide on the most desirable varieties, under various conditions on different streets, and here is one of the most important advantages of city control. In selecting trees for the street, there are several essential things to be considered. The street is not the proper place for experimenting. We should be sure of what we are planting.

First: The street tree should be long lived. It should serve for generations.

Street trees should be suited to their purposes. There are many trees, beautiful in the forest, in the park or on open grounds, quite unsuited to the street. Their habit of growth must be adapted to street conditions. Some trees are beautiful when young, but quite unsatisfactory on the street after a few years.

The street tree should be hardy under severe conditions. Some trees that do well in the open park or yard will not flourish under the less favorable conditions of paved streets.

Tall, wide-spreading trees should not be planted where they will obstruct desired views, or where sunlight and not shade is desired. I remember visiting a friend in Long Beach some years ago who had built a beautiful home. Remarking on the absence of trees on the premises, he said: "We don't want trees, we want to see the ocean." Now trees are not necessarily obstructionists. Where shade is not desired, there are ornamental trees that may be used with good effect without obstructing desired views.

Now, to make selections of varieties to suit all these conditions requires experience, good judgment and trained knowledge of trees, not to be found with the average owner of adjacent properties.

Planting and Care

Suitable varieties being chosen, planting comes. Very few city people know how to plant a tree. Wealthy families who employ gardeners or who secure experts for the purpose can have this work done properly, but we know that these are the exceptions. From my somewhat extended observations, from one-fourth to one-half of the trees planted by the ordinary property-owner either die outright or make a sickly growth which is worse, because it usually retains an unsatisfactory tree in place of a possible vigorous one. As few know how to care for trees as how to plant them, even if they had the time and inclination to do it. To secure satisfactory results, the early irrigation and cultivation at least should be directed by an expert.

Pruning

Again the beauty of a mature tree, especially of the fast growing varieties used in Southern California, depends very largely on intelligent shaping and pruning when young. Formerly, in Riverside, each resident cut the trees on his street frontage to suit himself. Such trees as were not attended to, when they got in the way of passers on the sidewalk or roadway, were pruned by the Street Superintendent's road-making crew, and, as might be expected, sorry work they made of it.

We all have occasion to know that the tastes of residents are not always safe to direct the pruning on the public streets. So long as this privilege is allowed, the best planted streets are liable to be permanently disfigured by some freak notion of a single lot-owner.

In Riverside, no pruning is allowed except by permission from the Tree Warden. This is always granted where it is known that it will be properly done.

Mutilating street trees by telephone and electric wire lines is difficult to prevent under individual control. When our city took the care of its trees, many of the finest rows were in bad condition from cutting by time men. We now have little trouble from this source. The superintendents of the different companies work cheerfully and heartily with the Tree Warden to save the trees from being disfigured. All cutting is done under the Tree Warden's supervision.

Many thousands of dollars have been spent by different companies in putting in higher wires and in other ways to protect our street trees from damage. Where poles are put in that will give the trees fifty feet clearance, the city obligates itself to keep the wires free. The question frequently comes to me, "How can we protect our street trees from damage

Municipal control of street trees is being rapidly adopted by the more ambitious towns all over the country. Five years ago when Riverside first took up the matter, to learn how street trees were managed in older communities, I visited a large number of cities in the East that had reputations for beauty. I found less than a score in the entire country with absolute control of their trees. These were the most beautiful cities in the land. Washington is doubtless the most beautiful city in America, if not in the world. Others may have more striking features, but none are so beautiful as a whole. This is owing—thanks to George Washington's far-sightedness—to the fact that the government has had entire control of the street ornamentation from the first.

Some four or five years ago, the American Civic Association took the matter of Municipal Control of Street Beautification up in their conventions and in their publications, advocating the policy strongly. The matter was generally advocated in journals devoted to civic betterment, with immediate results.

Last summer I made another trip throughout the East, studying parks and street trees in over thirty cities. I found a large number of towns had already adopted city control of their trees and street tree-planting and systematic care were carried on as never before. Newark, N. J., had planted over 30,000 trees during four years and over twenty cities in that state alone had joined that city in adopting the new plan. I found such towns as Cleveland, O., and Buffalo, N. Y., had taken charge of their street beautification, had established municipal nurseries and were carrying on street tree-planting vigorously.

Riverside was the first town in the West to adopt the plan. Redlands, Pasadena, Ontario and Corona have recently joined us and some five or six other California cities are now considering the adoption of the plan. Had we known at first what we had to learn by experience, we could have done the work much more wisely, efficiently and speedily, but we have accomplished something. We have planted over 10,000 trees on our streets since we commenced. We have but few streets unplanted. The earlier of these plantings have already absolutely changed the general appearance of whole sections of the city. It is simply wonderful how quickly a row of our fast growing trees, uniformly planted and intelligently cared for will beautify a street. Four years will accomplish as much as eight or ten with their shorter seasons and slower growing trees in the East.

When we commenced planting under the new system, there were some 30,000 mostly old trees on our streets. The change made on these old trees by systematic management has been as important to Riverside as the new plantings.

But we have a vast deal to do yet. Sometimes complimentary things are said of our street ornamentation, but I never hear them without a twinge. It is yet so far from what it should be and we propose shall be. Though Riverside is yet but a small town of some fifteen thousand, it covers some forty square miles, with over two hundred miles of streets to be beautified. Had we the thirty or forty thousand people, our tree-planting is rapidly helping to bring us the task would be much easier. But I insist that it is at this early stage of growth that our cities should systematically plant trees and continue to plant as new streets are laid out, not waiting for expensive improvements.

I have said that the only way to have this work done satisfactorily is for the city to do it. Ordinarily this can not be brought about directly. A public sentiment must be behind it. Intelligent individuals must start the matter through some sort of local organization to demonstrate the efficiency of systematic effort. We interested our Chamber of Commerce first. The work of its tree planting committee soon induced the city authorities to take it up. It had developed a public sentiment that heartily sustained the new department. Improvement societies, women's clubs, tree-planting associations, will accomplish much in the way of this preliminary work. But such organizations are generally more or less short-lived, since their efficiency usually depends on the enthusiasm of a few leading spirits, necessarily of limited duration. Hence the main purpose of such efforts should be to lead the way to municipal control.

My last word is, I believe, that from either the commercial or esthetic standpoint, there is no project for betterment of your city more worthy of your sincere attention than the proper, permanent and general beautification of your residence streets.

Mr. Reed emphasized the point that in Los Angeles the road-bed frequently occupies too large a proportion of the street. "From the material point," said he, "it is absurd to build a road-bed from 32 to 36 feet in width when 22 to 26 feet would serve better, to say nothing of the greater cost of maintenance as well as the initial expense. From the esthetic point of view the folly is greater. We want no more of the glaring macadamized surface than traffic needs, while every foot added to properly improved parking spaces materially adds to the beauty of the streets."

PEPPERS, FOUR YEARS FROM PLANTING, SHOWING THE IMPROVEMENT IN WHAT WAS AN ABSOLUTELY BARE STREET

the tax would never be paid, or if paid, would have to be refunded inasmuch as the Supreme Court of the United States would declare it unconstitutional and void, not because it was so necessarily, but because the interests were all opposed to it and what the interests do not want they were not likely to be forced to take. It was so with the income tax and why not with the special tax on corporations? Well, as everybody now knows, the Supreme Court held the law constitutional. We, The People, have reason to take courage. We are not yet out of the woods for there are the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases to be disposed of, but the decision in the corporation tax case augurs well. The Watchman was in the wrong and is glad to confess it. Moreover, the decision makes it clear that a corporation is no longer a person entitled to all the privileges and immunities enjoyed by man born of woman, but a thing which man has created, and which he may regulate, or annihilate, as the general welfare shall determine.

Futility of Felony The fact that the present Legislature is insistent in striving to raise offenses classed as misdemeanors to the rank of felonies shows how little legislators know of penology. Their manifestation of indignation is more righteous than intelligent. The penal code of this State now classes as felonies 360-odd offenses. It would be fully as conducive to good order if half the number were reduced to misdemeanors and very much more so if fines as penalties were abolished and street work in a chain-gang or on a rock pile substituted. Let it never be forgotten that it is not the severity with which crime is punished that safeguards society from it, but the certainty with which punishment is meted out. When half the offenses now classed as felonies were punishable with the death penalty crime was rather augmented than deterred and so it would he now if half our felonies were made punishable on the gallows. The need of our civilization is not that punishments be made more drastic but more certain. To that end our legislators would render a more important service were they to put their best efforts upon reforming our criminal procedures rather than our schedules of punishments. Too many of our legislators are living under the old dispensation of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth rather than under the new which, first of all, would convict of sin and, afterward, show mercy rather than retributive vengeance if by so doing a criminal may be redeemed to sound citizenship.

City Representation Anent the legislative apportionment embroglio our larger cities may content themselves with at least one sage and mollifying reflection: The smaller the representation accorded such cities, and the wider distributed throughout the State, the safer will the interests of such cities be. For instance San Francisco's chiefest menace has ever been the San Francisco delegation.

Training School for Statesmen It has been objected that no man of ability can afford to spend three months out of a year at Sacramento legislating for The People unless he has a reason for it that is unseen. Perhaps not, and yet a very good training school for statesmanship a Legislature is, and since when has an ambition to become a statesman come to love darkness rather than light? It would be sound policy for the people to elevate to the Congress of a Nation mainly those who have proven their worth in the Legislature of the State.

RECALL OF JUDGES

(The Public, Chicago)

Granted that the power of recall is a wise one for the people to reserve as to legislators, then it is a wise one for them to reserve as to judges. This is so, that is to say, under existing circumstances in the United States with reference to judicial powers.

The power to recall judges by popular vote goes logically with the power to elect judges by popular vote; and to elect judges by popular vote is a necessary outcome, in our republic, of the Marshallistic theory regarding the extent of judicial authority. If the judicial function were confined in this country, as it is in Great Britain, to applications by legal experts of the law of the land to individual controversies, we should have a different problem. Judges might then be safely appointed instead of being elected. They might with safety to popular institutions be even appointed for life, subject only to indictment for offenses in office, just as accountants, surveyors or other experts might be. For in those circumstances, judicial decisions would work no harm that could not be easily cured by legislation. Neither mistaken decisions, nor unjust ones, nor partisanship of any kind or degree could then dominate political action. The authority of the people would be supreme, the democracy of the country would remain unimpaired and unassailed by superior power.

But that is not true in existing circumstances in this country. Political power has been surreptitiously usurped by the judiciary. Under our system of written constitutions the judiciary has made congresses and legislatures subordinate to judges as factors in government. It has made the people themselves also subordinate. There is no limitation whatever upon the political power of the judiciary—which is vested in the last resort in five out of nine Supreme Court judges—except the people's power of amending constitutions; and this power is so hedged in with limitations that even a small minority of the people can prevent action by a large majority. The governing power in this country is not the President (except through his judicial appointments, which once made cannot be recalled), nor congress (except through the senate's power of confirming judicial appointments, which once done is done for life), nor the state legislatures, nor the people themselves (except through baffling processes of Constitutional amendment.) The governing power in this country is the judiciary. Through our written constitutions, with their "checks and balances" and with legislative, executive and judicial departments of "co-ordinate" power, we have evolved a system in which the "checks" have been monopolized by the judiciary, the "balances" have been unbalanced by the judiciary, and instead of a "co-ordinate" branch of the government the judiciary has become superordinate. It is a law-making and a law-killing power, the law-making and the law-killing power.

Judges must therefore be elected directly by the people; and, having been elected, they must be subject at all times to recall by the people. Either that, or our democratic republic will depend for its perpetuity, not upon the people's will, but upon the loyalty of any five out of nine life tenure judges who may happen, no matter how or whence, to rise to the supreme bench.

The opposition to a popular recall for judges speaks volumes for the recognition by great Interests of the judiciary as the ultimate seat of power, and of their wish to keep it. "Let our judges censor the laws of a country," they seem to say, "and we care not who enacts them." Their pretense that disgruntled litigants would set the recall machine in motion against judges who decided for their adversaries is altogether too thin. Defeated litigants could get but few signatures to their petitions for a recall of the judge. The public would laugh at them. Their only recourse would be the time hallowed one of a spell of "cussin' the judge out in the tavern stable." But we are told that "no self-respecting lawyer would consent to be a judge," with the recall staring him in the face. It were better if the man, who for that reason wouldn't take a judgeship, were left to his pickings as an open instead of a concealed lawyer for special interests. Might a judge be recalled because he held that "a county was obliged to pay bonds which the people wished to repudiate"? The instance cannot be named where a people have tried to repudiate an honestly contracted debt; and if there were any such danger, the argument would apply as well to the recall of an administrative officer to prevent his making payment, or of a legislator who refused to vote for repudiation, as to the recall of a judge. And if the people in any political subdivision decided to repudiate obligations, they would be too earnest

[illegible] with recalling petty judges. Would the recall be a menace to the independence of the judiciary? On the contrary, it would relieve judges of the worse menace that perpetually faces them now. The menace of a majority of all the people of a community is a friendly aid, in contrast with the menace of the Beast. Consider Judge Lindsey's case and be wise.

The wail that comes from the Beast cost "an angry community" oust a judge from office "because he had made a just but unpopular decision," may be safely disregarded until somebody produces at least one instance in which a just judicial decision has ever been unpopular. The danger this American republic faces today is not popular assaults upon judges for just decisions; it is corporate coddling of judges for unjust decisions. Arizona guards against this danger by means of the recall. President Taft is to determine whether or not to thrust their guard aside.

The Right to Quit Work

Walter Macarthur Argues Against "The Watchman's" Conclusions

In our issue of March 11th, "The Watchman" indulged in some criticism of the attitude of labor in opposing the Weinstock labor bill. Under the caption, "Pernicious Abstractions," "The Watchman" said, in part:

"Pernicious Abstractions" is what Lincoln called those inconsequential subjects for debate such as whether "states lately in rebellion" were ever out of the union or had always been in it, secession to the contrary notwithstanding. * * * In opposing Senate Bill No. 918 the representatives of labor indulged themselves in some of those "pernicious abstractions" so convenient as subject matter for debate, but almost wholly inconsequential when the purpose is to solve, in some practical way, some difficult social problem. * * * As to all the provisions incorporated in the bill The Watchman is not advised, but the principle of it was sound in that it affirmed the right of society, upon its own behalf, to interfere whenever wager of battle has been tendered by either labor or capital until the cause of the trouble may be inquired into and, if possible, adjudicated. * * * There is not a right under the sun, not even that of life, that is not subordinate to the well-being of the species. The trouble is that both labor and capital want a free field, no favor and a chance to fight out their difficulties man fashion without regard to public interest. Society cannot allow this with bodies of men any more than it can with two individual men. The question of freedom or slavery of labor or capital is not involved, but only the question of the establishment of justice between men and men as well as between man and man. * * *

Walter Macarthur of San Francisco has taken exceptions to "The Watchman's" article, as follows:

In the California Outlook of March 11 "The Watchman" characterizes as a "pernicious abstraction" the statement that "the right of personal liberty is inherent, inalienable and absolute," "in all circumstances other than those of military necessity." "The Watchman" disproves (?) the truth of this statement by reference to the case of Mr. Ruef, who "is being deprived of his liberty without the smallest military necessity." This comparison obviously ignores the difference between the two cases, that of a workman deprived of his liberty to quit work and that of a man deprived of his liberty for committing a crime.

Of course, if the act of quitting work be regarded as a crime the case of Ruef or any other criminal would be apropos. But even "The Watchman" would not go thus far; hence his reference to the case of Ruef is not at all to the point.

Everyone recognizes the common and necessary limitations upon personal liberty. Consequently, the statement that personal liberty is "absolute," to have any meaning at all, must be limited in its application. That personal liberty may be absolute in certain relations is easily conceivable, and is, indeed a well-recognized fact.

For instance, there is the personal liberty of the mind (or of "conscience," as it is familiarly termed) and of the multifarious acts of daily life which are thus prompted. Indeed, it will probably be found that absoluteness of personal liberty is the rule and restrictions upon it the exception in ordinary affairs.

In general the personal liberty of the individual is restricted only so far as may be necessary to safeguard the personal liberty of other individuals. To say that personal liberty may be subordinated to the good of "society" is to destroy all meaning of the term. Personal liberty and social obligation are separate and distinct things.

Society may protect itself against acts of the individual which are in the nature of crimes against public order, private property, or individual persons, or which constitute a menace to health or morals. Such acts society may declare to be crimes and prohibit or punish accordingly.

But society may not, upon the single ground of public inconvenience or discomfort, prohibit or punish individual acts (whether committed by one person or by any number of persons) not in themselves recognized as crimes. To do so would be to make the personal liberty of the individual contingent not upon the personal liberty of other individuals but upon their comfort and convenience.

Under such construction personal liberty would cease to be a thing of any virtue or practical effect, and would become merely social liberty—a condition predicated upon the utter subversion of the individual to the collective principle of action.

The other comparisons drawn by "The Watchman" are equally wide of the mark. We agree entirely and unreservedly with the writer in his strictures upon those decisions of the courts in which the "right of private contract" is cited to nullify laws limiting the length of the woman's workday. But we submit that there is no proper comparison between a law which prohibits a woman from working more than a certain number of hours, and a law which would prohibit either men or women from ceasing to work at all.

On the contrary, these cases are entirely dissimilar. One is an exercise of the so-called police power for the protection of public health; the other is an assumption of authority to compel men to work against their will upon [illegible] other ground than that of public convenience.

It would seem that the distinction, in fact difference, between these propositions is so obvious as to preclude the possibility of confusion. In a word, the difference between the "right of private contract," as maintained by the courts, and the "right to quit work," as maintained by organized labor, is the difference between compulsory and voluntary labor.

The principle of shorter-workday legislation, so far from being a restriction of personal liberty, is in reality an affirmation and protection of the latter. Properly understood, a reference to such legislation in connection with the question of personal liberty affirms the general applicability of the latter condition and denies the contention of those who would reduce personal liberty to an "abstraction," pernicious or otherwise.

The obvious limitations upon personal liberty are recognized and freely admitted by the present writer. Moreover, these limitations are expressly stipulated in the statement quoted by "The Watchman." That statement begins as follows: "In the matter of giving or withholding labor, and in all circumstances other than those of military necessity, the right of personal liberty is inherent," etc. Thus it will be seen that the right of personal liberty is here asserted only in a certain connection, i. e., "in the matter of giving or withholding labor."

"The Watchman" seemingly ignores this important limitation and proceeds to argue from premises that are irrelevant and in themselves indisputable. There is but one question at issue between those who favor and those who oppose legislation restricting the right to quit work, namely, Is that right a matter involving society in the sense of being a public offense and therefore subject to public restriction or prohibition? or, is it a matter involving the individual in the sense of being inherent in the nature and necessities of Man and therefore exempt from restriction upon any theory of public necessity, comfort or convenience?

The present writer stands for the latter construction. If the personal liberty of a man to quit work at his own pleasure be an "abstraction," then Liberty itself is an abstraction and the Declaration of Independence and the Thirteenth Amendment merely so many empty words, signifying nothing.

While quoting Lincoln, let us remember his words upon a certain other occasion: "Thank God we live under a system in which, no matter what the pressure, it is possible to strike." Whatever may have been Lincoln's views upon other propositions, in this declaration he is certainly very clear and emphatic. The right to quit work was in Lincoln's mind not an abstraction but a concrete fact, a fact which he openly recognized and defended.

The right to quit work is the underlying fact of free society, the fact which gives stability to all other institutions of freedom, the fact which constitutes freedom, the fact upon which society has traveled in evolving itself out of chaos.

To repeat: "Public rights can not be based upon individual wrongs." The freedom of society can not be maintained by depriving the individual members thereof of rights that inhere in personal liberty.

Walter Macarthur.

San Francisco, Cal.

[Colonel Weinstock's measure did not deny the right of labor to quit work. Its purpose was to place upon it that modifying qualification which immemorial custom has sanctioned in the mutual custom of giving notice either of intent to quit or to discharge. It is as far from denying the right to quit or to discharge as can be imagined. The insistence upon the right to quit instanter, or to discharge likewise, is a war measure, not a social.

However, there is one fact that advocates of public ownership should reflect upon and it is that, under public ownership, no right of instant quitting with or without provocation, will be submitted to in the public name. Under such a system public servants will enlist for stated periods, as members of army and navy now do, and whoever exercises his alleged right to quit work without notice will find himself treated as a deserter if not as a mutineer. As institutions become quasi-public a quasi-enlistment is also not unlikely to be insisted on. The public interest is the sum of all the interests of all the people and the greater is always more than any of its parts. Labor is only one part of production. As such it has rights which must be respected, and the right to quit work is one of them, but, like all the rest, must be exercised with moderation and regard for the common welfare in which the welfare of labor is included.

Some of these "pernicious abstractions," are well nigh anti-social in their character and, as such, are not to be encouraged.—Editor The California Outlook.]

WANTED! MORE FARMERS

California needs more bona fide farmers, who will actually go upon the land, improve it and become producers. In other words California needs more producers. She has plenty of men who are consuming much and producing less than nothing. This is bad economics in general and particularly bad where there are thousands of acres awaiting development.

California has thoroughly advertised the fact that her climate is the most salubrious on earth, but she has not made enough of the fact that here almost anything that grows, if given cultivation and water, will excel the same product in any other place in the world. The combination of California soil, sunshine and water cannot be equaled.—Porterville Record.

Roosevelt's Tribute to Heney

In his talk at the luncheon given last Tuesday by Mr. E. T. Earl to Colonel Roosevelt, at which were present a number of the leaders of the Progressive movement in this State, the ex-President paid a striking tribute of regard and admiration to Francis J. Heney of San Francisco, who sat at the table near the great leader.

"I am glad to have everybody know just what I think of Mr. Heney," he said. "I worked with him for years and came to know him thoroughly; and it is a never-ending source of pride with me that I helped to bring him into public life. He has the qualities that this republic needs in its servants and men of affairs—courage, absolute integrity, determination, and devotion to an ideal. His honesty is of the pugnacious, aggressive, irresistible kind, and that is the sort we need everywhere. Let no one underestimate what he did in Oregon. In the times and under the circumstances, it was a stupendous piece of work. And of all people in the country you here in California should best know and most honor him."

The ex-President's words brought out long-continued and enthusiastic applause.

Regulations

The cry about "hurting business" whenever any proposal is made to regulate public service corporations, is only too familiar. Almost invariably, too, it takes the form of lamentation that it will be impossible to sell the bonds of the company. This comes from the active management of these corporations.

In the light of this familiar plaint, the contrary view, coming from bond brokers, is certainly refreshing, if not illuminating. In a pamphlet just issued by N. W. Halsey & Co., public service commissions to regulate these companies are favored as giving additional character and stability to the bonds of utility concerns. Halsey & Co. say on this subject:

One result of the growth of public service corporations has been the creation of commissions, with power to regulate the service furnished and the rates charged by these companies. The legislation creating these commissions came with the recognition of the fact that the public service corporations supply necessities of modern urban existence and that for this reason they are vitally important to the welfare of the people.

Commissions have been created in Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Missouri and Wisconsin and doubtless will before long be found in other states.

While the commissions were appointed primarily to protect the interests of the public the result of their supervision has been immensely to strengthen the securities of those corporations which were honestly capitalized and ably managed. The commissions have generally recognized that the public is best served when the company is protected and allowed to do a successful business. Especially noteworthy has been the protection afforded existing companies by the commissions against competitive attacks. The commissions have generally adopted the principle that where the service rendered by the existing company is adequate and where the rates charged are reasonable the invasion of its field by a new company will not be permitted.

Commissions have likewise in some instances authorized and directed increases in rates in order that the companies might earn a reasonable return upon the investment value of their property.

Usually commissions have control over the issuance of securities and where such is the case overcapitalization so fraught with danger to the investor, is impossible.

Investors who hold the bonds of conservatively capitalized and growing public service corporations serving substantial communities may feel that their securities are doubly protected if the issuing company operates under a public service commission.—Fresno Republican.

Roosevelt's Address

penter, and so forth. Now, we don't need any State interference as a rule between these and us, because they are about our size. If the grocer doesn't give us good things to eat, I will change the grocer. If we don't pay his bills, he changes us. And as there are a good many of us and several of him, we can always make the change—about the same size.

But now, supposing, to use the technical terminology of the profession, that the grocer becomes a captain of industry and earns and accumulates, I wish you would notice the distinction, saving millions of dollars. He joins with others like unto himself and makes a big corporation which owns—I don't care what it is—oil, a railroad, anything—a corporation perhaps, extending over a number of States. Now then, instead of having a man about our own size to deal with, we have a great artificial entity, so much bigger than any one of us that no one of us can deal with him. If we don't like the grocer, we can change. If the railroad is the only railroad in our neighborhood and we don't like to ship on it, we needn't ship at all. That's all. If we don't like what is given us by a great trust, a great combination, we can go without. That's all. And if the men working for them don't like the wages they are receiving, they can't go elsewhere. The market is closed to them.

In consequence, we have created a situation where, instead of dealing with individuals substantially on an economic equality with ourselves, we deal with an enormous industrial entity, so big that we separately and individually are utterly powerless before it. Therefore, we have to use, not the power of any one of us, but the collective power of all of us through the State, if the State alone can take action; and if it is in the inter-state commerce, then we have to use the power of the only individual bigger than the biggest corporation, and that is Uncle Sam.

Now, don't you see that the analogy I have drawn and the statement I have made is not a fanciful statement? It is absolutely accurate. You think it out, and you will see that what I have said expresses the exact truth and gives you the reason why we must have governmental power to deal with a big corporation, which is entirely unnecessary in dealing with a small tradesman or a small corporation, which is entirely unnecessary in dealing with each of us in his individual capacity.

Very good! Now, how ought Uncle Sam or the State government to behave towards the great corporations? He ought to behave just exactly as each of us does to the grocer.

If we don't pay the grocer enough to enable him to make a profit, either he will have to change and get other customers or he will have to go out of business. Isn't that fairly obvious? Exactly. Well now, if we don't allow the corporation to earn an ample return on its investment, we hurt, perhaps ruin, that corporation, and we put a stop to all other corporations going into business. Therefore, it is the duty of Uncle Sam, it is the duty of the national or State government, not merely from the standpoint of justice—which alone would be sufficient—but from the standpoint of popular self-interest, to see that the corporation gets a square deal; that the corporation is treated absolutely fairly. If there is any doubt as to whether it is being treated fairly, I would always construe the doubt in favor of the corporation. I would always give it the benefit of the doubt.

And if I were a public servant, having to deal with a corporation, and I thought justice required me to do a certain thing for it, I would do it, even if you recalled me immediately afterwards.

On the other hand, if, in dealing with your grocer and with every one else, you, in a fit of magnanimity, invariably declined to look at your bills, it doesn't speak as much for the goodness of your heart as for the softness of your head. And in the same way, it is not only the duty of the public official to see that the corporation gets full justice; it is his duty to see that the corporation does full justice.

The men that make big fortunes are just about like the rest of us in conscience. They are no better and they are no worse. There is a reasonable proportion of men among them who can't be induced to go wrong by any consideration. There is a reasonable proportion of men among them who can't be induced to go right, unless you make it evident that they will be punished if they don't go right. And there is a large class between, of people with good impulses, who aren't fit—mighty few people are fit—to be absolute tyrants: who aren't fit to escape all control and do whatever they think right with the rest of us. And for those I want efficient governmental regulation as a strong provocative towards virtue. I know they have good intentions, and I want to help out those good intentions by the aid of the government in every possible way.

I have told you, I think, substantially how I believe we should act toward corporations; that is, I have laid down the general principle that seems to me to be sound. I know that it is a work of infinite labor and difficulty to apply such a general principle in a great number of specific cases; and I ask of you people here, of you voters, this: When you have public officials whom you believe to be honest and intelligent and headed the right way, that you give them as cordial support as possible while they are engaged in the extraordinarily difficult task of achieving genuine self-government for all of you. They need your support. They need your help. Criticize them when they go wrong, but stand by them when they do right.

We Should Have a Public Credit Account

One of the chief difficulties in American life in the way of getting good public servants is the fact that too often we Americans keep only a debit account with our public servants. Now, I ask for a balance sheet. Now, I am not speaking jocosely. I am telling you a truth. Too often the only acts of a public servant that are commented upon by the public are those the public doesn't like.

Now, a forceful man is necessarily the only kind of man who can be the best public servant. You can't get very much good out of a weakling. You want a forceful man. A forceful man is sure to do a great many things, and some of those things will be things you don't like. He may make some mistakes. Now, hold the mistakes against him. Keep your debit account. But keep your credit account also. And it is because so often our people fail to do that that the habit has grown in nominating conventions to seek for a dark horse, to seek for some colorless creature who has never done anything wrong, because he has never done anything at all. And then you all put him in office with a whoop and then turn around and instead of blaming yourselves, blame the wretched creature himself because you have found him out. Whereas, really it is your own fault for having put him in.

Keep track of your public men who go wrong. Punish every public man who goes wrong, and make the man who does right feel that you understand and appreciate his having done right.

That is the way to get real efficient service.

And so, friends, in striving for progress, strive always for real progress. Don't take anything merely because somebody says it is progressive. And if a man demands that you go to an extreme, be perfectly sure that he is really ahead and not off to one side before you follow. Sometimes it is longitude and sometimes it is latitude that separates reformers.

Make haste and remember that you can't make much haste unless you go with reasonable slowness and caution. Test your ground so that when you take a step you won't have to retake it in order to take another in the right direction.

We are over the threshold of the twentieth century. Many great problems press for solution. Many great problems pose themselves before every civilized nation of the world. And no nation has greater problems than those which we face. We shall need all our wisdom, all power of self-control, in order adequately to face them.

Very rightly we have made up our minds that we are unfit to be called a free people unless we rule ourselves. Exactly as our forefathers threw off the rule of an alien king, we will throw off the rule of our home industrial kings today. But remember this: Government means control. No people can get on without control. And we can throw off control from without only if we exercise it from within.

People Must Be Vigilant

Somewhere there must be control, and my appeal is for liberty, for real liberty; and such liberty can only come if the average citizen exercises self-control, self-mastery. And remember, every republic of the past has fallen, without an exception, and almost always because that republic permitted control by the people to lapse and substituted for it control by a caste. It made no difference whether it was the caste of the wealthy or the caste of those who had no wealth; whether the governing class was composed of the "haves" or the "havenots"; whether power slipped into the hands of the wealthy men who used it to exploit the poor, or into the hands of poor men who used it to plunder the rich. In either case the end of the republic was near when once any body of its citizens did injustice to any other body.

Distrust the man who would seek to rivet on your wrists the shackles of corporate power, the shackles of privilege, of privileged interests; and distrust also the visionary, still more sinister demagogue, who seeks to gain power by inflaming one class of his fellow citizens against another class.

Draw the line between good and bad citizenship along the line that divides good conduct from bad conduct. And that line runs at right angle to the line of cleavage that separates men of wealth from the men of less wealth. You will find good men in every walk of life, and bad men in every walk of life; and shame to you if you fail to recognize the good in any man because he belongs to a particular class or condone the evil in any other man because he belongs to a particular class.

The corporation and the trade union are both necessary instruments of our modern industrial life. Each has at times done much good, and each has at times done evil. And be just as fearless in attacking the trades union when it goes wrong as in attacking the corporation when it goes wrong.

I remember once in a public meeting, when I was introduced as the friend of the laboring man, I said, "Yes, I would like you to amend that. I am the friend of the honest man. I am the friend of the laboring man who is straight, and if he is crooked I am against him."

Discard any plea as obviously insincere in its absurdity made by any people who are trying to persuade you that any one class monopolizes the virtue of the community or monopolizes the rights, either one.

And remember, that, evil though it is for the community to permit a great corporation to do what is wrong, to rule by corruption, it is exactly as evil to permit lawlessness and violence. There are many different kinds of assassins, and all of them are base; but the basest of all assassins is the assassin who tries to do his work through dynamite. He works in the darkness. Get at him if you can, and get at all who support and defend it if you can't get at him himself.

Remember that this country can no more exist if it submits to brutal lawlessness that takes the form of murder, than it can exist if it submits to brutal lawlessness that takes the form of arrogant organized greed.

This government is not and never shall be a government either of a mob or of a plutocracy. It is just as much your duty as honest citizens to war against one form of evil as it is to war against the other. I ask the citizens of this nation, as they get the power within their own hands and more and more the ability to work out their own fate—I ask them to remember that the Republic can endure only if it stands firmly on the foundation of justice and fair dealing, the equitable treatment as between man and man. The Republic can endure only so long as its citizens live in accordance with the great and immutable laws of righteousness, of the righteousness that redeemeth the nation.

"We did intend to."

"What made you change your minds?"

"The cook wouldn't leave."—Toledo Blade.

Geo Alexander

Mayor of Los Angeles

T. R. and the Hon. Phil.

WE LEARN from the newspapers that during his stay in Los Angeles Col. Roosevelt gave an audience to the Hon. Phil Stanton and a small and favored group of five or six of the latter's legislative colleagues that he brought along with him.

For the benefit of those whose political memories are short, we may explain that the Hon. Phil Stanton recently conducted a campaign for the Republican nomination for Governor, a campaign which was not taken seriously by anybody except its press agent, and he was a professional humorist. A careful analysis of the Stanton vote, made under a microscope at the end of the episode, seemed to indicate a purpose to draw enough ballots from Johnson, the present Governor of and for the people, to cause the nomination either of Curry, the "tough" candidate, or of Anderson, the S. P. candidate.

Inasmuch as those who had charge of the reception and entertainment of the ex-President were largely Republicans of the "Progressive" order—growing out of the fact that the officials of the party and of the city and of nearly all civic organizations are of that variety—it was not at all inappropriate that somewhere in the proceedings a chance should be given prominent survivors of the recent Retreat-from-Moscow, stand-pat expedition to tell the Colonel the sad story of their lives. The fact that each and every one of the legislative group had been savagely turned down by his constituents when seeking renewed political honor only served to accentuate their fitness as representatives of a Lost Cause.

We say the episode was commendable; and yet, in behalf of a whole cityful of self-respecting people, we must enter a protest against the Hon. Phil's presenting to the guileless Colonel—presumably as one of our representative citizens and stand-patters—a member of the River-bed Franchise Council. A visitor, no matter how big and famous he may be, is after all at the mercy of local entertainers in such a matter, and must meet all comers—unless he happens to know them—as the Colonel knew Lorimer.

All Los Angeles people know the significance of those fatal words—the "River-bed Franchise"; but for the benefit of citizens elsewhere in the State we may say that in 1906 Los Angeles had a City Council chosen by the S. P. and other corporations under the old regime. Suddenly, without a preliminary hint, this body granted to a local man—a dummy for a street car company—a lease of the river-bed, which President Ripley of the Santa Fe asserted was worth a million dollars. The city received no compensation whatever. The Mayor was out of the city, and the plot was to have the acting Mayor—a member of the Council—sign the contract. But the city clerk delayed about signing, and the city attorney, who had protested in the most vehement language against the transaction, discovered a flaw in the procedure of adoption. A second time the Council passed the measure, this time in the face of public disapproval that was almost a riot. But again the clerk refused to sign; the Mayor returned; operations for immediate recall terrified some members of Council, and the vote was reconsidered and annulled.

The City Clerk, Mr. Lelande, has since told, under oath, how Walter Parker, lobbyist for the Southern Pacific, offered him a thousand dollars to affix his signature to the grant. It is known that one of the Councilmen, an impecunious person, shortly after the event put ten thousand dollars in a Mexican land enterprise.

Thus River-bed Franchise Councilmen are regarded in Los Angeles in much the same way that Supervisors of the Schmitz regime are now regarded in San Francisco. The fact that the Hon. Phil Stanton saw fit to present one of them to the unknowing ex-President is a regrettable incident that is not to be passed over without comment.

Lives vs. Business

THE horrible disaster in New York City in which 140 lives were lost, coming soon after a similar event in Newark, will quicken public interest in the efforts that are being made by labor unions and civic organizations to secure the safety of workers in factories and stores. The local ordinances in most cities prescribe sufficient means of egress from high buildings when they are used for office purposes, and such buildings usually run little risk from fire. But the high buildings whose lofts or upper stories are used for factories contain great numbers of people, and even though the buildings themselves may be fire-proof, the stock and materials are likely to be highly inflammable and sometimes actually capable of explosion.

Fire Chief Croker of New York expresses himself as not at all surprised at the Washington Square disaster, and says he has frequently predicted that unless special fire escapes were provided for the buildings crowded with workers some such horrid catastrophe would certainly occur. If the inside facts ever come to the surface, it will probably be found that such a change in the ordinance was urgently demanded time and again by organizations and officials, and that it was invariably headed off by property interests protesting against the expense. No doubt that particular ordinance will now be passed in New York, and possibly, under the stress of public indignation, it may go through in some other places. But it needed this terrible holocaust to wake up the people and terrify the officials into action.

We have in this, as in a thousand other matters of legislation, the old question of the relative value of human life and the property interest. The civil war put an end to the direct ownership of one man over another because the latter was a black man, and we are now in the midst of a great civil conflict, bloodless but none the less determined, to break the ownership of one man over another through the latter's poverty. Our politics and our laws, our court procedure and even our public sentiment, have all united to put the rights of property above the rights of men, and thus through the medium of property ownership establish a form of slavery. If the girl who worked in the dangerous factory complained, she was told she was entirely free to go elsewhere. A freedom that is a mockery! And property not only refused to protect the lives thus committed to its care but even fought off legislation that would compel it to do its duty.

If these poor girls had died one at a time, as they die everywhere from other causes that grow out of the system, it would not have aroused the public conscience. Statistics that tell of 140 girls dying from bad sanitation in factories are tiresome and we are not interested; but the terrible story of these girls jumping from an eight-story building to the pavements beneath thrills us with horror and we demand instant action.

Open the Court Records

Divorce proceedings are often delectably nice and nasty, affording dainty bits of ptomaine wherewith news-mongers may regale consumers of social carion, and in so far as this is so publicity of divorce proceedings is to be regretted. Nevertheless, all such proceedings should be public from start to finish. Publicity lets in light and air, and light and air destroy germs of divorce as certainly as of other malignant maladies. There are cases where the uses of health require surgery as well as sanitation and medication. Very well, let the knife be wielded in such cases, expeditiously and effectively, but not in the dark. Even in such cases darkness is dangerous and light and air conducive to health. The more publicity the less gangrene and contagion. Open the divorce records. Only those will suffer humiliation who deserve to.

One Use for Capital Punishment

The punitive theory of a life-for-a-life is only one degree removed from that primitive code which obtained under the system of group responsibility wherein the crime of an individual was expiated by his whole family being put to death if not his whole clan or tribe. It is a barbarism and should be done with except in the cases of now and again a congenital degenerate with homicidal mania who will be a menace to his keepers so long as he may live. Such beings should be executed as dogs are executed when afflicted with rabies, if not always in the same manner. California has perhaps had one such in a decade, scarcely more. As for the rest, imprisonment in a real prison under the silent system with the pardoning power strictly limited will be death enough to satiate any public appetite except that for blood, a morbid appetite at best that were best to go unsated.

TWO IMPRESSIONS OF ROOSEVELT

Roosevelt in a Pansy Bed

LOOKED down upon from above, the eight- to ten-thousand audience that, at this writing, has four times listened to Theodore Roosevelt resembled nothing else so much as a huge bed of many-colored pansies in full blossom, so variegated is the coloring of the clothing which people wear and the parasols they carry. Notwithstanding the vast capacity of the Greek amphitheater at Berkeley, other thousands came and went away, or lingered outside, not able to find standing-room. It was not curiosity that brought them there to sit upon the concrete seats an hour before the lecture and to listen to a lecture for another hour, enduring the crush and jam of getting in and out and the perpendicular press of getting to and from, on the trolley cars. It may be doubted, too, if it was love that brought them, such love for instance as the likeness of Lincoln arouses in the heart of every American and of half the people of Europe every time their eyes rest upon it. What was it?

Certainly it was not the profundity of wisdom, the striking phrase-making, the stately periods, the glowing metaphors, the eloquence of the speaker. His addresses do not abound in quotable expressions. There is little of poetic fancy or of rhythm in his style. There are in his speeches no meteoric bursts of eloquence. He could not have filled the place of Lincoln in the debates with Douglas nor of Webster in the debate with Hayne. As a platform orator Tom Fitch, General W. H. L. Barnes, Henry Edgerton, Newton Booth could, any of them, in the days of their power, have beaten him to a frazzle, and yet Theodore Roosevelt, the "statesman out of a job," this man with a "finished career," can fill the Greek Theater to the limits of standing room, and leave other thousands outside, as often as he will consent to speak to the people those homely elemental preachments of his at which the elite langh. There is not another man in the United States who can do it more than once and mighty few who can do it even one time. Why is it that he can?

Partly that he might, if fortune favored, be the better able to answer this question (and for the further reason that there was standing-room nowhere else), the writer of this, on Sunday last, stationed himself immediately in front of the speaker's stand and stood upright upon the pavement at not five paces distant, for two mortal hours, for half the time looking into the Roosevelt face and down the Roosevelt throat. He saw the words form themselves in his mouth, rough but well rounded and complete, and then shot forth as from a catapault. What Colonel Roosevelt said about the Bible added little to the store of knowledge of this listener. He had learned more of the Bible in a half hour in a Bible class two hours before than Roosevelt had to tell him. The vast throng was not entranced. It was not spell-bound. It was wrought up to no pitch of uncontrollable enthusiasm, but it listened and it would have listened unmoved for another hour. The face of the speaker contorted, his ivories showed as far back as his wisdom teeth and not a molar or cuspid is missing. His fist clenched and his jaws snapped together like those of a rock-crusher. He is no Apollo Belvedere. Personal beauty is not the source of his enchantment. Where, then, is the secret of his power? The writer of this was a third time putting this question to himself, without hope for an answer, when an exuberant woman a few removes away furnished forth the answer with unpremeditated acumen. "I declare," she said, "every fiber of that man's being radiates sincerity and truth. I call that nation rich that possesses one such man, only one, and I love my country because it takes this man into its confidence."

There, as this writer verily believes, is a full, satisfying answer to the oft repeated question, wherein lies Theodore Roosevelt's hold on the American people? It lies in his unswerving integrity of mind and in that quality of prepotency that fertilizes every word-germ he utters and makes it fruitful. He is alive. He is an engine with steam up. He is a doer, hammerer if one please, as was General Grant. He is neither meek nor lowly, nor is he puffed up or proud. His type of Christian is the clean and honorable man who cherishes no grudges and yet who, if hustled on the street, will make it extremely likely that the hustler will take care to hustle someone else next time.

A marvelous man this Theodore Roosevelt, surcharged with life, resourceful, sincere, country-loving, yet loving humanity more. To speak of him as a has-been, as a man with a finished history, is to betray an imbecility of discernment. If heaven spares his life, as it seems likely to, Theodore Roosevelt will do more of history-making than he has done up to now. And it will be history worth the making, too.

A. J. P.

His Optimism

ONE of the reasons why the people love him and believe in him and stand by him, even when they are dubious about the wisdom of the particular thing he is doing or saying at the time, is that he has such an overwhelming optimism, so much hope and confidence, and that, in spite of all the hard knocks of a long public life, he is so completely free from anything that is morose, suspicious or cynical.

After all it is the most perfect test of the wholesomeness of a man's soul, this ability to go through fighting and disappointment and success and the routine of hard work, and to be misjudged and lied about and lied to, to know the worst about people, to understand the cruelty of mere things, to size up the world for good and bad from the vantage-point of high authority, and then be thrown down where the whole thing rolls over you and grinds you into the dust—to go through all this, and yet never lose the power of infinite hope with which Heaven has endowed every soul that is sent to labor in this vale of despond.

Who is the arch criminal of this age—of all ages? The man who is without hope—cynic, pessimist, call him what you will—and who, being thus bereft, seeks, by a horrid law of nature, to destroy all hope in others; by the same law, perhaps, as that which makes the most deadly diseases the most infectious. What Cassio says of the purse and the reputation may be said of life and hope: for he who takes life may perhaps be taking that which is of no value, but he who blasts hope in a man destroys the very well-spring of his whole existence—the very soul of his soul. And you may know this type of being and distinguish him from the mere fault-finder or the alarmist by his frequent use of these phrases: "What is the use?" "It has always been so and always will be." "What's the difference." "It can't be done." "These reformers are just as bad as all the rest of them."

There is none of that stuff in the philosophy of T. R. His whole career has been a living, breathing, fighting demonstration of what is the use. When, as a young man, fresh from college and full of enthusiasm for reforming things, he plunged into New York politics and made his way into the legislature, without doubt there were scores of his cynical New York friends who told him that it was useless, and that he had better live quietly and comfortably on his income, or else devote his energies to the noble art of getting rich. But before the Legislature adjourned, the whole State knew young Mr. Roosevelt and recognized in him the embodiment of courage, honesty and efficiency in public work, and the statute book bore many marks of his tenacious purpose. When, some years later, he ran for Mayor of New York City and was defeated by Tammany, there were plenty to warn him that politics was no business for a gentleman, and that he had better give it up as a bad job. But no defeat could impair the firmness of his optimism; and his belief that the right must ultimately succeed triumphed over every doubt that was begotten of failure.

Ingersoll once boasted that if he had been regulating affairs on this earth he would have made good health catching instead of bad. To which Beecher responded that good health was catching, was more catching, in fact, than disease, the proof of which was that the human race had survived through the ages and had steadily increased in number. Let us be thankful that optimism, also, is "catching," more infectious than pessimism, and the proof of that lies in the story of the conquest of the world by man, that he has done those things that "could not be done," that he has achieved success on many a path marked with an unbroken line of failure.

More than any other man who has grown up with this generation has Theodore Roosevelt spread the sentiment of hope and of optimism among men. He came into our affairs when we were as a people sodden with the lust of gain and bewildered with false notions of prosperity. There were plenty who could tell us what was wrong and what needed to be done, but they left us in despair at the magnitude and difficulty of the problem. It was the peculiar function of this man, endowed as he was with a vast fund of enthusiasm and faith, qualities that we knew had been through the long fire of experience and had stood the test, to communicate to the whole American people something of his practical, working optimism. He did enough to show what could be done, and he put heart into all for the great struggle that is before us.

They Did the Best That They Knew How

So much at least can be said for the Thirty-ninth session of the Legislature of California. The effective majority did the best that they knew how and the reactionary minority was not able to hinder them over much. For one, The Watchman has desired that something be left for the fortieth session of the Legislature to do; he has wanted two years given for the sentiment of the State to catch up and, for this reason, he believes it just as well that constitutional charges to bring about the short ballot go over to that Legislature. There is a great work, if not exactly of public education, at least of public explanation, to be done before The People will be ready for another advance without, in the meantime, suffering reaction. With early in the fall a special election on the constitutional amendments just submitted, and an extra session of the Legislature early next year to put those amendments into operation, the first year of Governor Johnson's term will be filled about as full of deeds done and good things accomplished as any four years among his predecessors. The public mind was right for it, he had a Legislature with him and a glorious record was made. How hard they have worked for it! And how closely the Governor has stayed with his job! Flesh and blood could do no more than Governor and Legislature have done. For the public to fail of appreciating this splendid service were a dereliction of public duty.

Limit of Knowledge

It is no disparagement of a legislator to say of him that he often legislates concerning things about which he has no adequate knowledge, although the adequacy of the knowledge of many legislators is less ample than is creditable. The range of modern legislation is too broad for any one mind to cover. The helplessness of the Legislature in the face of the tax issue, while unfortunate, was not culpable. There is only one remedy for this difficulty and it is to employ, and lean upon, expert advice in all those matters in relation to which legislative knowledge is inadequate. Legislators are loth to do this and there is where they make a mistake. When Engineer Hood laid out the line of the Southern Pacific over Tehachapi mountain he was unable, from his drawings and explanations, to make Huntington, Stanford and Crocker understand how he proposed to get over that mountain, but did they refuse to allow him to proceed until they could understand his plans? No, they said, "Drive ahead, young man. (He was young then). We'll back you." It is safe to say that Prof. Carl Plehn knows more about taxation than the combined knowledge on that subject of the hundred and twenty legislators, and even he does not know all about it, for the problem has not yet been anywhere near worked out to a finality. We must feel our way along to juster taxation measures. Meantime, there is but one course open to our Legislators. They should avail themselves of the best expert information they can get, accept it and drive ahead. Some of the results attained may prove unfortunate, but there can be no misfortune like tinkering taxation wholly in the dark. In not relying more fully upon the Taxation Commission and the State Controller the Legislature erred.

Learn and Unlearn

If the constitutional amendments submitted are to be disposed of on their merits we, as a people, shall have to keep our minds busy betwixt now and the tenth of October. In doing this there is nothing more important than to preserve an open mind for the consideration of all issues. One line of cleavage is likely to run through the whole body politic from end to end. It will separate those who want things as they are from those who want things as they ought to be. So called prudent, practical people, people who keep out of debt, prosper and grow old with dignity, are likely to line up on the side of things as they are, while persons who give less attention to their own business than to "causes," who let their own interests take care of themselves while they devote themselves to the interests of the public—such persons are likely to be for the amendments and for them with great enthusiasm and earnestness. The class first mentioned hold fast to that which is good, the second class reaches out for that which is better. Without them the world would mark time and know no such word as progress. The October election should especially appeal to young Californians. They should be what their fathers were, rather than what they are, for age accentuates conservatism, whereas the spirit of the argonaut should fire the imaginations of our native sons and make them willing to hazard new fortunes for their native State. Let every man who has a voice speak to the people that they go forward. With advancing years learning new things becomes increasingly difficult and the conservative mind finds it even more difficult to unlearn old things than to learn new. Therefore we shall have a busy time making ready for the October election.

Regrettable Limitations

There are certain ultimate tests of true statesmanship to which few men, either in Congress or Legislature, are able to submit themselves with satisfactory results, and one of these is the foregoing of a present, attractive advantage in loyalty to a sound principle. The progressives in Congress, in fighting shy of Canadian reciprocity, in defference to local political sentiment, sacrificed a larger percentage of public confidence in their sincerity and patriotism than their cause could afford to lose, and, in neglecting and refusing to so amend the direct primary law of this State as to allow next year a free and full opportunity directly to elect delegates to the national conventions, with advisory instructions, mistake was made. To be sure no one of the reactionary minority is in a position to bite the thumb at our progressives for so doing, for Wright and Wolfe and Curtin are responsible for the obnoxious provision being in the law in the first place. Nevertheless, it will not be satisfactory to the voting public next year to have nothing direct to say or do about sending delegates to the national conventions. It counts for little that the other fellows, in our places, would have done as our people have done, for more is expected of our side than of the other, and failure to measure up to expectations hurts us worse. Besides, some of our friends did not seem to understand clearly that it is not the State conventions of last year that will elect delegates to the national conventions next year. It is the county conventions and not the State that hold over. The county conventions of last year will next year elect delegates to a new State convention which, in turn, will elect delegates to the national conventions. That there are some extenuating considerations which may be urged to justify nonaction in this particular cannot be denied, but not one of them would have been permitted to stand in the way of reforming that provision of the primary law had the other fellows been as sure of controlling the next State conventions as our fellows now are. The blunt truth is that a present attractive advantage has, most regrettably, outweighed loyalty to a fundamental progressive principle that the will of the people shall find ample means of expression whenever the people have a will that they wish to express. About this time in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twelve The People of California will have such a will that they will wish to express and no adequate way of expressing it will have been afforded them. The ghost of this bit of politics will rise to plague us.

Bulletin Boards, Private Rights

The Legislature did some good in enacting that bulletin boards shall not be erected on public property or on private property without the owner's consent, but that is not going far enough. It were better to enact that bulletin boards shall not be erected on private property without public consent. Of course that would precipitate a nice fight, but there are few things nicer than a nice fight, the more especially when it is being waged for what is right. It has ever been held, in ethics if not in law, that no man owns the landscape. If no man owns it then no man has a right to disfigure it and every bill board that was ever erected was a disfigurement. To deny the right of an owner to lease or sell bulletin board privileges on his own land would, of course, be an invasion of those "constitutional guarantees," which we have made a fetish to haunt us at every step along the forward way, but the time will come when that right will be denied and when every barn painted over with quack medicine advertisements will either be painted out by the owner or pulled down by the police. His children are not going forever to permit God's wonderful, beautiful world to be made hideous for a price. A beginning has been made, but the public should not be content with anything short of making effective the principle that no landowner owns the landscape or has a right needlessly to disfigure it.

Employers' Liability

Perhaps no better thing has been done by the Legislature than the enactment of an employers' liability law, and the Roseberry bill, as The Watchman understands it, is conservative, reasonable and a substantial remedy for the wrong which a brutal corporate power has, for fifty years, inflicted upon those who toil, especially in operating trains and machinery. The cost of unavoidable accidents should be borne by the industry as part of its operating expense. The cost of avoidable accidents should be assessed against those employers who are culpably careless in not affording needed protection. Whenever an injury has been inflicted the offsetting compensation should be automatically fixed, as in accident insurance, so much for an arm, a leg or a life, and not be dependent upon the whim of a jury or the activities of a pettifogger. It will take time to try the Roseberry measure out but, again, a good beginning has been made, a beginning that never could have been begun under the old system of Southern Pacific domination.

An Indictment Of Employers

The fact that the Legislature found it necessary to enact a woman's working-day bill, and a bill providing that railroad dispatchers and trainmen shall not be required to work longer than sixteen hours at a stretch, or thereafter until such workmen have had at least eight hours of rest, serves to show with how little satisfaction the welfare of the weak can be committed to the care of the strong. That there should be need of any such legislation constitutes a standing indictment of employers, and yet not one amelioration of the condition of labor was ever conceded by employers, as a class, save as extorted from them

A WONDERFUL OLD MAN

By PAUL POWELL

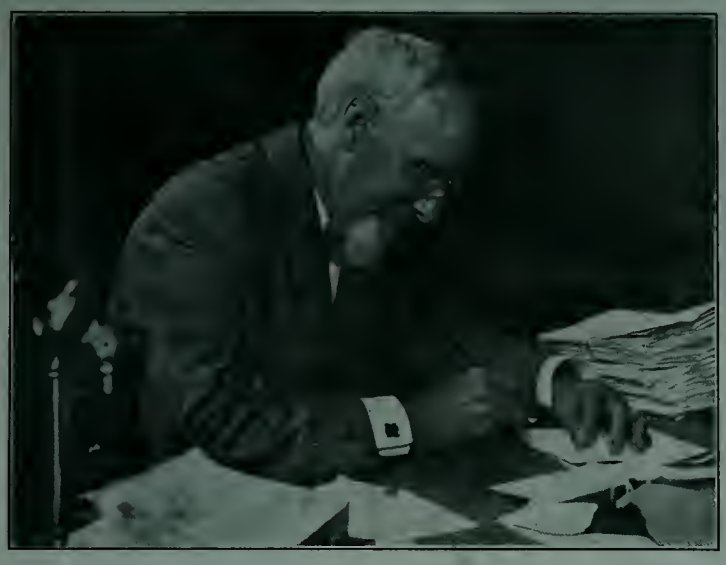
Through age[illegible]
He was [illegible] of limb,
None of the youth could cope with him,
Nor the foes which he singly kept at bay
Outnumbered his hairs of white and gray."

There ought to be a statute against the indiscriminate use of superlatives.

Exaggeration is a failing common to so many writers and speakers that the person with a justifiable excuse for the superlative now finds it robbed of its efficacy because of much abuse. Consequently, before he can lay the desired stress on the transcendent thought he has to communicate, he is obliged to invent some ruse whereby to concentrate attention on his idea and get it accepted at the value he wants it to have.

Such an artifice is this preface to the following statement put forward with cool calculation to be accepted without qualification or modification, viz:

George Alexander, Mayor of Los Angeles, is one of the most remarkable men in public life.



Here he is, a man having attained and passed the scriptural age of three score years and ten, more active and more useful than at any other period in a long, active and unusually useful life.

He was past seventy before one of those barbarous contraptions of civilization that he calls a "plug" hat ever adorned his head. His first silk hat also ushered in the period of the first dress suit and the first frock coat. These he terms his "society clothes," and though he was a little dubious about them before he made his first appearance in public life there isn't a man in town who wears them with more grace or as if he had a better right. When his official duties compelled him to don formal dress he did it with as much cheerful alacrity as he shouldered a musket and went to the war half a century ago, and one fitted him with as much credit to himself as the other.

He Plays Ball

No man is old so long as he is able quickly and efficiently to adapt himself to changing circumstances—so long as he is progressive. One of the earliest but most characteristic signs of superannuation is the habit of weighing and comparing the things of the past and the things of the present and giving the greater value to the things of the past.

The way your Uncle George took to a long tailed coat shows how far he comes from being a back number.

He is fast friends with the newspaper reporters who represent the several daily newspapers at the city hall. Nearly every day he has them in for a half hour's chat on city affairs and for an exchange of ideas. Many of the Mayor's views are so advanced that the newspaper men affect to regard them as too radical to be accepted and this pretense has grown into a standing joke. The new order of things, the nation-wide progressive movement, finds him well up toward the front. There are many respectable old fogies in this community ten or fifteen years his junior who haven't changed the ideas they acquired twenty-five years ago.

When a citizens' committee approached him two years ago and invited him to became a candidate against a mayor whose recall was being sought, few people, even among his best friends, expected him to show any extraordinary ability as chief executive. He had some doubt himself and it was three days before he yielded.

He had held various public offices of minor importance and had always filled them satisfactorily, but the duties were not thought to have any relation to the duties of Mayor. For several terms he had been a member of the Board of Supervisors and his record there for honesty, square dealing, ceaseless activity and great moral, as well as occasional physical courage, was the real reason for his selection. But even his work as a Supervisor, excellent as it was, did not seem necessarily to fit him for the other work. The occasion was one when it seemed that a man of his characteristics might be able to hold things level until there could be a general readiustment of municinal affairs and until the people could decide what they wanted to do. It was the intention of Mayor Alexander and of his friends that if elected he should serve out the unexpired portion of the other man's term and leave the government in good shape for the next administration.

Within thirty days after he became Mayor, Uncle George demonstrated that no better man could have been found. Day by day as he grew more accustomed to his new duties he displayed greater fitness for them. Long before the nine months had passed it became apparent that if the people fared further to find a mayoralty candiate at the fall election they surely would fare no better and might do worse.

They sought no further but returned him triumphantly to office though he did not seek the honor, sticking industriously to his desk all through the campaign, to the great dissatisfaction of his campaign committee.

Since he has been Mayor he has surprised everyone who has come in contact with him. He has been constantly on the job, one of the first to show up in the morning and one of the last to leave at night. There have been police commission sessions and other meetings that have kept him at the city hall often until after midnight, and many banquets and other public affairs that he has found it impossible to avoid. Despite the hard work, the long hours and the worry over public matters—a factor of no little importance in making the position an exceedingly trying one—he has actually grown more vigorous and has seemed to grow younger under the grind. When he goes home tired out at night he thinks he would like it if he were free from the responsibility and did not have to return next day, but when he goes out fresh and ready to catch the car at the corner next morning he feels sure there is no greater fun than being Mayor.

His mind is clear and acts quickly. His decisions are prompt and seldom need modification in the light of more mature deliberation. He has shown initiative and quickness of comprehension. In fact few minds are able, as his is, to grasp quickly and accurately the essential elements of a complicated situation.

One day his secretary laid on his desk a long obscure bond contract, filled with legal phraseology and involved provisions covering many improbable contingencies. The average individual might have devoted half a day to the discovery of what it was about. The Mayor analyzed it in less than five minutes. "Say that we cannot consider this," he said. "It isn't favorable to the city. The old contract is better." And so it proved to be when the City Attorney prepared digests of the two contracts and they were compared.

A master of English and of literary style who could transfer the Mayor's personality to the printed page would confer a rich boon on literature. As a lovable and picturesque character it would be hard to find his equal. In his homely humor, his plain simple ways, his rugged features and his intimate relation with the ordinary plain people there is a strong resemblance to the Lincoln type. His quaint little tuft of stiff white whiskers projecting from the point of his chin and surmounted by a straight mouth and clean shaven upper lip, and above that the prominent nose make the familiar picture of that personification of the national government — Uncle Sam.

In politics he is an insurgent Republican with the emphasis as strongly on the insurgent as it is possible to put it. This again is surprising in a man of his age—that he should not be a Republican of the rock-ribbed "my-party-right-or-wrong" variety. One should remember that

Glad Rags

George Alexander was a Republican in the time of Abraham Lincoln; that by early association he was steeped, saturated, impregnated with Republicanism; that when he was in a period of his life which would be called his "prime," if he be not actually in his prime now, party loyalty was put above every other consideration; and that most of his contemporaries are still voting straight tickets, national and local, in the firm

Sacramento, March 28. — Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 6, introduced by Senator Lester G. Burnett of San Francisco, which is identical with the amendment introduced into the lower house by Assemblyman Sutherland of Fresno, has passed both houses of the Legislature and is now in the hands of Governor Johnson. It amends Section 22 of Article 12 of the Constitution of California, which is the section establishing the State Railroad Commission and defining its powers.

Under the Constitution of 1879, unchanged today so far as concerns this particular section, the Railroad Commission is an elective body chosen one from each of the three railroad commission districts of the State. By the Burnett-Sutherland amendment the office of Railroad Commissioner becomes appointive instead of elective, with the power of appointment vested in the Governor, the number of commissioners changed from three to five and appointed at large instead of elected by districts. The commissioners elected last fall would serve out their term together with two added by appointment, to hold office until the expiration of the term of the present incumbents, when five new commissioners would be appointed, one to hold office until January 1, 1917, two until January 1, 1919, and two until January 1, 1921. Upon the expiration of those terms of office their successors would be appointed for terms of six years each.

The act of the majority of the commission, when in session, will be the act of the commission, under the proposed amendment. Each commissioner may conduct any investigation, inquiry or hearing and may make an order respecting the matter under investigation, which order shall be deemed the order of the commission when approved by it.

One of the most important provisions of the amendment—indeed, most persons believe it to be the most important of all—confers upon the commission full authority to fix the actual rate of charges for transportation of passengers and freight by transportation companies as distinguished from the maximum rate, so that the question which so agitated the Legislature of 1909 as to whether this section of the Constitution permitted the commission to establish a fixed or certain rate or whether the commission was empowered merely to fix the highest rate to be charged, the transportation company being permitted to charge less (this is known as the "maximum rate"), will be definitely determined in favor of the fixed rate.

Control of Public Utilities

In addition, by this amendment the Railroad Commission will be vested with the power to regulate and control all public service corporations furnishing public utilities, such as light, heat, power, water, telephone and telegraph companies; and under the provisions of Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 47 and Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 39, identical measures, amending Section 23 of Article 12 of the Constitution, introduced by the same lawmakers, the Legislature will be empowered to enact laws requiring the Railroad Commission to regulate and control any commercial railroad, interurban railroad, street railroad, canal, pipe line, plant or equipment, or any part of such railroad, etc., within this State, for the transportation or conveyance of passengers, freight or express matter, including crude oil, or for the transmission of telephone or telegraph messages, or for the production, generation, transmission, delivery or furnishing of heat, light, water or power or for the furnishing of storage or wharfage facilities, either directly or indirectly, to or for the public, and every common carrier.

It is provided, however, in the amendment to Section 23 of Article 12, that the various cities and towns may retain control of their public utilities by a majority vote of those voting at an election to be held according to law to be enacted by the Legislature next succeeding the adoption of the amendment. Until such election the various cities retain complete control of their various public utilities. If at such an election they relinquish control of any public utility, such as gas, water, etc., and afterwards are dissatisfied with the regulation of such utility by the Railroad Commission, for any reason whatsoever, the municipality, by a majority vote of the qualified electors, may reinvest itself with the control of such utility.

It is the belief of most of those who have given the subject careful study that the appointment of the members of the commission will more certainly produce a board of experts. The lengthening of the term of office, together with the fact that but two commissioners can be appointed every two years, makes for stability.

This system is in vogue in the State of New York, whose Public Service Commission is a great success, and also in Wisconsin, where the most advanced legislation on this subject has been effected, and whose Railroad Commission, which has the very functions intended to be given to that of the State of California, is a shining example of official work well done.

A Young Man with Backbone

Senator Bryant of San Francisco is the youngest member of the upper house. His legislative experience—in fact his experience in public life—has been limited to such as he has enjoyed since the opening of the present session of the Legislature. There was some speculation among the progressive leaders as to what his attitude would be in the big issues, but doubts as to his intentions were soon removed. His record has been one to which he may justly "point with pride."

Bryant is frail, physically, but he has a pretty rigid backbone. This has been demonstrated on various occasions, one of the most recent of which transpired last week when Senator Curtin endeavored to amend one of the conservation bills by changing from twenty-five to forty years the term for which the State might lease water privileges to the big power companies.

When the roll was first called Bryant voted against the amendment. Several of the Senators who stand with big business when they dare, tried to break him down, but he withstood all their blandishments and stuck to his determination to oppose one of the rottenest propositions submitted to the late Legislature. Bryant is a rare bird among the San Francisco delegation.

Watchdog Thompson

If California had more Newton W. Thompson's in the Senate there would be little necessity for worry as to the course of legislation. No man in either house has been more alert when attempts to sneak through undesirable measures have been made. Senator Thompson likewise has been a tower of strength for Lieutenant-Governor Wallace, rendering him effective service at times when, through greatly involved parliamentary procedure, the Senate has been on the verge of chaos. On more than one occasion Senator Thompson has demonstrated great skill as a parliamentarian, though this is but his second term in the Senate. He is a watchdog that should be kept in good political health.

For Educational Purposes

Unless Governor Johnson interposes a veto to a bill drawn by Assemblyman Bohnett of Santa Clara County and passed by both houses of the Legislature, the Secretary of State, hereafter, one year after the adjournment of the Legislature, must have printed a sufficient number of all propositions and constitutional amendments which are to be submitted to a vote of the people at the ensuing general election, to supply each institution of higher learning with twenty-five copies and each high school and each grammar school with ten copies thereof. So far as I am able to learn, the State of California is the pioneer in this movement toward the better education of the voters—provided voters will go to the school libraries and study the subjects upon which they will be called upon to pass.

On the Qui Vive

The session of 1911 has ended, and but one thick-skinned senator has called Franklin Hichborn, legislative historian, to order for his strictures on said senator. Thus has a new precedent been established.

Hichborn was the freest journalist free-lance attending the legislature. He thinks freely and expresses his convictions with equal freedom. He is not a giant in stature, but he has some proportions when it comes to nerve. Paying no attention whatever to the routine of legislative history, he kept his eye on the high places. The Sacramento Bee, which is the vehicle of his thought, is easily the most dreaded and the most respected daily published in the northern part of the state—according to whether the legislator who is the subject of comment is on the level or otherwise. Most of them, by the way, respect and do not fear the Bee or Hichborn. They know they will get from him as square a deal as they get from Lieutenant-Governor Wallace or Speaker Hewitt. But there was upon the floor of the senate one or two political derelicts who would like to see Hichborn almost anywhere except in his corner of the senate chamber, with his eyes and his ears and his analytical mind in fine working order every minute of the day, for they know from relatively recent history that the youngish man with the independent stride reads them through and through and fears not.

Hichborn will publish a history of the present legislative session. I am curious to know what his general scheme this year will be, but he simply smiles when the subject is broached to him. He has up his intellectual sleeve something worth while, there is no doubt of that. Fortunately there are in the present body few who, like a certain member of the last legislature from Los Angeles, subscribed for a copy of the history of the session of 1909 "just to see how far Hichborn's personal animosity would carry him," or words to that effect.

I imagine Hichborn's 1911 work will be constructive, just as his 1909 work was destructive—destructive of political vice as found in the legislative workshop that year.

No, it is not the name of a new breakfast food, nor a comic supplement puzzle. It is only an exercise in pronunciation. You see, the trouble is this, the light and buxom gentleman who represents the Thirty-ninth district in the Senate of California spells his name Estudillo. But he is a descendant of the proud and hotty dons, and does not relish it when his gross Germanic, Celtic, Gallic and Hebraic confreres in the Senate proceed to euchilsda the true sonnding of his name by calling it "Estu-dill-o," as if he were one of Heinz's 57 varieties and about the sourest product of the whole pickle works. For the truth is that the Honorable Miguel Estudillo is the original candy kid with the sticky front, when it comes to sweetness of disposition, in all the membership of the Legislature. And even where the milk of human kindness in his breast was left too long in the crock and has taken on a tang of acid, the massive Miguel refrains from showing it, because he is the soul of Castilian chivalry, the cosy compendium of all those things that Lord Chesterfield wrote about his son in longhand and simultaneously slipped over onto a guileless public by way of the Ladies Home Journal, where they have since found an obscure resting place or grave—in brief, a Bok bier. Anyway, Senor M. Estudillo is a gentleman, and the Senate of California is proud of him and intends to keep him therefor, because gentlemen are scarce enough anywhere, while in the Senate of California they are simply———

As we were saying, it cannot be denied that he is one of our most substantial citizens and Senators. He is not, as Senator Cutten recently said of his friend Senator Birdsall, "a continent of flesh." No, that would be putting it stronger than the facts warrant. A calm and unprejudiced estimate of Senator Estudillo's territorial dimensions leads us to believe that they would not exceed a township in size, or at most a supervisorial district.

And this leads us to exactly the point at which we should have started this narrative is the editor had not wanted the preceding space filled up with something: viz., that Senator Estudillo, like the gallant gentleman he always is, escorted the Wyllie local option bill through the Senate. If anybody among our readers thinks that this was a mere social promenade, calling only for the courage of a tea-table veteran—if, I say, anybody thinks the Wyllie bill needed only a ladylike chaperon, he, she, or it should have seen the horrific host of howling hyenas that went for that bill when it first stepped its timid foot upon the Senate floor. From Joshua's journeys against the infidels to the Battle of the Boyne there has been war, but this was Sherman's commentaries on the March from Atlanta to the Sea, unexpurgated.

But Don Miguel rose to the heights demanded by the occasion, or spread to the breadths—whichever way you think is aptest. Anyhow he took that timid but wily bill by the hand and said, "Gentle stranger, I see you are in straits. Come with me, and I'll shield you from harm." You can readily comprehend that there might be worse shields, but no matter about that. The point is that Don Miguel led the way and the wily bill followed. The rest that followed is a hazy recollection, but when the dust settled after the first sortie it looked as if the delegation from Orange county had gotten into the eighth ward on St Patrick's Day by mistake. The local option bill was amended so that it drank whiskey like a reprobate and almost swore. In this condition it returned to its father in the Assembly and he gave it a spanking and sent it back to the Senate to take the Keeley cure.

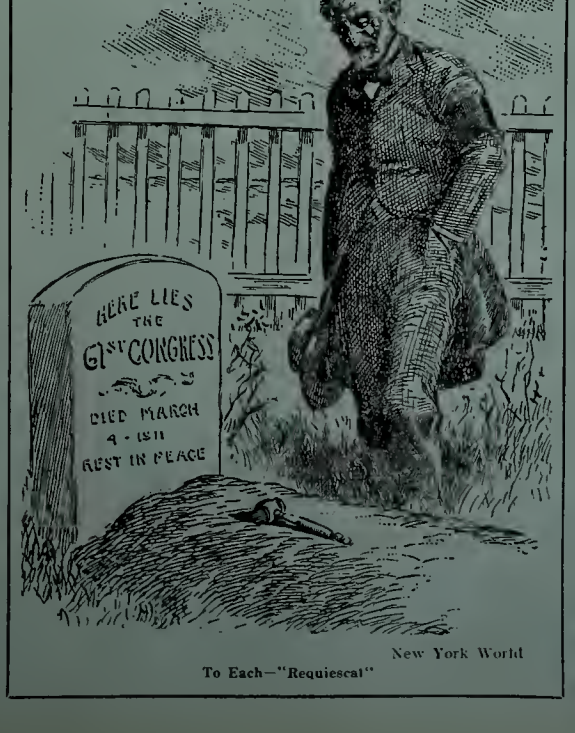
At this point the bill was introduced to the President of the Senate. He is Scotch, but he is one of those Scotchmen who take their whiskey straight to the window and throw it out, so he appointed a Committee on Free Conference that held the bill's head till it was sober and thoroughly repentant.

In its original form the bill had provided for a county unit; the first sortie in the Senate changed that to a township unit; when Senor Estudillo finally ceased his gallant performance as Senatorial chaperon, the unit was supervisorial district, something just as good—almost—from the optionists' viewpoint, as the county unit.

We must confess to having made something of a hash of the foregoing description, but if the patient reader has gleaned the idea that Senor Estudillo is something of a creation in the spring shapes for chaperons, our effort will not have been in vain. To be considered safe to trust with a perfect lady like the local option bill, after four sessions' service in the Legislature, is proof enough of the code and the chivalry of the Don.

By the way, the accent is on the "D."

CITY PLANNING IN MILWAUKEE



The city planning movement is spreading rapidly over the United States. City after city is coming to a realization of the fact that it is worth while to plan a city as one plans a house, to take thought today for the possibilities and the needs of tomorrow and the day after. Last week, under the title "The City Practical," a member of The Outlook's staff described the plan which has been made for Pittsburg—"a plan to relieve and prevent congestion and to regulate the cost of living." In Milwaukee a city planning movement has passed the two stages of discussion and the making of plans and reached that of official action. In the movement all Milwaukee's public bodies are co-operating. The city government, the City Park Commission, the County Park Commission, the Metropolitan Park Commission, and the County Board of Supervisors are all working together, with the co-operation of private citizens, toward common ends. This co-ordination of effort is a happy contrast to what is too often seen in communities where one ward of a city competes with another, the city with the county, the county with the State, and public officials with private individuals. The new plans for Milwaukee cover nine square miles of the city, and are especially noteworthy because they recognize the practical requirements for a more adequate traffic and transportation system. Main thoroughfares will have a minimum width of 120 feet and main pleasure drives 150 feet, thus allowing ample space for planting, as well as providing a special motorway for rapidly-moving vehicles. The plans also show foresight in the selection of parks and playgrounds, thereby saving unnecessary expense later on. The various public bodies at Milwaukee have no intention of resting upon what they have already accomplished. They intend especially to agitate for the passage of laws giving them increased city planning powers. They ask for and will probably get the power of excess condemnation, authority to fix the building line as well as the street line, reasonable control of the platting of private property, and the power to buy, rent, and sell real estate for the purpose of housing. These increased powers are not advocated by any single political party, but are approved by practically all parties, because they recognize their necessity and the dependence upon them of any permanent public welfare.—The Outlook, New York.

Popular Election of President

This progressive movement in politics which is to culminate in the coronation of the people will not be complete until we elect our President by the direct and popular vote of the people. Why longer preserve the fiction of a State sovereignty? There is no more reason for electing a President by States than there is for electing a governor by counties. Our Legislature has delivered itself on the underlying principle involved in its rejection of an advisory vote for United States Senator by districts. Ex-President Roosevelt has recently declared himself as in favor of abolition of the electoral college and a direct vote for President.—Colton Sentinel.

Who Are the Enemies? When in doubt as to the sincerity of a public man or the wisdom of a policy, it is a good plan to see who are his or its enemies. The commission system, for example, has not progressed much beyond the phase of experiment, and some very pretty arguments can be advanced against it. One hundred twenty places have voted to adopt it and about thirty have voted against adopting it. In many places—indeed, in most places—there have been hot fights. There is one highly significant fact to be noted with respect to all these fights, viz., that the saloon and tough element has been arrayed against the commission form. This is noticeably the case in Illinois, where a general commission charter law recently went into effect which cities could adopt or not as they chose. Thus far about thirty cities have acted—all but five or six favorably to the new system. The line-up in the fight was almost without exception on the open-town or closed-town principle. The saloons, red-light people, toughs and those of very "liberal" tendencies, who cherish the theory that interference with vice endangers the business prosperity of the town, all are found fighting the commission system. To these may be added some people of natural conservative characteristics and some, but not all, politicians, who are nervous at any change that may upset their hold on things. Buy why should the saloons and tough element take this attitude? There is nothing in the commission system, as such, that touches the liquor question or public morality; it deals solely with the machinery of government. All it does, or professes to do, is to make an administration effective and genuinely responsible to the will of the people; it has nothing at all to say as to how that administration shall conduct itself toward the saloons or gamblers or the houses of ill-fame. Those are matters for the people to work out afterward, either in their choice of commissioners or through the operation of iniative, referendum and recall. And if the people really desire that the saloons should have a free hand, and vice be flaunted and protected, they can accomplish that purpose easier, if anything under the commission system than under the old plan. But you may safely trust the saloon and vice people to know what they are about. They are opposing the commission plan for perfectly sound business reasons, with logic which, from their point of view, is quite unanswerable. Like the reactionaries, they find they cannot trust the people. They are willing to take their chances with a lot of politicians, selected in haphazard fashion, and practically responsible to no one. They can "do business" with them, even though some are a bit expensive. But the people are as dangerous as dynamite. And their enmity to the commission system should be recognized as a tribute to the efficiency with which it works in restoring the government of cities to the citizens themselves. Let us note also as a parallel case, that these evil forces are all against woman suffrage. Watch how they line up in the contest before us here in California. No doubt there are plenty of very pretty arguments against votes for women, nice ladylike arguments before which we deferentially remove our hats; but on the other side there is at least one argument that "thunders in the index," which is that the real enemies of good government are against admitting women to political power.

Essence of Monthly Statement: The Bureau of Municipal Research of Philadelphia offers the following essential points of a satisfactory monthly statement or balance sheet to be issued by a city auditor or controller: (1) Amount of cash available for meeting current obligations. (2) Immediate current obligations. (3) Funds appropriated but not yet set aside under contracts. (4) Funds set aside to meet contracts. (5) Uncollected revenue of fiscal year. (6) Total bonded debt. (7) Value of city permanent property. (8) Cash for loan funds available for permanent improvement. (9) Amount appropriated for capital outlay but not yet set aside under contract.

Robbins on Hearst: Raymond Robbins of Chicabo, one of the great tribunes of the working people of that city, used this language in speaking of the support given by The American to Carter Harrison for mayor: "Harrison's coalition with the Hearst pirates is as pitiful a spectacle of a weak and lazy politician, hungry for office, kissing the hand that has lashed him, as ever was presented in the political history of Chicago. Hearst's acceptance of Harrison and his 'red-light band,' each of whom he has denounced with screams of pious horror, brands him as a fake progressive and the common enemy of true democracy and of genuine social progress."

Result of Filtering Water: After Albany installed its filter beds its number of cases of typhoid was reduced 70.7 per cent. In Cincinnati, where a $11,000,000 water works system has been in operation four years, the number of deaths from typhoid in 1910 was 21 as compared with 239 in 1906. In the last three years the total of deaths from typhoid was 133, as against 664 in the last three years of the old system. Comparison for deaths from other forms of intestinal diseases in the same periods show 246 as against 563—a total saving of 848 lives.

Arrests in London and New York: Mayor Gaynor calls attention to the fact that the number of arrests in New York was 50,000 less last year than the year before, largely as a result of agitation against indiscriminate arresting, but that it still exceeds the number in London. In 1909 the figures were: London 112,000, New York 220,000. The chief difference lies in the fact, we opine, that to be drunk and disorderly and beat up one's wife and children is not regarded as an offense in London, while it is in New York.

State Control of Water Supply: The value of state control in matters of water supply shows in the work of the New York State Water Commission, whose engineers have just reported a comprehensive plan for conserving the water of the upper Hudson in a series of reservoirs, whereby ample supply will be given a chain of towns and cities that are now often in a precarious situation. The plan, which will cost $4,650,000, will be paid for by bonding the cities and regions benefited.

Trees at a Cent Apiece: Knoxville, Tennessee, is giving out 1000 catalpa trees to be planted on its streets at a price of one cent apiece, which sum only pays the cost of the printed card of direction that goes with them. It was at first proposed to give them without charge, but as they were to go chiefly to school children, it was held that they would be treated with more consideration if a price were fixed.

Will the Horse Stay? Chief of the Fire Department of Buffalo declares that the gasoline motor engines are not a success and never will be as long as rubber is used for tires. It needs steam to do the work, he says, and that calls for weight that the motor vehicle cannot handle with economy. This is, however, not the general view.

Licensing Washerwomen: The laundry business of Jacksonville, Florida, is largely done by colored women—as it is in most southern towns. There have been so many cases of the spread of infectious diseases from the family of the washerwoman to the families whose clothes are done in her house, that the business is to be licensed and inspected.

Electricity at Five Cents: The people of Columbus, Ohio, having now a lighting plant that lights the streets and saves the city money, are advocating an enlargement of the plant to do commercial lighting, unless the private company will reduce its rate to 5 cents, at which figure the engineers say a good profit can be made.

Sanitary Paper Towel: Schools of Ogden are giving a try-out to a sanitary paper towel which comes in a roll 12 to 18 inches wide with occasional perforations. It is torn off and used only once. Bellamy predicted, it will be remembered, that paper would some day be the universal clothing of the race.

Straw for Road Building: In Washington State straw is largely used in the construction of roads in clay soils. The straw is put on the road to a depth of six inches, and it is then cut up and worked in with a disk cutter. If it works in, then more straw is used until a hard mat is formed, almost like asphalt and the road will outlast gravel or cinders.

State Sanitary Code: To improve sanitary conditions in Virginia, the State Health Department has prepared an entire code of health regulations and ordinances and executive system ready for adoption and use by all the towns and villages that choose to adopt it.

Is Curfew Unconstitutional? The city attorney of Altoona, Pennsylvania, has given his opinion to that city's council that the curfew law is contrary to the state constitution. The constitution of the Keystone State must be a peculiar document.

Commission City Gains: In Illinois the following towns have adopted the commission form: Hillboro, Spring Valley and Olney. Also Appleton, Wisconsin, adopted the new system. It was voted down in two Illinois towns: Taylorville and Sullivan.

Ruinous Automobiling: The park authorities of Chattanooga are greatly incensed at the complete ruin of the roads laid out and built at great expense in Chickamauga Park, through which automobiles are allowed to run at high speed.

Old Names Recorded: Boston has adopted the plan of putting the old name of a street under the modern name, in small type on the guide posts. Thus lower Boylston street is marked "Frog Lane," and Devonshire street "Black Jack Alley."

Playgrounds for Portland: The Oregon city proposes to have as complete a system of playgrounds as any in the country, and to that end has sent for an expert to lay out a general scheme.

Progress in New Orleans: The city engineer of New Orleans calls attention to the fact that more paving has been done in the past six years than in all the history of the city prior to that time.

The Lake Tahoe Controversy

By G. S. ARNOLD

California's part was [illegible] the waters of Lake Tahoe. This ownership is potentially a most valuable asset to the state. The purpose of this article is to show how the interests of California have been preserved by a few public men of the state against the combined efforts of the United States Reclamation Service and the well-lefted but effective coagulation of capital sometimes known as the Power Trust.

Lake Tahoe is a perfect natural reservoir. It is the largest mountain lake in the United States. Six thousand feet high in the Sierras, it forms a huge bowl of nearly two hundred square miles surface with a rim of far-reaching mountains. Upon its five hundred twenty square miles of watershed the timber and declivities conserve vast quantities of snow until late summer, so that evaporation is to a large measure and at all times offset by a reserve of melting snow.

Tahoe and the Truckee

The lake is on the boundary line between Nevada and California. Most of its surface is in the latter. Its only outlet, the Truckee River, flows from the northwestern end of the lake into California, north and then east, crossing the Nevada border forty miles from the lake. It ultimately wanders into the desert and is lost by evaporation in Pyramid Lake and the sink of the Carson. But before its immense volume of water, both from the lake and from its own thousand miles of watershed, is lost, it has two great and not wholly consistent values—for irrigation and for the generation of electrical power.

Lake and river are therefore interstate. The rights of the states and of the United States, under existing decisions,* are that each state is entitled to its equitable share of the waters, except when the interests of navigation warrant interference by the government. The United States, as an owner of private lands within the states, has the same rights to the waters as any individual, and no more.

Each State has use for all the water which naturally flows from the lake. Vast areas of irrigable land in both states can be reclaimed from the wilderness by the use of these waters.

Hydro-Electric Possibilities

Without attempting to discuss the engineering features of the case, it is enough to note that on the Nevada side there is a drop of a thousand feet from the lake to Washoe Lake—a distance of five or six miles—while on the California side the drop is six thousand feet to Sacramento. Each of these falls may be made available by tunneling. Whether or not a project for the utilization of the waters in California is now feasible, a glance at the great development of power operations during the last ten years justifies the prediction that if the rights of California are once defined, capital will soon take advantage of them.

The waters are already used in five places for power development, and in several smaller factories along the river.

Rights Claimed

There are two existing property claims in the waters of the lake, one for power and the other for irrigation, both contemplating use in Nevada.

The Truckee General Electric Company claims rights to a continual flow down the Truckee River to the extent of four hundred cubic feet per second and the right to operate the gates at the outlet as it chooses. The nature, extent and validity of the company's rights are problematical. Originally, in 1870, the Donner Boom and Logging Company secured from the Legislature a license to erect a dam to raise the level of the lake five feet, and to clear the river for the purpose of floating logs and collecting toll. In 1875, the company proved its compliance with the requisites of the Act and became entitled to control its dam for the period of twenty years. The company abandoned the use of the river for log-floating, probably prior to 1895, but continued to operate the gates until 1903, when demand was made upon the power plants situated upon the river for rent. This led to a purchase of the land immediately surrounding the outlet by the Fleishackers, who at that time owned two of the plants upon the Truckee. (Subsequently all the plants came under the control of the Truckee General Electric Company.)

*Particularly Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 43.

Rubicon Point, Lake Tahoe

How much water, if any, the Truckee Company has appropriated or acquired in the river, is unknown, and it would probably be impossible, at the present time, to ascertain. It is certain that since the purchase of the fifty-four acres of land surrounding the dam, it has operated the gates openly for its sole benefit. The Legislature of California has recently enacted that no waters of the State may be transported or diverted for use outside the State. Whether the control of the gates, or any appropriation, has given the company any vested rights is a question which must probably come before the courts for adjudication.

The second claim is that of the United States. In 1903, all the surplus water of the lake and river were appropriated (though possibly not validly) by the Reclamation Service for the use of the Truckee-Carson project which covers the irrigation of an immense tract of arid land in Nevada.

Conflicting Interests

The conflict of these two interests led directly to the present controversy. Reclamation and electrical power are not consistent uses. For the latter a steady flow is necessary throughout the year; the former demands concentration of flow for the few months when the water is needed for irrigation. Exclusive operation of the gates by the company, therefore, imperilled the appropriation of the United States. Prior to October, 1908, the government secured adjoining land and attempted to construct a canal, but this project was defeated by action of owners of property abutting the lake, who started injunction proceedings. Thereupon Secretary Garfield attempted to purchase the dam and gates, offering first $25,000, and then $40,000. Then condemnation was threatened. Whereupon, negotiations were commenced to secure the company in its claim of four hundred cubic feet per second, but to give the land and control of the gates to the United States. Any rights of the State of California were ignored.

This agreement was drawn in October, 1908. It was submitted to the company at about the time that President Taft was elected. Apparently the company hoped for better things from Secretary Ballinger, for it allowed the matter to rest until after March 4, 1909. It was not disappointed. In the anti-conservation orgy which reached its climax in the spring of 1909, and from the effects of which the Taft administration (and ex-Secretary Ballinger) will never fully recover, a new contract was drawn. This interesting document was one of the five prime causes which precipitated the Ballinger-Pinchot feud, and ultimately helped to deprive the country of one of its most valuable servants. It purported to give to the company many things which the Garfield contract never contemplated, and left title to the dam and gates in the company. It gave the company perpetual rights in the public domain, for reservoirs and pipe lines wherever it might locate them. It gave further right to locate a second point of diversion at any point and at any depth below the lake's surface, so that it would be possible to exhaust the waters of the lake almost indefinitely.

Ballinger Approves

Secretary Ballinger approved this contract and urged the Secretary of Agriculture to conform to his approval since part of the lands involved were under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. At this point, Secretary Wilson and Forester Pinchot protested vigorously against the proposed contract on the ground that it was against all the principles of conservation and was illegal, since the only statute allowing the use of rights of way for electrical power purposes provides that such rights may at any time be terminated at the discretion of the Secretary of Interior.

They also called attention to the inadequate consideration to be given to the United States.

In August, 1909, Secretary Ballinger referred the matter to the President, apparently without disclosing the former protests of Secretary Wilson and Forester Pinchot. Mr. Pinchot found the contract upon the President's desk, awaiting approval, and succeeded in securing permission to submit a formal protest, prepared by Mr. W. A. Maltby, who had voluntarily taken the commission from the Forest Service. The President than turned the matter over to Senator Newlands for advice. The Senator advised a public investigation and hearing, so that it would be "an object lesson as to what National Conservation means, and would tend to focus the discussion on lines of practical legislation." This the President refused to do, on the ground that it would imply that "somebody could not be trusted," and instructed Secretary Ballinger to submit the facts to him.

Kent Steps In

No further action was taken until the present year, when Congressman Kent was notified in Washington that the contract was again before the President, in revised form. Mr. Kent found the contract changed in degree but not in kind, and again protested. He was given a limited time in which to present the interests of the United States as opposed to the power company's interests. At considerable personal inconvenience he undertook this unique commission.

The State of California then suddenly came to a realization that its rights had been in jeopardy for several years. By the most vigorous and efficient action the indifference of the last administration, to whom appeals had been vainly made, has been remedied. The Governor, after a full hearing, telegraphed a protest to the President, and the Legislature passed the act heretofore mentioned, prohibiting the appropriation of waters for use outside the State.

The effect was immediate. By order of the President, the company was notified to discontinue negotiations looking toward the completion of the contract. Such is the present condition of the case.

Governor Johnson's Assistance

Hitherto the proponents of conservation and of the rights of California (whose interests are identical) have been concerned chiefly in the prevention of a powerful coalition between the power interests and the United States. The dangers of this combination have been made distinct by the terms of the various contracts which have been from time to time presented and have been prevented only by radical action. As yet, the State has been secured in none of its rights—it has merely prevented a merging of interest in its opponents. It is now prepared to take all necessary action in the courts to protect its rights in the waters of the lake.

If any of these rights have been lost (which is improbable) it is certainly not due to lack of initiative and vigor on the part of Governor Johnson. If they have been saved, the State owes a heavy debt to him, to Congressman Kent, and to the few other public spirits who have carried on the fight.

Rights of Nation and State

The nation has this right:

That the waters conserved in Lake Tahoe should be put to the highest beneficial use, subject to the rights of Nevada and California. This certainly means that the waters should be used in the fertile and semi-tropical lands of California, rather than on the comparatively bleak deserts of Nevada.

The State of California has these rights:

1. That it may utilize is proportionate share of interstate waters. Since Nevada already uses most of the waters conserved on the eastern slope of the Sierras, it is unreasonable to suppose that it is entitled to all the waters of Lake Tahoe. When these waters are utilized for irrigation, it means an almost incalculable increase in the permanent taxable value of the upper Sacramento Valley.

2. The consequent right to control, regulate charges of, and tax the electric power companies which will receive the benefit of the State's ownership in the waters.

These rights are of immense financial and governmental value. They should be preserved.

RESPECT FOR LAW

From an Address Before the American Bar Association

Our courts must realize once for all that the power to do justice, greater than the power to administer law, is the power that is really committed to them; that a precedent is only a sign-post pointing out the direction in which the feet of justice must go, not a rule binding upon the mind and conscience of the judge; that our courts are set in their high places as interpreters of the popular sense of morality and right and the popular sense of justice, not as interpreters of obscure oracles handed down from a remote antiquity. They will receive and they will deserve respect so long as the law which they lay down is the expression of the public will, and no longer.—G. W. Kirchwey, Dean Columbia Law School.

WORK WELL DONE

Remarkable Record of Governor Johnson and the Thirty-ninth Legislature

Every reform that was promised in the progressive platform of the Republican party stands accomplished in the constructive work done by the Legislature that has just adjourned.

Every pledge that was made in the campaign for the redemption of the Republican party from railroad rule has been fulfilled. Every promise that was given in the campaign to rescue the State from the control of the Southern Pacific and its allied interests has been kept. The Legislature has been a legislature of patriotic purpose and effective action. We congratulate it and, far more, we congratulate the people of the State on the record it has made. Not only was it unique in the political history of California, it easily takes first place, for constructive work, among the legislatures of the Union.

The encomiums Roosevelt bestowed upon the Legislature in his Auditorium speech were well deserved. He spoke of it in terms of high eulogy; but what he said in praise did not exceed the merit of what he praised. Look over the list of its achievements.

Examine first the several constitutional amendments which, when adopted, in very truth will raise up popular government in this State. There is the amendment establishing the initiative and referendum; the amendment giving the people the power to recall elective officers, including judges; that giving women the ballot; the amendment correcting our system of criminal jurisprudence, so that trial errors shall not bring reversal on appeal unless they involve a real miscarriage of justice; the amendment extending the jurisdiction of the railroad commission over all public utilities, and the amendment which will prevent transportation companies from raising rates without the commission's consent; the amendment giving home rule to counties, and others of almost equal consequence, the combined effect of which must be to make the government of the State of California the government of the people of the State.

The Legislature adopted resolutions favoring the amendments to the Federal Constitution under which Senators would be elected by direct vote and under which an income tax would be legalized.

The legislative acts that were passed were only less important than the proposed constitutional amendments. The Railroad Commission was given real power over the railroads and power to establish rates on the basis of physical valuation; the true Australian ballot was restored and the party circle abolished; the Oregon direct primary law was adopted; the penitentiary system was reformed; a pension system was instituted for teachers; local option was adopted with supervisorial districts as the units; a stringent race-track bill was passed that puts an end to gambling—these and many other measures in protection of the public interest and advancement of the public welfare are to be found in the record of constructive work achieved by this most notable Legislature in all our history.

It has kept faith with the people. The pledges of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and of the Republican party have been redeemed. Government has been taken out of the hands of the interests and restored to the hands of the people.—L. A. Express.

Let it not be forgotten, that behind the record of the thirty-ninth session of the California Assembly, which has already made this State a political topic, and to its lasting honor, to the farthest corners of the country, stood the big, solid, able, resourceful man whom the people elected to govern and who did govern in the fullest sense of the term.

Having made specific pledges to the people, Hiram Johnson was determined that the should be kept to the letter, and they were kept, and he saw that they were kept. The usual legislature is a thing without a real head—unless unhappily it be an outsider like William F. Herrin was in California, Boies Penrose is in Pennsylvania or George B. Cox has been in Ohio. But the Thirty-ninth Assembly of this state had its own leader in Hiram Johnson, an elected officer.

A leader by force of an engaging personality, clear moral vision, lofty ideals, sincere conviction and an iron will, Johnson's figure at Sacramento has been one to compel the performance of pledges. It doesn't matter much whether he got results through fear or love. He got them, and got them fairly, and got the right kind. That the Assembly achieved so much in the line of reform was because it was a well organized army and not for a minute was anyone but Johnson thought to be the general.

Yet not a theatrical act can be charged against him. He has not played for popular applause. He has scancely been away from his desk where he could hear applause. He has stayed on the job saying yes to good proposals and no to bad ones, and sticking to what he said. He has been showing the reactionaries that he can slam hard, and throwing the fear of a good man, if not the fear of God, into the "push" that used to run things at Sacramento for special privileges and had their lackeys on hand to save what could be saved of the old power.

Everybody knew where he stood, and if anybody thought he had any doubts he could walk in without a pull and find out. And nobody, either in the Capital or around the State, was afraid anybody else would put anything over on the man at the helm. Johnson's bigness did not consist of dignity or bravado or bluff—just uncommon earnestness in the right and executive ability of high order.

Hiram Johnson is young. He is just beginning his career. It will be worth while to watch that career. The services of a man with his education, ability to get results, ideals that are both practical and practicable, faith in the people, personal magnetism and strong will can't long be circumscribed by the boundaries even of a state as big as California.

To deny these things, or withhold the statement of them, would be the meanest of partisanship or envy. When a man has made a record like Johnson's in the past year, has shown the qualities he has and has used his talents so splendidly for the whole public, only the smallest of minds would fail to acknowledge his services with gratitude.—L. A. Herald.

EXTENSIONS OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE

An equal suffrage amendment to the Kansas Constitution was adopted by the Kansas House on February 7th, and by the Senate on the 8th, and goes now to the people of the State for final adoption. It gives votes to women at elections of U. S. Senators and Congressmen and all State officials. For municipal officials women already have voting rights in Kansas. Their right to vote for President and Vice President, withheld in the adopted amendment, is still pending in the Legislature in the form of a separate amendment.

In Illinois on the 9th the Brown bill giving non-Constitutional suffrage to women was reported upon favorably by the Senate committee on elections. It grants to women over 21 years of age the right to vote for members of the State Board of Equalization, members of the Board of Assessors, and the Board of Review, trustees of the Sanitary District of Chicago, and for all officers of cities, villages, and towns, except police magistrates, and upon all questions or propositions submitted to a vote of the people.

A Constitutional amendment enfranchising the women of Oregon was adopted by the Legislature on February 11th for submission to the voters of the State.—The Public, Chicago.

California 50 Years Ago

Showing That Grandfather Fell for the Same Games That Stung Us Yesterday

The beginning of the Fish Trust must have been under way in San Francisco fifty years ago, reading from this advertisement from the Bulletin of March 25, 1861. "The Italian Fishermen have taken up their old quarters on Leidesdorff street, between Clay and Commercial, and are prepared to serve their customers with all kinds of Fresh Fish early every morning."

The Legislature was in session at the time, but it was not investigating any Fish Trust. According to a Bulletin editorial of the same date, it was engaged in perfecting "An Alarming Combination to Rob San Francisco." It seems that "a number of wharf franchises, several street railroads, the Lumber Inspectorship, and various other rascalities are included in the programme." The Bulletin adds remarks about log-rolling, trading of votes and even hints that the rascals had no fear of the Executive veto.

While these things are brewing in the pot of politics, things are doing to the South that remind us of the long-standing quality of Mexican revolution. A dispatch reports that a war vessel carrying Mexican troops had landed at Sausal de Comacho and seized about twenty prisoners. Another dispatch, from Los Angeles, says:

"Two of Gandara's sons, with five others, all leaders of that party, have arrived and are sojourning in Los Angeles. Nothing is known concerning the object of their mission in this state, further than that they were obliged to leave Sonora for safety."

Of course, the eastern dispatches of that day were full of war talk—mainly about Sumter. The following is quoted because it is a contemporaneous pen-portrait of Lincoln, and differs in some striking details from the conventional ideas of the man:

"Another Picture of President Lincoln.—A correspondent of a New York paper, who had accompanied the President thus far on his journey to Washington, gives the following description of his person:

"Mr. Lincoln stands six feet and four inches in height; he has a large head, with a very high, shelving forehead; thick, bushy, dark hair; a keen, bright, piercing, indeterminable colored eye; a prominent, thin-nostrilled nose; a large well-bowed mouth; a round, pretty chin; a first crop of darkish whiskers; a long, lank trunk; limbs of good shape and longitude; arms ditto, with hands and feet symmetrical but naturally large. He wore a black silk hat (plug), a dress coat of sombre hue, a turn-over collar, and other garments such as usually are found upon gentlemen who enjoy an income of at least $25,000."

We hadn't exactly imagined the "pretty" chin, nor the "shapely" limbs, nor the rich clothes before we read this.

The mails traveled more slowly than they do today, but with astonishing speed when one remembers they came by pony or stage. An item in the Bulletin of March 26th announced that, "The Overland Mail from St. Louis, with dates to March 4th, arrived here last evening."

The telegraph was still uncompleted However, "there seems now scarcely room for a doubt that the great Continental Telegraph, which is to place San Francisco in hourly communication with New York, will be in successful operation before another winter season commences on the plains. This great undertaking, and the inauguration of a Daily Overland Mail and passenger line of stages on the Central route are undoubtedly the commencement of an important epoch in California progress."

No talk of trains yet.

That the Wild and Woolly West was not wholly a dream of Buffalo Bill's, is proved by the following quotation from the Sacramento Union of March 27th:

"A Singular Scene.—At Redwood City, lately, while a lawyer was addressing a jury, his coattails became displaced, revealing a large Colt's revolver, which in his frequent change of position was turned to the court and jury alternately. The court requested him to lay his document on the table."

Two touches of the romantic origin of the State are disclosed in two other items from the same paper of nearby dates. One reads:

"A California Claim Confirmed.—In the case of John Green et al., plaintiff in error, vs. S. M. Mezes, Maria de la Soledad, Ortega de Arguello and Jose Ramon Arguello, for the Rancho Los Pulgas, the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed the judgment of the United States Circuit for the Northern District of California. The title was confirmed to the heirs of Arguello."

And the other is found in an item about the appropriation bills going through the Legislature, one act being to pay the "deficiency for translating the laws into Spanish last year, $72.50."

Transportation Problems in American Cities

BION J. ARNOLD

From an Address Delivered Before Los Angeles City Club

The City Club of Los Angeles had as its guest at luncheon last Saturday Mr. Bion J. Arnold, consulting engineer of the city of Chicago, who spoke on the subject "Transportation Problems in American Cities."

Introducing the speaker of the day, President Finlayson said: It will not only be our privilege to listen to one of the most eminent engineers in the world, Mr. Bion J. Arnold, but to listen to a talk upon a subject vital in interest not only to you, not only to every man in this city, but to every man, woman and child who has occasion to use our city's transportation system. For the past eight years Mr. Arnold has been the consulting engineer for the city of Chicago, and through his efforts and the efforts of his coadjutor, the Honorable Walter L. Fisher, the latter having charge of the legal problems, and Mr. Arnold taking charge of the engineering problems, Chicago's transportation system has been brought into a condition where it now deserves credit and commendation. As chairman of the Board of Engineers and Construction, Mr. Arnold has had charge of the work of construction and operation of that vast railroad system in Chicago, involving the expenditure of millions of dollars.

Mr. Arnold spoke, in part, as follows:

Nearly every city encounters a different transportation problem. Many of them are pressing for immediate solution. In the majority of cases, what is wanted is not only considerable improvement over present conditions, but also a program of development along the technical, legal and financial lines, which will result in a comprehensive transportation system, suitable to meet constantly growing demands.

Not many years ago the object was to get transportation at any cost. But at the present time the effort is to get the maximum and best transportation at the lowest cost.

What the Public Wants

Considering the problem as it exists in general in American cities, the people who are the patrons of the system usually believe that they have a right to expect adequate service.

Every precaution should be adopted for their safety, and after safety and comfort have been secured, the maximum possible speed. Other considerations such as universal transfers and an adequate suburban service are demanded.

What the Companies Ask

The company operating the system can secure the best results if the equipment is efficient and up to date, if the construction has been sufficiently substantial to reduce maintenance to the most economical point, if the track and paving have been built so as not to encourage vehicles to follow the rail, and if the street traffic is so regulated that the surface cars will have the right of way, particularly during the rush hours of traffic.

The most favorable conditions for operation exist when there is a large amount of all-day traffic, when the flow of traffic is not all one way, so that the cars may be evenly filled in both directions, and when the profits of the short-haul business more than offset the losses from the long haul.

It is only fair that, when establishing rates, credit should be allowed for past burdens of non-paying years, and for development expense involved in creating, combining and building up the property, and in bringing it to a paying basis. Extraordinary expenses should be amortized and reserves for replacement of equipment, while personal damages, fires and other contingencies should be provided for.

Regulations by Municipalities

The municipality expects the railway company to maintain the paving between and adjacent to its tracks, to sprinkle the streets and to reconstruct its roadbed whenever the streets are torn up for changes in grade, alteration in pavement, new sewers or for the laying of water mains, etc.

The municipalities are still further insisting that definite lines of demarcation with respect to return on investment be drawn between companies operating public utilities and those operating private enterprises. In furtherance of this idea they insist that franchises should be indeterminate, so that franchise values will be eliminated, and in return are willing to create a condition of practically guaranteed monopoly, with the corresponding security to investors; but impose the condition that, in consideration of such monopoly, the corporation submit itself to thorough public regulation.

The form taken by these efforts of the municipality to create a satisfactory condition of control of monopoly is evidenced in the three so-called settlements, Chicago, Cleveland and Philadelphia, each of which differ radically from the others.

The Chicago settlement has proved its merit.

The success of the Cleveland settlement, under the three cent fare, is hanging in the balance because of the difficulty of marketing securities at par, according to the terms of the ordinance.

In Philadelphia the settlement completely ignores true values and guarantees returns on capitalization outstanding.

Former Conditions

In order to understand the elementary causes of this present condition of unrest,—which I say exists in many of the cities of the United States,—it is necessary to retrace our steps to about 30 years ago, into financial history, and review the conditions under which the properties were created.

I call this the development period, from about 1880 on. There were then no electric railways in the country. Instead, transportation by bob-tail car and mule-car. Horse-car traction was characterized by low investment per mile, short haul through densely populated districts, straight five cent fare without transfers (in some cases six cents), earnings per mile of track high, with big profits. The city encouraged extensions with grants on very liberal terms and public opinion was tolerant of the limited service rendered. In those days, urban development was very seriously limited. Today the limit of residence district has increased from three to five or six miles, owing to the increase in scheduled speed of 50 per cent on the average, and perhaps double this on the high speed lines.

In 1885 came the cable system. Power traction was practically forced into existence by the demand for development beyond what the horse traction could give, owing to the long rides necessary between the various sub-centers established.

But mechanical traction was to be short-lived, through no lack of the foresight of the promoters. Here is an example of the rapidity of change brought about by enforced development. The city of St. Paul built a cable line that was barely put into operation before abandoned. A cable system was built in Minneapolis in 1887 which was not even started before being replaced by the electric system. The Pittsburg cable line, installed at great expense in 1888, operated only about six years before being replaced. The Chicago lines, with a much earlier start, to be abandoned in 1906, operated 24 years.

The cost of these cable lines was about $100,000 per mile. How should this investment be carried?

Here was an enormous amount of capital made obsolete in some cases even before completed, and through no lack of business judgment or acumen on the part of the promoters the development of the electric system had simply discounted all anticipation.

These conditions necessitated increase in capitalization and manifestly required a considerable period of time to retire this obsolete capital out of earnings. The only other alternative was obviously that of retaining in the capital account this obsolete investment and paying fixed charges thereon until it could be retired out of future earnings.

Advent of the Electric System

In 1890 came the electric system. With the introduction of a new form of motive power a still further increase in capitalization was necessary. Fortunately the electric system enabled traction companies to increase their gross earnings per mile over a very much wider territory than would have been possible with either horse or cable. The actual earnings per mile of the horse cars were high, owing to short haul; and the electric traction earnings have not greatly exceeded horse earnings, except in especially favored localities.

We had the idea when we put electricity on that it was going to increase our earnings greatly per mile of track. It didn't do that exactly, but it did greatly increase our gross earnings, enabling us to go a greater distance out in the country, and it has greatly increased our miles of track and thereby given the citizens a great deal of additional service and additional traction facilities. But it did not increase our gross earnings per mile of track to the extent that the earlier promoters of the system thought it would. That is one of the places where we fooled ourselves.

The most important point is that the electric transmission provided a much greater radius of activity into suburban territory, with the possibility of keeping up the earnings per mile.

We have made quite an exhaustive analysis of the gross earnings of traction companies in our larger American cities, and have found that you can lay it down as a law that the gross earnings will increase with the square of the population increase. In other words, if your population doubles, the gross earnings of your traction system will be four times what they were. The earnings per capita per annum increase directly as the population increases. That is, if you are getting $10 per capita with a given population, if you double your population you will get $20 per capita.

This rapid growth was probably accentuated in the early days and marked the traction industry in the promoter's mind as a veritable gold mine. As a result he capitalized this by successive consolidations of competing properties. Competition duplicated investment, increased operating expenses and decreased fares, and consequently net earnings. Hence, consolidation at almost any price was, in his judgment, desirable and apparently warranted in the face of a hopeful future.

I am trying to give you an idea how we got into the trouble, and we will all have to take a little blame. We, as railroad men, did it ourselves, and you, as municipalities, let us do it. We are all in the same boat.

Following these lines, the history of the present urban traction companies comprises a long series of consolidations, each important transaction accompanied by an issue of refunding securities, with its liberal quota of water, under the guise of promoters' profits. In this financial expansion the significance and identity of the original capital liability was practically lost; while in many cases the underlying funded debt on property which had been absolutely eliminated through replacement was partially, if not wholly, retired out of earnings, as it should have been. Hence, on all stock exchanges we find listed bonds of underlying companies issued decades ago for property which long since has disappeared; but the integrity of these bonds is fictitiously maintained by guarantee of the holding company. As a partial offset to this, however, it must be borne in mind that depreciation to a certain extent is compensated for by the appreciation of the real estate owned by the companies. So the situation is not so bad as at first it might be thought.

Now, I have endeavored to give you an idea of how we, in many of our cities, got into our present situ-

...tion. To summarize that, we had to ... of an immense amount of new capital to leave the horse car for the cable system and the cable system for the electric system. Then we became too optimistic and increased the capitalization upon the theory that our earnings were going to be great. That didn't make any difference what the real value of the property was, that the market value of the property was what it could earn returns upon. We also went upon the theory that the municipalities would grant additional franchises and we wouldn't have to make the money back that we had in the property during the life of the franchises. And there is where we fell down.

Now then, that condition confronts or did confront almost every street railway company in our large cities.

What are we going to do?

How Chicago Solved the Problem

I have been connected with a number of cities, and I think perhaps the solution we adopted in Chicago, and which is being considered very seriously in other places, is as good an example as I can give you of the best way of solving it.

In the first place, the traction companies who had some 750 miles of track, had had nearly a ten years' war with the city. During this time they contended that, under a certain legislative act, their franchises had a 99-year life. The city contended that this was not so; that the franchises expired within the next two or three years; and that, therefore, they either had to make terms for new franchises or get off the streets and give other people a chance. That was, in abrupt language, the situation.

The municipality fought the franchises under this 99-year act, as it was called, and carried it to the supreme court in which it afterwards got a decision. But pending the time of this decision the railway companies thought the better way would be to settle with the city, secure extension of franchises and rehabilitate the properties so as to give the city service.

The city believed it would be better to adopt municipal ownership. I am speaking of the administration which got in on the municipal ownership platform—Mayor Dunne's administration. Agitation had been going on for many years before this administration, and the public mind had got in the shape where they decided they wanted municipal ownership. Mayor Dunne was elected upon what was known as the I. M. O. platform—Immediate Municipal Ownership platform. As soon as he got in the chair he endeavored to put into effect the ideas upon which he was elected. The city had no money to purchase the railways, or to build new railways. Even if it could get the present lines off the street, it was not in a position to build railways in their place. Consequently, after several months of attempting to create a municipally owned railway and finance it along various lines, the municipality finally called in Mr. Walter L. Fisher, now Secretary of the Interior, and created him Special Traction Counsel. Being a man of great ability, he outlined the plan which I will explain to you.

He said, first these ordinances must be framed upon the theory that the city shall ultimately own the railways; that the city shall be put in the position where, when it gets ready, it can own the railways. Mayor Dunne adopted temporarily Mr. Fisher's recommendations as outlined here and the ordinances were finally passed. Mayor Dunne first agreed to them, but before they were submitted to the council for final consideration he decided that he didn't desire to support them and did not support them. He attacked them, but they finally were carried.

The theory of those ordinances was this. First, the municipality should be in position to purchase the properties whenever it saw fit. As a condition precedent to the establishment of these ordinances, or even the consideration of them, the city said that it wanted the properties valued. It wanted to know at what price it could purchase the then existing properties, if it saw fit to purchase them. A commission of engineers was formed and that commission of three engineers appraised the properties and finally agreed upon a valuation of $50,000,000, which valuation was accepted by the city and by the companies as the valuation at which the city could buy.

Companies Get a Fair Deal from the City

I want to diverge a little bit and show the difference between a properly managed company and an improperly managed company; and I also want to show you that a municipal commission will deal fairly with a railway company and it will often give a company credit for some things not asked for, if it really finds merit behind the case.

There were two companies. One was capitalized for $81,000,000. This commission, after analyzing the properties of that company, could find only $29,000,000 worth of property behind that capitalization, and that was the valuation that this particular company agreed to accept finally for its property; and that included a pretty liberal allowance for old cable property, which it had had the right to operate under some one of its franchises until the city purchased. As the city could not purchase, Mr. Fisher and the attorneys representing the city said that the commission must value that property as a going concern, as a cable system, giving it a going value, when we knew it was junk. We allowed them $4,000,000 for the cable junk, which was worth probably a million. We also gave them three or four millions for the franchise rights, which did not expire for some time in the future. That company was fairly treated, but it received only $29,000,000 for property upon which they had been paying returns upon $81,000,000. Now, you can say that the difference between the $29,000,000 and the $81,000,000 was water or anything else you wish to call it.

The other company, on the other hand, which had always been conservatively managed, had about $18,000,000 of capitalization. The commission found $21,000,000 of capital property that the company had in possession, including certain cable values similar to the other case and certain franchise values. That company, therefore, got three million dol-

A Good Precedent

Trading and log rolling have been the dominant tactics in so many legislatures, in California and elsewhere, that it had come to be almost a tradition of observers of legislative bodies that the evil was fundamental and incurable. The recent Legislature disproved the tradition. There was practically no trading even between individual members, and there was a total absence of that public, organized trading, by which, in the days of bosses, the bosses ruled the Legislature. This final action clinched the precedent, and from now on it will be no longer Utopian to dream of an untraded Legislature.—Fresno Republican.

Stand-patters Criticise the Nation's "Sacred" Tribunal

The inconsistency of standpatism is an integral part of an impossible creed. Stand-patters cannot stand still any more than the sun or the moon can cease to mark the passage of time. Everyone knows that the stand-patters have declared again and again that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are the sum of all wisdom, and yet when this court takes even a mincing step forward we find stand-patters daring to criticize "the nation's highest tribunal." The Supreme Court upholds the corporation tax law, and the San Francisco Chronicle, following the lead of the stand-pat organs of the East, utters moans and groans of anguish. Anent this "sacred" decision the Chronicle gives voice to much sacrilegious comment, of which the following is a fair sample:

"The text of the decision is, of course, not yet available here, and when received will be mainly of interest to lawyers as showing how, by use of precedents mounting upward like a flight of steps, a unanimous Supreme Court has reached a conclusion which all thoughtful men see was not justified and which carefully avoids stating the real reason which must have influenced the court."

Listen to that! All thoughtful men know more than the thoughtless justices of the nation's highest tribunal! The once infallible court of courts accused of tricking the people by saying one thing and meaning another! And this from a stand-patter! Luckily for the Chronicle and its kind, the backward road is of indefinite length, or soon there would be need to buttress the limit.—San Francisco Bulletin.

Ripley Predicts Public Ownership of Railroads

President Ripley, of the Santa Fe, is decidedly hostile to regulation of the railroads by Congress and the State Legislatures, and predicts that it will end in government ownership.

The Railroad Regulation Act just adopted in California he ridiculously condemns as "government usurpation of the rights of owners." . . .

It is doubtless true that government ownership is coming to pass. Far from being a calamity to be dreaded, it is the best possible solution of the transportation problem. The Bee long has regarded it as ultimate and inevitable. For while there must be regulation, or determined efforts at regulation, so long as private ownership exists, it seems clear that this can never be wholly successful. And so long as private ownership continues the railroads will be a powerful influence in politics, with a tendency to corruption and to undue power of wealth in public affairs.

Government ownership of railroads throughout the world is the rule, private ownership the exception. Nine-tenths of the countries with railroads have public ownership, and the tendency in Europe is more and more in this direction. It has become the established policy of France, of late years, and in most European countries it has long prevailed.—Sacramento Bee.

Sunday Closing of Postoffices

The Sunday closing of postoffices is under consideration in many places throughout the country. In San Francisco, Pasadena, Stockton, Redlands and other cities a straw ballot has been resorted to by way of ascertaining the will of the people on the subject. The result indicates a willingness on the part of the public to give postal employes a day off on Sundays, so far as delivery of mail by carriers and through general-delivery windows is concerned. Whatever the outcome, the work necessary in receiving and dispatching and distributing mail at the various offices would go on as usual.—Napa Register.

He Couldn't Be Recalled

The writer knew one district judge who was supplied by a railroad company with a private car in the fall for a hunting trip, which he took annually for many years. He was at liberty to take his friends, go anywhere on the line of the road or its branches, had a well-stocked larder provided, a porter and all the necessary help. On his return he would call the fall term of court. Possibly the first case on the docket would be that of a poor fellow who would come into court on crutches, or with one arm cut off, or bruised and mangled in other ways. He would be endeavoring to secure money compensation from his former employer, the railroad company, in whose service he had received the injuries which had made him a cripple and blasted his hopes for life.

Would it be possible for such a litigant to secure a fair trial before a court thus biased in favor of the railroad company? Tragedies were witnessed in that court room before that judge; poverty, helplessness, suffering, anxiety, distress, wakeful nights, a blind seeking and groping for justice on the one side; on the other the most brilliant lawyers obtainable, cool, cunning, alert, swift to take advantage of slips or omissions in testimony, and on the bench, this judge, hand in glove with the railroad company, whose guest he had been so recently.

The horror of it all became so evident to the most obtuse as the years went by that efforts were made to rid the bench of a man so dreadfully unfit by electing him to Congress, on several occasions, but this always proved a failure. Finally, death came to relieve the situation, and there were few mourners. Some people say there is no hell; some people say there ought to be one.—John T. Bell, The Modesto News.

Was it "The Best Congress?"

The President, in his Atlanta speech the other day, assured the country that the Congress that adjourned on March 4 was the best Congress we have had since the War of the Rebellion.

Everybody can be his own judge as to whether or not the last Congress was, as the President says it was, the best Congress we have had since the War of the Rebellion.

The President also said, it will be remembered, that the tariff atrocity was good; that Aldrich was a good Senator; that Tawney ought to be sent back to Congress; that Ballinger was a good Secretary of the Interior and a much-abused man; that the Lake Tahoe contract with the Truckee River General Electric Company was not bad; that Congressman McKinley ought to be returned to Congress by the people of the Second Congressional District.—Oakland Enquirer.

Profits in Municipal Ownership

Good management seems to have about as much to do with the success or failure of municipal ownership of public utilities, as it has to do with success in private enterprise. So long as such figures are available as published in the financial report of the Riverside lighting system or those showing what San Bernardino's water department is doing, it is idle to say that public ownership is not the thing. It is the thing, and collective ownership of such utilities gives the humblest citizen the benefit of being a stockholder, in this, that he gets his service at a minimum cost. For some reason, the private corporations, unless put to it as in the present war in Pasadena, are never willing to furnish service so cheaply as can the municipality itself.

The Riverside lighting system shows a profit of almost $2000 for the month of June, and out of the revenues of the system it is being extended, over $4000 being spent in new work during that month. The gross collections were over $12,900.

And in passing, it may be the part of wisdom to consider whether the Riversiders have not solved the municipal lighting question along the best lines. They buy their power at wholesale from the big corporations controlling it in Southern California, and at a price that must be very nearly as cheap as they could develop the power themselves. They thus avoid not only the investment in the generating plant, but also such a fight with the corporations themselves as Pasadena has plunged into, by attempting municipal lighting.—San Bernardino Sun.

Wisconsin Public Utilities Law

An Address Before the National Municipal League, Pittsburg, November 19, 1908, by R. H. Meyer, Formerly Chairman of the Railroad Commission of Wisconsin, Now Member Interstate Commerce Commission

The Public Utilities Law of Wisconsin was enacted July 9, 1907. It confers jurisdiction upon the Commission over companies producing or transmitting light, heat, water, power, and over telephone companies. The Railroad Commission Law of 1905 conferred similar jurisdiction over steam and electric railroads and all instrumentalities of transportation connected therewith, as well as over telegraph and express companies. Both the Railroad Commission Law and the Public Utilities Law, together with some thirty-five additional statutes are administered by the "Railroad Commission of Wisconsin." When the duties and powers of the Commission were very greatly extended in 1907 through the enactment of the Utilities Law and other statutes, the name of the Commission was not changed. While therefore, the Railroad Commission is in effect a public utilities commission, performing all the duties and functions which such a commission may well be imagined as performing, it is still legally the "Railroad Commission."

The general legal and administrative principles which underlie the Railroad Commission Law also underlie the Public Utilities Law. Like the Railroad Commission Law, the Public Utilities Law imposes upon the respective managements of private and municipal plants the duty of establishing reasonable rates and regulating reasonably adequate service in the first instance. The initial responsibility lies with the managements, who must select the agencies, materials and methods through which the service is provided. All rates, rules, regulations and service may be challenged at any time, and revised or modified by the Commission. The theory of the law and of its administration is to place the respective managements on the defensive, throwing the burden upon them to justify their rates and service whenever the issue is raised before the Commission. The Commission may act both upon complaint and upon its own initiative with respect to all matters relating to public utilities.

The most important provisions of the Public Utilities Law may be grouped about four leading heads, namely, valuation, accounting, rates and service.

Valuation

The law imposes upon the Commission the duty of valuing all the public utility plants in the state of Wisconsin. Up to the present time by far the greater number of plants which have been valued were valued in connection with proceedings in which they were involved. Naturally this order of valuation will soon have to be broken, when the number of complaints involving rates will probably decrease and the Commission can then take a survey of the whole field and systematically complete the valuation of all the plants as contemplated in the law. Such valuations must be published within five days after the same have been determined by the Commission.

The first, and perhaps most important, step in the valuation of these plants is the valuation of the physical property. The law requires a valuation to be made of all the property used and useful for the convenience of the public. Perhaps in all cases the great bulk of such property is the physical property. At the outset, the engineers of the Commission solicit the aid of the engineers of the various companies and preliminary conferences are held, at which all the parties in interest are represented for the discussion of ways and means of making the valuation at the least possible expense to the state and to the companies, and with the least possible interruption of the rontine work of the utilities. In part jointly with the state tax commission, the Railroad Commission maintains a considerable engineering staff, which is subdivided into teams, each team devoting itself to a particular branch of the work of valuation. In addition to these there are, of course, inspectors, to whom reference will be made in another connection. Where the companies have made a careful inventory of their property, the engineers of the Commission take this and check it up and test it in the field and in the office, item by item. This has been the general rule, and it is a matter of satisfaction to be able to state, that in several instances of the valuation of important plants the differences between the company's staff and the Commission's staff were so slight, that little time was devoted in formal proceedings before the Commission to the inventory or physical valuation. In other cases, again, many apparently irreconcilable differences developed and much time of the Commission had to be devoted to the taking of testimony with respect to the items in dispnte.

Thus far only one valuation has been made for the purpose of acquisition of a private plant by the municipality under the indeterminate franchise provisions of the law. In connection with this work the engineering staff of the Commission has collected and compiled elaborate data relating to prices and lives of all the constituent parts of the physical plants of all the different classes of utilities. These data constitute one of the most valuable resources within the reach of the Commission upon all questions of physical value.

In addition to the physical value, there naturally arise the questions of the value of the franchise, good will, and going value. Thus far, practically no utility managements have claimed franchise value to be used by the Commission in the establishment of rates. The element of good will has scarcely been mentioned as an element separate and apart from going value. Incidentally, it may be remarked that the statutes of Wisconsin treat all utilities, except telephones, as monopolies, as shown by the provisions of the Utilities Law relating to indeterminate franchises and the granting of the certificate of convenience and necessity. The telephone business is, however, still subject to the inroads of competition, and so far as the statutes are concerned, it is technically a competitive business. It is, therefore, not impossible that in the valuation of telephone plants an element of good will, using this term technically, as something different than going value may have to be included, which will probably have to be excluded in the case of all other classes of utilities. In fact several companies have explicitly stated in their testimony that they made no claim of franchise values and good will. Under the head of going value, representations have been made to the effect that all the way from 5 to 100 per cent of the physical value should be added in order to arrive at the true and lawful value to be used in the establishment of just and reasonable rates. The widest range of reasoning is embraced in this class of testimony now before the Commission. If any one tendency in this testimony may be characterized as typical, as compared with other tendencies represented in the same testimony, it is the tendency to make going value stand for expense which has been incurred for outlays and services in connection with the upbuilding of the business of the utilities, and in return for which no adequate remuneration has hitherto been made. In other instances going value has been represented as something very real, existing in connection with every plant, entirely independent of expense, past losses or profits, and capable of fairly definite quantitative determination. Since the Wisconsin Commission has not yet formally declared an official opinion with respect to these intangible items of value, it will not be possible to discuss these topics in greater detail or at greater length at this time. The Commission has not yet made up its mind.

Accounts

The law gives the Commission the power and it makes it its duty to prescribe uniform forms of accounts for all the public utilities operating within the State. Soon after the enactment of the law, the various utilities submitted financial statements to the Commission, which, in a measure, gave some indication of the extent and character of the accounts kept by them. Since that time a number of conferences have been held and a great deal of detailed work has been done under the direction of the Commission, but the final accounts have not yet been officially promulgated. The titles of the leading accounts were sent out to the different companies some months ago in order that the respective managements might begin to shape their books with reference to the same, and it is hoped that in the not distant future the final forms may be submitted. The theory of this system of accounts is, that the books shall be kept in such a way that after the physical value of a plant has once been ascertained, the valuation will be kept up practically in a systematic way, so that the Commission, or any other authority, may see from year to year exactly what the financial condition of any particular plant is. The system of uniform accounts applies both to private plants and to municipal plants. This feature of the law is especially noteworthy in that it at last makes it possible to establish a comparable basis for public and private plants. Investigations made thus far by the Commission show that not only does great variety exist among the private plants, but also among the public or municipal plants, and that the accounts of the municipal plants are, in many instances, only partial accounts, not showing all the operations and expenses of such plants. While this is generally true, it can best be shown from the water-works investigations. In eight Wisconsin cities of over five thousand population the municipal water works accounts show that there is no credit given for public service, four of these showing a deficit for the year which in three cases would very likely disappear and show a surplus, if the plant were credited with revenues which justly belonged to it.

Out of fifty-six municipal water plants in cities under five thousand population, thirty-three reported a deficit for the last fiscal year. Of this total number twenty-five cities did not credit the plant with any earnings for public service, and of these twenty-five city plants twenty-two showed a deficit. Twenty-eight municipal water plants showed no general expense whatever, such service being furnished by other city employes. Under the proper separation of accounts and the adoption of a uniform system, an entirely different situation, just to the city and to the plant management, would be revealed.

Rates

As previously suggested, the managements of the private companies and municipal plants establish rates in the first instance. Such rates are subject to revision by the Commission, either on complaint or on the initiative of the Commission. The Commission has been endeavoring to elaborate the principles upon which just and reasonable rates should be based for all the different utilities, and in a considerable number of instances schedules have been prescribed in which these principles are discussed. Many more schedules are still under consideration, and the Commission hopes that in the not distant future all the utilities operating within the state will make their rates

GRAND PIANOLA PIANOS

THE incorporation of the Pianola with the Grand Piano, makes the Grand Pianola Piano one of the really great achievements in the history of music. For it makes available to anyone the best qualities of the highest type of piano in conjunction with the world's one high type of piano player.

The presence of the Pianola inside the case interferes in no way with playing by hand. Neither does it detract in even a slight degree from the majestic symmetry of the Grand's appearance.

The only three Grand pianos into which the Pianola is built are the Steinway, the Weber and the Steck.

in accordance with uniform principles, representing the latest and best which scientific methods and scientific thought can contribute.

Serviee

With respect to service, the Commission has put into effect a series of rules regulating gas and electric service Other rules and regulations applicable to the other utilities may be adopted in the future. The rules relating to gas and electric service prescribe certain standards for gas pressure, quality of the gas, voltage, care of the lamps, lamp renewal, records of complaints, disturbances in the service, etc. A full and complete administration of this feature of the Commission's work will ultimately require a considerable inspectional staff. This the Commission does not feel justified in employing at this particular time, but it has decided to employ a few competent inspectors who shall do thoroughly intensive work, the results of which can be placed before the legislature and the legislature may then determine whether or not it is in the interest of the citizens of Wisconsin to have the Commission proceed with the more elaborate inspectional work covering the state as a whole. The results of these inspections show the widest variation in the character of the service and many conspicuous failures to provide anything like what may be characterized as adequate service. In illustration of this, reference may be made to the above mentioned decision of the Commission in the matter of standards for gas and electric service in the State of Wisconsin, in which tables are presented which show the results of the preliminary tests.

Appeal to Courts

All orders of the Commission are subject to appeal. Thus far, only three of the decisions under the Railroad Commission Law have been taken into court, and no utilities decisions. Such appeal is taken first to the circuit and then to the supreme court. The law provides that the record before the Commission shall be the record before the court, and if new testimony should be introduced before the court, through such introduction and determination of the fact that it is new testimony, a case is thrown automatically back before the Commission for revision of the original determination on the basis of the new testimony.

One of the three railroad cases, above referred to, was finally determined by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in an epoch making decision handed down in June, 1908. This decision discusses the order of the Commission under review; it analyses and interprets the salient provisions of the statute creating the Commission; it meets in the broadest and most progressive manner the arguments relating to constitutional limitations and the allegations regarding the exercise of legislative power by the Commission; it brings into clear perspective the rights of the companies as well as the rights of the public; and in substance it declares that even though on the given facts the court might decide a case differently from what the Commission does, if no errors of law have been committed, and the question is one regarding which reasonable and competent men might differ, the court will not set aside the order of the Commission. In other words, the court may feel that the Commission should have rendered an opposite decision, yet, within the limits of the law and discretion of the Commission, it will sustain that decision.

So far as I know, this decision stands practically alone in this country in the breadth of the views expressed with respect to the regulation of public utilities and the extent of the support it gives to the administrative authority charged with that regulation. There were two concurring and one dissenting opinion.

The Commission as a Clearing House

Generally speaking, the information collected by the Commission and the services performed by it and its staff have tended to make the office of the Commission a clearing house between public and private plants and municipalities. While the law expressly retains to the municipalities power to control the various kinds and character of service rendered and to be rendered, the power to prescribe conditions under which streets are to be used, extensions made, etc., an appeal lies in all such cases to the Commission, whether a municipal or private plant be involved. It has been the endeavor of the Commission to cooperate with the local authorities and the companies along all these lines. The law has been in effect only a little more than a year and a half, but even now there exists a steady increase in the lines of communication between the local managements of private and municipal plants and city and village authorities and the Commission. The information which has been collected and compiled by the Commission is placed at the disposal of all citizens of the State in the most convenient form. The use of this information by local authorities and citizens has, in a number of instances, obviated the necessity of making complaints. In other instances it has led to changes in the plant equipment and service.

Results of the Operation of the Law

In addition to reasonable rates and reasonably adequate service, among the results which the operation of the law has already shown and which the future may he expected to bring into evidence still more, many be mentioned the following:

1. Law Takes Utilities Out of Politics

Wisconsin legislation has taken the utilities, as well as the railroads, out of politics. I do not believe that many cities can be found in the State of Wisconsin who would seriously claim that in either the primary campaign or in the campaign preceding the present November elections, the utilities as such had entered into politics. All students of municipal affairs well know that in this elimination of politics from the management of the utilities we have removed one of the greatest and most persistent sources of corruption and bad government.

2. Eliminates Feuds

The Utilities Law tends to eliminate feuds between the citizens and the managements of public and private plants. The law assures to all communities good service at reasonable rates. This is placed within the reach of all impartially, whether the Commission advances or lowers the rate. The basis of its findings is published in every instance. These published facts should suffice to convince, and I believe do convince the average citizen of the reasonableness and justice of the decision, if it is reasonable and just, and whether he likes it or not, he must abide by that decision. In this respect, cases affecting utilities are quite different from the most of the cases affecting railroads. In the case of utilities the controversy frequently degenerates into a bitter and partisan feud, affecting the entire population, which blinds both sides to a proper comprehension of the facts and to a sense of justice. Proceedings before the Commission tend to clarify and educate public opinion.

3. Raises Level of Morality

The Public Utilities Law raises the standard of morality through the eradication of the evil of discrimination, and the protection of a reasonable rate. To those who are quite familiar with the past evils of discrimination in railway rates, the extent of the discriminations in the rates and service of utilities may be almost beyond comprehension. The whole State of Wisconsin was literally streaked and plastered with discrimination in the rates of utilities, and in all the rest of the country where the extent of such diseriminations has not yet been determined, as it has been in Wisconsin, it is quite probable that discriminations similar in character and extent likewise exist. All rates, rules and regulations in effect in the State are on file with the Commission. And these are the only rates and regulations which can be lawfully enforced and collected. Free and reduced rate service has been absolutely prohibited. Thousands of individuals had been receiving free and reduced rate service, and the eradication of all such rates cannot help but serve as a moral tonic and raise the level of public and private morality within the State as a whole. For thirty-two of the reporting telephone companies, eight out of every one hundred subscribers received free or reduced rate service. The process of equalization of rates had been going on for over a year. Consequently the actual extent of the unjust discriminations was doubtless very much greater at the time of the enactment of the law. I have every reason to believe that in every other State of the Union these discriminations still flourish at the expense of subscribers who pay the full rate. Similar discriminations exist in other classes of utilities.

4. Causes Revolution in Business Methods

The Utilities Law is working a revolution in business management. While some managements are doubtless models from a business point of view, they are not the general rule. Many of the utility companies have not been operated on a business basis; in fact, it is probable that a good many of the managements did not have the remotest idea as to the exaet standing, from a business point of view, of the plant they were operating. Uniform accounting, rules governing the service and the regulation of rates compel the adoption of business and scientific methods, which is resulting in nothing short of a revolution in management.

5. Makes Investments More Attractive

All of the effects of the law, taken collectively, are bound to place investments in public utility enterprises on a more stable foundation. The law works both ways. On the one hand, it protects the consumer against unjust and unreasonable rates and poor service, and on the other it protects the investor and his claim to a reasonable rate on the property which is devoted to public use. This legislation will probably remove public utility investments very greatly, if not entirely, from the field of speculation and place them in the class of conservative, certain and stable investments.

A schoolmaster had just finished a lesson on "Food" when a little boy put up his hand. On being asked what he wanted he replied:

"Please, sir, Jones said he knew a baby that was brought up on elephant's milk, and it gained ten pounds in weight every day."

"Jones ought not to tell you such rubbish," said the master. Then, addressing Jones, he added: "Tell me whose baby was brought up on elephant's milk?"

To which Jones hesitatingly replied: "Please, sir, it was the elephant's baby."—Tit-Bits.

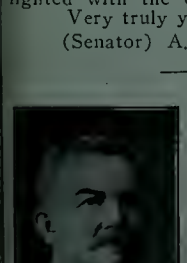
The California Outlook,
Los Angeles, Cal.,
Gentlemen:—



I have read your weekly "The California Outlook" with equal, is not more, appreciation, interest and information than I did the original California Weekly. Under its present management, it seems to have taken on a very broad policy of discussing the political and civic problems of the State. It ought to be the nucleus for a powerful reform organization working towards the purification of political conditions in our beautiful State of California. I wish you an abundance of success financially and know that you will be extremely helpful civically to your readers.

Yours very cordially,

Dear Sir:—

The least I can say in reply to your favor of March 10th is that I am delighted with the California Outlook.

Very truly yours,

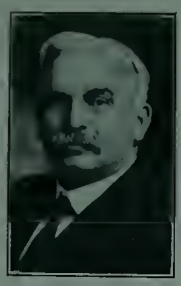
The California Outlook,
Los Angeles, Cal.,
Gentlemen:—

I have been reading the California Outlook recently, and find that it is just what the people need. The editorials are along the lines of reform. It cannot be denied that the opinions of the people in general, on all public matters are largely formed by what they read, and it is therefore, of the greatest importance that they should be put into possession of the facts, so that they may draw correct conclusions. Such seems to be the object of this publication, and for this reason it should be taken by every person who has the good of the State at heart.



I hope it will live.

(Senator) E. O. LARKINS.

As soon as your paper will commence treating San Francisco with some degree of fairness and consideration, I, as a representative of that city, would be pleased to read your paper and then pass my opinion thereon.

The California Outlook and its predecessor, the Pacific Outlook have been a source of inspiration to me and I am fully in accord with the stand the paper has taken in all matters political.

I feel sure that under the new management the results will be even greater and I am glad to see a publication of this kind being circulated over the State of California.

(Assemblyman) H. G. CATTELL

Sacramento, Cal., March 15, 1911

Mr. Editor:—

In my opinion, there is a growing need for a political magazine in California. Such a publication should be broad and liberal in its editorial expressions, and must not serve any class of citizenship, or any faction of any party. The Outlook, in my opinion, appeals too much to the prejudice of the people. I freely admit that I am sometimes unconsciously biased and I think the Outlook is subject to the same criticism. A publication which reaches thousands of people should carry always a message of truth, free from prejudice.

I certainly wish the Outlook every success.

Yours very truly,
(Senator) LEROY A. WRIGHT

The California Outlook,
Los Angeles, Cal.,
Gentlemen:—

I have read "The California Outlook" with a great deal of interest. I consider the position it takes regarding the political situation in the State of California to be for the best interest of all the people.

I appreciate its high political tone. Anybody can be a politician under its politics and not get smirched. It has a happy way of center hitting an evil and elucidating the winning elements of truth. It is fearless in its attitude toward all public questions and can be relied upon to give a free and impartial view of the political situation.

And it is timely always.

Respectfully
(Assemblyman) W. A. LAMB

Am very much pleased with the first issue of the California Outlook. It fills the need of an independent, forcible and fearless exposition of the public questions in this state.—L. A. Bortz, Olive, Cal.

Our Contemporaries

Two leading weeklies have been combined under the name of the California Outlook and the union has greatly strengthened a publication that always has been a power for good in California.

The editors are capable men, earnest, brilliant, clean. They have labored long for purity in politics, cleanness in municipal life and for everything that helps in the uplift of mankind.

There is a place in California for the Outlook and the Enquirer joins with its thousands of friends in wishing it the success it deserves.—Oakland Enquirer.

Good Government men are behind the California Outlook, which is not published for financial profit but for the good it can do by way of promoting civic righteousness. Success to the California Outlook. As the only paper of its kind in the State it should have a big circulation—The Register, Napa, Cal.

The California Outlook will be an advocate of good government and a square deal, and the bettering of political conditions in California. Its influence for good will be felt in the future—Loomis Recorder.

The California Weekly has been amalgamated with the Pacific Outlook of Los Angeles. Whatever outlook the Pacific Outlook might have had was doomed the moment the consolidation was effected.—Oroville Mercury.

The California Outlook, combining two excellent papers in an intensified excellency, is a most welcome addition to our exchange family. Its clear, cogent, commanding advocacy of the cause which makes for the recoronation of The People, is enheartening. Its fair and forceful presentation of the welfare and rights of the average man as against the assertions and aggressions of the special interests, should have the widest possible reading. We trust it will be invited into thousands of homes in Southern California.—Colton Sentinel.

The "California Outlook," in our opinion, is now the best paper published in California where a great many papers are published.

The editors, A. J. Pillsbury and C. D. Willard, are bright, brainy, capable, earnest writers, among the very best the State affords, and best of all, they have the ability to see the truth and the courage to speak it out.

If you were to mail a dollar to the California Outlook at Los Angeles and have the paper come to you for a year, you and your children and your children's children would be better off. Do it now.—Colusa Herald.

The California Outlook, published at San Francisco and Los Angeles, has succeeded the California Weekly of the former city and the Pacific Outlook of the latter. C. D. Willard, who has been editor of the Pacific Outlook and A. J. Pillsbury, who for over two years has had editorial control of the California Weekly, will constitute the editorial staff of the California Outlook. The combination is a strong one and The California Outlook, with consolidated resources and editorial experience and ability, should have a bright future.—Redlands Review.

I appreciate highly the Pacific Outlook and gladly welcome its coming in place of the weekly.—Sarah J. McChesney, San Francisco.

lars more than its capitalization. The other company got some 30 or 40 million dollars less than its capitalization.

I wish to make those two points to show that a municipal valuation commission aims to be fair to corporations, but it must know that the property is really there before it will give a valuation.

Now then, this $50,000,000 having been established, the city and the companies framed up ordinances upon this theory: That the city could buy at any time, after having given six months' notice of its desire to do so, at this $50,000,000, plus whatever new money went into the properties. This new money was to go into the properties under the direction or in accordance with the designs which were to be produced by a certain engineer, named in the ordinances and subject only to the approval of a board of supervising engineers created by those ordinances. The city and the companies delegated their power to this board. This board was composed of three members; first, one representing the city; another representing the companies, and the third being an independent man representing both parties or neither, as you choose to put it, but sitting between the other two and acting as an arbitrator. The city and the companies delegated their power to this board to act for them in all matters. I don't mean to say that it took away any legal rights that they had under the constitution, but so far as it was possible to delegate their powers, they did delegate them to this board.

This is a board which regulates from the inside, as it were, rather than from the outside. You see, it is one-third railroad, one-third city, and one-third neutral, neither city or company or both city and company.

The companies agreed, under the ordinances, to rehabilitate the properties in accordance with plans and specifications prepared by this board, with no limit as to the amount of moneys to be spent, leaving that to the judgment of the board.

The companies were to receive the actual cash cost of this rehabilitation, plus 15 per cent; 5 per cent of which was to be considered as brokerage—namely, what they would have to pay to get the money to rehabilitate. The other ten per cent was considered as profits to these companies, which they would have to pay to any large construction company to create the properties in the first place. Thus, the city recognized that such a property probably could not be created for less than 15 per cent more than the real dollars that they put into the property for material and labor. Therefore, the city can buy, at any time, for this original fifty million dollars, plus whatever money has been put in under the certificates of this board of engineers, which certificates represent the actual cash that went into the property, plus 15 per cent. The company, as a matter of fact, had to pay anywhere from 5 to 8, or sometimes 10 per cent to get the money. So they didn't make the ten per cent. They made anywhere from 5 to 10 per cent. They paid the other for brokerage.

So the price is always fixed at which the city can buy. There never will be any argument about that.

Now, you may ask: How does the city know it will get a railroad worth fifty million dollars plus these sums? The ordinances provide that the railway company must spend at least six per cent of the gross receipts in maintaining its property—that is for ordinary up-keep, furnishing new brake shoes and car wheels and the minor things—and as much more as this board of engineers may from time to time say is necessary for the ordinary up-keep. In addition to that six per cent, plus, that the company must pay in, and may put in more, the ordinances provide that the company shall set aside monthly in the banks designated by the city and approved by the board, or vice versa, eight per cent of the gross receipts of the roads to take care of renewals and depreciation, and as much more than eight per cent as this board from time to time prescribes. In other words, if it is found that eight per cent isn't quite enough to keep the road up, the board can say so, and additional money will be set aside monthly.

So you see we have provided for the reconstruction of the road; we have got it up in first class condition, provided for the ordinary wear and tear, provided for maintenance of the road; so that, when the city sees fit to buy, if it ever does (it has no desire at present and may never have), it either buys a railroad in first class condition, or it takes the railroad in the condition it is at that time and takes the cash that is in the bank. In other words, it buys three-quarters railroad and 25 per cent cash, for which it pays dollar for dollar. It gets a railroad in first class condition, or a railroad and cash enough to put it in first class condition so as to give the service that it requires.

You may ask how we know that the money will be there in the renewal fund. The money goes into that fund monthly and cannot be drawn out of that fund, except over the certificate of this board and can be spent for no other purpose than the renewal of the property of the railroad. I hope I make that clear. It is either in the bank or in the railroad, and it can't get into the railroad unless it goes in for the specific purpose it is kept for. It is the duty of the board to see that that fund is maintained high enough to keep that property up.

Now, I think I have the financial situation outlined so that you can see that we repair the railroad and we renew the railroad. A renewal is defined as the replacing of any principal part of the property, such as a new car, a new engine, a new barn. A repair is a minor thing.

Now then, what do we do with the money that the railway company gets after having taken care of these funds and maintaining the property?

First, we meet the operating expenses. The railway company, out of its gross receipts, deposits its operating expenses, which must be paid as it runs along, including taxes, insurance and this six per cent maintenance.

Then comes out this 8 per cent renewal fund.

Then comes 5 per cent to the railroad company upon the original $50,000,000 plus the sum of these board's certificates—$110,000,000 today. The companies receive five per cent upon the $110,000,000 which they have put into the property. What is left is divided in two parts, 55 per cent of which goes to the city; 45 per cent of which goes to the companies.

Under this working arrangement the companies have received five per cent upon their capitalization; they have put into the city treasury in the last four years $6,000,000 in cash, which goes into a fund which cannot be spent for any purpose except for the purchase of the property or for the creation of other traction properties. We are now contemplating spending that six millions, plus about a million and a half a year towards the construction of a subway. We are contemplating the relief of the congestion in the business center out of this money which we have made out of this road. We will get enough money each year to keep the construction going. So we are in pretty good shape to relieve our congestion.

The city has received six millions of dollars out of this arrangement, the companies have made 5 per cent, and in addition enough money so that they have made from 8 to 10 per cent upon their actual cash in the property during this four years time it has been working, and we have spent $60,000,000 upon the property, and I think without any criticism whatever of any improper expenditure of money.

This board is a non-political board and cannot be touched in any way politieally. The city appoints its representative by the Mayor, approved by the council. The railroads appoint their representative. The third man was named in the ordinances and holds his position for the life of the ordinances (20 years), and the ordinances were ratified by the vote of the people. He can be removed only for cause. If he gets crooked, they remove him. The city and the companies jointly may remove him; but if he conducts himself properly, he cannot be removed. Consequently he is absolutely independent of any political favoritism in any way. Holding the balance of power between the parties, there is no great tendency to make it a political board at all. The result is that we have been left free and have run our affairs just as a business man would run his own affairs. We have rebuilt those properties and put them upon what we believe to be a first class basis, and the citizens are happy about it and the railroad companies are happy, because this board is a buffer between the people who want to get political favors from the roads and the citizens. It works pretty well.

In this four years we have spent sixty million dollars; we have put into the city treasury six million dollars; the companies have made from 8 to 10 per cent upon the actual cash they have in the properties, and we believe we have as good service as there is anywhere in the country, or in the world, as far as that is concerned.

"They charged like demons!" said a retired colonel excitedly at his club. never saw anything like it. The way they charged positively staggered me!" "What does he mean?" whispered a member to his neighbor. "Is he talking about one of his battles?" "No," replied the other; "he is talking about the holiday he spent at the seaside!"—Liverpool Mercury.

...ter by a fight made by organized ...or by the grip of the law. The ...icy of this quality of Bourbonism ...s that of the Sick Man of Europe, ...policy of conceding everything to ...superior force and nothing at all to ...reasonableness or right. Personally, The Watchman is of opinion that the woman's working-day law went at least one, and perhaps two, hours too far; that it is sound policy for legislation to fix the maximum hours of labor conducive to health, leaving the ideal working day to be established, if at all, by organized labor through negotiation as other benefits are achieved. It will not be surprising if many working women find this law a bar to securing employment, or at least a bar to receiving a living wage when they work. The sixteen-hour bill for railroad men serves to show the utter unfitness of the railroads to go uncontrolled. Had they been fit to be trusted they would have had such a regulation of their own making for forty years at least.

People Must Help the Railroad Commission Railroad control has taken a great stride forward under the Legislature just adjourned. It has made more progress than has been made in the previous three decades, but California will not realize the benefits from this legislation that it ought unless the people of California themselves take an interest in having railroading regulated in the public interest. Former commissions have complained, with no little justification, that although they went about the State holding hearings, no complainants came before them at times when the press and rostrum were noisy with complaint. It is the old story of what is everybody's business being nobody's business, and, inasmuch as the merchant can tax up the freight to the purchaser, and the purchaser does not know how much he is so taxed, injustice is often submitted to through default of the parties directly in interest. That is not good. It is almost as wrong to submit to an injustice without protest as to inflict an injustice, the more especially to the injury of an unknowing third party. The present commission will do all it can to obtain justice for the patrons of our railroads, but it cannot do all that needs to be done unless those who are cognizant of the facts lay them before the commission frankly and with all the evidence needful for their establishment. If the people of California will help the railroad commission the railroad commission will help the people of California to a more just and roundly equitable treatment at the hands of our common carriers who, heretofore, have not merely been a law unto themselves but unto the rest of us also.

conviction that they are discharging a high patriotic duty.

Despite all this he is no party slave. In national politics on the broad party issues he is still a Republican, but in local affairs he knows no party and has voted and endorsed men who bore no party label. He was one of the original non-partisans in California, an honor in itself.

Nelson Aldrich is about the same age as the Mayor and Joseph Cannon is but a little older, but they have not been able to keep their minds young.

Simplicity is the dominant characteristic of the city's chief executive. It is the kind of simplicity that includes honesty and directness that is sometimes brusque. An instance: A man came to him with strong letters of introduction asking him to write another similar letter to a public official. The purpose of the letter the Mayor was to write was to obtain for the bearer the complete confidence of the public official to whom it was to be addressed.

"I can't write such a letter for you," the Mayor said, courteously, but firmly. "I know these men whose letters you have but I don't know you. You might have obtained these letters in the same way you want to get this one from me. I am sorry but I'll have to refuse for I make it a rule never to write a letter of introduction for a man who isn't known to me personally and I never say anything in a letter that I don't mean."

His home life has always been particularly pleasant. He and his wife have their modest home at 230 West Thirty-first street. The cottage is comfortable and unpretentious, but it it free from debt. The place is valued at about $5,000 and it represents practically all he has accumulated during a long career in public life. Office holding has not proved profitable to him in dollars, though it has in satisfaction.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander have two children, a daughter who lives with them and a son, Frank A. Alexander, who is a prosperous merchant in Redlands. To these he is always known as "Pa."

His one extravagance, of which he has always felt a little guilty and ashamed, is an electric runabout which he insisted on buying for Mrs. Alexander. It is out of harmony with his mode of life in other respects. As showing once more how quick the Mayor is to adopt new ideas it may be remarked that he learned to operate the auto in a single day and Mrs. Alexander never sees him drive away from home in it that she doesn't expect him to come back in the custody of a policeman.

Judicial Powers in Law-making

The judicial issue in American politics was rightly stated by Frank J. Loesch, one of the leaders of the Chicago bar, in a professional address recently before the Illinois Bar Association. Referring to the referendum as intended now to apply only to legislation, Mr. Loesch said:

"But courts make law as well as declare it. What is to hinder, as the next logical step in democratic progress, having a referendum on opinions and jugments of the Supreme Court upon politico-legal questions? Or, if this is too great a stretch of the imagination, we can have a practical question in the recall."

What is to hinder? Only one thing. And that? A reversal of the judicial policy of overruling people's laws. The courts must take themselves out of politics. Mr. Loesch evidently had this alternative in mind in asking his question, for in his enumeration of the causes of discontent with the judiciary, he defined one of them as "the political power vested in our courts."

No desire or purpose to interfere with legitimate judicial functions has or ever will inspire any popular demand for a recall for judges. Let the courts limit their decisions, not only professedly but actually, to applying the people's laws to particular controversies, and the public mind will be content with any plan for the appointment and tenure of office of judges that tends to secure the best judicial service. But so long as the courts continue to make law, they perform political functions and must be subject to political control,—which in a republic means people's power. That is to say, if judges are to continue making laws, their office must be an elective office, and they must be subject to recall like any other law-makers. Better incompetent judges who make good laws, than able judges who make bad laws.

Nor alone as matter of public safety must law-making judges be under popular control; they soon will be, as matter of historical probability. We have seen how the attempt to keep our Presidential office out of politics by means of the Electoral College has resulted; we may see a similar result from letting the Supreme Court into politics. We are seeing how futile in the long run the effort was to put the election of Senators ontside of people's rule; we may see how futile in the long run the effort was to substitute Supreme Court decisions for people's rule. What the extra-Constitutional nominations for President were in making an empty formality of Electoral College functions, and the Oregon plan has been in making an empty formality of the legislative function of choosing Senators, so may the recall—yes, even the referendum—come to be with reference to law-making by the courts.

Gentlemen of the bar—you who plead with the people to hold the judicial office sacred, to respect judges in office, to bow to the decisions of the courts as oracular—you are answered by one of your own leaders, one who has analyzed and reflected as some of you have not. Divest the courts of political power, and your pleading shall not be in vain. Under no circumstances should courts be sacrosanct, but as arbitrators in litigations even their errors are better than perpetual private warfare. For that reason they and their decisions should be respected—rationally, not superstitiously. But vested with political power, so that their decisions may repeal laws made by the people and make laws to which the people are opposed, they become absolute governors of the Republic. In that capacity they must be subject to all the safeguards against the despotism that always springs from concentrated power, to which any other political department of republican government is or may be subjected. Take your choice, gentlemen: election and recall of judges, or relinquishment by the judiciary of all the law-making and law-repealing power it has assumed. The issue will not end with Arizona if she comes into the Union with her people's power constitution; it will not vanish if President Taft ventures to keep her out of the Union.—The Public.

A Real Legislator

McLachlan's successor as Congressman from the Seventh California District, William D. Stephens (former mayor of Los Angeles), is studying law by way of increasing his ability as a legislator. He entered the law school of the University of Southern California immediately after his election last November. All this evinces good stuff in the man.—Napa Register.

California's Insurgent Congressmen

A Miracle Performed

THE PRESENT LEGISLATURE has achieved the impossible. It returns home to be met not with sneers and contempt and abuse, which is the time-honored fate of such bodies, but with congratulations, compliments and admiration. Instead of being ashamed of their position as members of the Legislature, men are now allowed and even encouraged to be proud of it.

Thus another of those things that "cannot be done" is done. The vicious chain is broken. The argument used to run thus: because the people had no confidence in the Legislature, decent men would not try for membership, and if they did try they would be defeated; therefore we got bad men, and they did bad work, and the contempt of the people for the institution increased and so on. But the Lincoln-Roosevelt League broke one link in the chain: that good men could not be induced to run. And the people broke the next link by electing these men. The men themselves broke the next link by doing good work. Through that good work the last link, the contempt of the people for the Legislature is smashed to atoms, and a new era begins. And the people of this State should visit with their eternal condemnation any party or set of men or any newspapers that should strive to bring back the old order of things.

Diaz Coming Through

DISAFFECTION IN MEXICO must be both deep and wide to make Porfirio Diaz acknowledge the justification for the national discontent as he has done. If he has acknowledged so much, how much greater must have been the oppression of his people than he acknowledges? Diaz is no first offender to pour out with unbounded contrition the whole contents of his heart. The truth, if fully known, would prove an autocracy in Mexico as galling as that of Russia with less of excuse for its maintenance, for Mexico has an object lesson in freedom only across the border while the Russians must cross oceans to reach one.

National Municipal League

MEYER LISSNER of Los Angeles, who is a member of the Executive Committee of the National Municipal League, will convey to that organization a request from Los Angeles that the next meeting of the League be held in that city. The gathering of the League is usually held in the fall of the year. The attendance is not large and the convention has no particular value in a business way, and yet it will be serviceable to Los Angeles and for that matter San Francisco as well, for the delegates will undoubtedly visit both cities and perhaps others on the coast, in the study and discussion these municipal experts will give to local conditions.

There is peculiar appropriateness in the League's visit to California for this is one of the few states in the Union where its private doctrine of complete home rule for cities has been worked out. In this region many political experiments have been first tried, some of them, like the recall, with such success that a movement in their favor has spread all over the Union. If these experts have some thing to show us, we on our part have also something to show them.

Mr. Lissner proposed to the Los Angeles Council, and the suggestion was adopted, that a sum of money, not exceeding $5000, be appropriated to pay the expense of getting advice from several of the municipal experts who will visit the city if the convention is held there, as to the best form of organic law for Los Angeles. This may result in a very interesting and valuable line of discussion.

A Bit Tardy

M. H. DE YOUNG has been quoted as saying that San Francisco will derive little of permanent value from the Panama-Pacific Exposition. This from one of the boosters! The issue raised in the minds of thoughtful persons was not as to whether or not San Francisco will derive any benefit at all from the exposition, for some permanent benefit it must derive unless it makes a fiasco of the whole enterprise, which is not likely, but as to whether or not the same expenditure of effort and capital might yield a much larger and more permanent advantage if devoted, for instance, to a rehabilitation of San Francisco's commercial and industrial trade. Of this there can scarcely be two opinions, but any discussion as to what might have been is now out or order. The subject before city and state is how to make the exposition, now determined upon, the greatest possible success with the least possible scandal. Mr. De Young is a bit tardy.

What For?

TAX ASSOCIATIONS are being formed in a number of California cities, as well as in counties, to be federated into a common organization that shall prove a power in the State. What for? Will this association give its attention to such a solution of the taxation problem as will place the burden of taxation where, in justice and mercy, in efficiency and fairness, that burden ought to be placed, or is it being formed to defend the existing order against the assaults of those who would take from what we all of us create a generous portion to be used for the benefit of all of us, to the hurt of speculators only? There is perhaps no other problem involving the Rights of Man so deserving of investigation and study as the problem of taxation in support of government.

Why So Late?

AFTER THIRTY YEARS or more of school census taking, as a basis for apportionment of State school moneys, we are now to apportion those moneys on the basis of those who go to school to get the good of it. Why was that reform so late in coming? Why were State school moneys ever apportioned in any other way? Was it because San Francisco, and a few other selfish cities, that are wont to send school children into factories, stores and offices, instead of to school, wished to draw from the State fund a larger share than by right should go to them for the doing of an educational work that they do not do? Or was it just an all around imbecility of government? The reason why would be of interest but the important thing is that the right way has come at last, and that it was our side that brought it.

Natural Cussedness

WE ARE ALL ACQUAINTED with "natural cussedness," but it was left for Massachusetts to account for its existence. Its explanation is furnished in the term, "arrested development." A child, perhaps of twelve, for some physical reason or other, often ill nourishment or lack of training, goes on growing older and larger but without development of mind or soul. When we reflect how full of "natural cussedness" every normal child of twelve to fourteen is we can readily understand what a nuisance, if not worse, it will become at twenty or twenty-four if its body grows and its mind and character do not. Another good reason why the welfare of every child should be looked after by parents, city and state is that if normal development can be maintained right along until adult life is reached, half the petty criminals that vex us will be prevented. After maturity they can only be killed, not cured. This explanation is both simple and satisfying and to Massachusetts must be given the glory for ever and ever.

Naive

WE ARE gravely informed by cable that King Alfonso called Premier Canalejas into his presence and instructed him to constitute a new ministry, when, as all the world knows, the prime minister sent word to the King to come home, told him what he wanted him to do and the King did it. Fortunate is Spain in having a man with enough of grip upon affairs to make even the King do his bidding, else there would be Weiler in the saddle and blood to the bridles of the horses.

His Royal Lineage

GENEALOGISTS, having nothing better to do, and of all faddists the genealogical one is about the least consequential, have figured out that Theodore Roosevelt, on his maternal side, is descended from Robert Bruce only twenty generations back. Two, four, eight, sixteen, etc., back twenty removes, supplies Colonel Roosevelt with 1,048,576 ancestors, so that, at best, he is one part Robert Bruce to 1,048,575 parts other people who have gone before. Being a sensible man it is not remarkable that the genealogists who went to the trouble to look up his pedigree complained that Theodore Roosevelt manifested less interest in the result than they did. It really was not [illegible] necessary to carry the research back many removes [illegible] his ancestry multiple every person then living in both Scotland and Holland. Why should the spirit of mortal wax proud over pedigree?

A Voice That Will Be Heard

All over this nation and all over the world men and women comfortably circumstanced are demanding to know why it is that the strata beneath them are troubled, why there should be unrest, why the great human mass should upheave and quake and threaten convulsion. Are not they who toil better off, they ask, than their ancestors were in any period of the world's history? Are not the people better housed, better fed, their children more adequately educated, the largesses of charity more generous, the beneficent institutional life of the world more ample? Then what is the matter with them that they, "The People," do not rest content as they are?

If the especially comfortable and prosperous themselves, attempt to answer their own questions they do so by laying the whole trouble at the doors of the journalistic muckrakers and sensational newspapers who are charged with inciting the populace in order that the first may find a market for their writings and the second sale for their periodicals, forgetting that if the human mass were unconcerned the writings of the muckrakers would go without a market for the reason that the periodicals that contain them would remain unsold.

The voice that is making itself heard, and in tones so deep and strong as to shake old institutions to their foundations, is the voice of Democracy. Until now Democracy has spoken in tones uncertain or in anger or bitterness of spirit. It is speaking now with self-reliant and self-confident power, determined to make itself heard and its will supreme. In France and Germany it speaks in terms of Socialism; in Russia, in the language of the Russian Revolution; in Italy, Spain and Portugal, in the vernacular of a philosophical or militant Anarchism; in Great Britain, in protest against hereditary parliamentary power; in the United States, as a New Nationalism. It is, in truth, the voice of a Democracy of all Mankind demanding to be heard in regard to all those things that concern the life, the happiness, the well-being of the human race.

It will not satisfy this Voice to be alone heard in politics. It will have democracy in industry as certainly as democracy in government and only a blinded Bourbonism will seek to deny it a hearing or to regard its wishes with unconcern. This does not spell the coming of Socialism unless everything short of Socialism is denied to Democracy, in which event nothing short of Socialism or anarchy, one or other, can be hoped for. As men have, in government, fought for the right to cast a ballot and have that ballot counted, so now they are ready to fight to have something to say about the hours, conditions, compensations to be received by such of them as toil for a wage. If that Voice be not heard then the wage-system will go, to follow slavery and serfdom, and, with it, will go that affluent and elegant ease without which, to those who have it, life seems not worth the living.

Is this demand to be heard collectively and heedingly, within itself so very unreasonable? Did it matter nothing to the hundred and fifty and more workers in that East Side factory that found their working-place a funeral pyre because there were inadequate fire escapes upon the building? Is the reply of the employer, that if the conditions were not to the liking of the workers they could take themselves elsewhere, sufficient to satisfy this world-embracing Democratic Voice? Not so. Democracy has learned that a theoretical liberty, apart from an actual, is not the sort that gives light to the world; that the woman who must take the work she can get or go hungry has no real liberty of choice; that the man who must accept the wage offered him without regard to what the employer can afford to pay, whether or not it be a saving or even a living wage, is not the freeman that Democracy has taught him he has a right to become. Democracy demands the real thing or nothing and nothing short of complete victory or final defeat will hush the Voice now calling throughout the world.

The Voice of the twentieth-century Democracy will make itself heard. In vain may Bourbonistic employers refuse to contract collectively, while themselves enjoying corporate and cooperate bargaining to the full. In vain may supreme courts set up puny pleas that employers' liability laws are unconstitutional because of deprivations of property without due process of law. Protestants and reactionaries, whether on benches, in congresses and legislatures or in counting-rooms, will be swept from their places like farm buildings before tornadoes.

Democracy is speaking with power. Read the history of the Taft administration, the review of the legislature just terminated in this State, listen to the pleas and promises of the Diaz dynasty in Mexico, the wails from the Lords of Britain, and then question, if one dare, this power. Not since God said: "Let there be Light," has there been in the world a voice so potent as that democratic Voice now calling to be heard in government and in industry, for peace and fraternity for equality of opportunity in all the walks of life. It will make itself heard. The will of The People is to be the supreme law of every land. Once again the Spirit of God moves on the face of the deep. As there "was Light" then so will there be Liberty now, full, free, practical, participating, yielding opportunity (not equality) for all. Whether this is to be achieved in the form of a democratized industry or in Socialism, or is to be lost in a Waterloo of anarchy, is for employers to say. The issue is up to them.

Ordering Out the Reserves

THE PROGRESSIVE FORCES in California are in possession of the state government and they control in the second largest city and a dozen or two of the smaller cities. The Legislature is theirs by a good working majority and the machinery of the dominant party is in their hands. Their governor is a man of force and character and is making a fine record, and the body that has just adjourned from Sacramento seems to have achieved the impossible, viz., to have shown that a California Legislature can be honest, independent and devoted to the people's interest.

All this looks good and gives promise of future success when issues are again joined at the polls. But there is another side to the story. The vote for Johnson at the polls was a trifle less than that of his combined adversaries, and several of the Progressive nominees for state offices failed. The big city of San Francisco is in the hands of the enemy, and there are a score of smaller cities and many counties where the old machine still works. Our winning was based not alone on our own activity but also on the unspeakable folly of our opponents. This was true not only in California but also throughout the nation, for a succession of stupid breaks on the part of the Stand-patters had sent Insurgency to the very top of the wave.

A reaction is inevitable. The day is coming when every inch of ground we have captured will be stoutly contested by the enemy, and every battle must be fought anew. In the meantime the issues dividing the forces of progress from those of reaction will have grown to much greater proportions. In 1910 these were simple, fundamental and clear-cut—should the Southern Pacific or the people control the politics and the government of the state? But as the question was primary, so was the answer incomplete and inadequate. The people were given the government, but what they would do with it, and how well they would like their own work when it was done, was still a problem. The state administration has given a practical answer, but there is much more to come. And none of us can foretell how it will be received. On the other hand the forces of reaction are unchanged and immovable, backed by all the power of wealth and privilege and the prestige of ancient victories. The struggle before us may be titanic; but the thought of defeat for such a cause is intolerable.

At such a crisis the prudent commander looks over the field for possible reinforcements. They are not far to seek. For every progressive vote cast in the late contest or held in readiness now, there are two or more waiting in the great reserve corps that watches the contest from a distance. Undisciplined, inexperienced and even unarmed as yet, they are nevertheless eager enough to take part in the fray, and it will not be long before weapons will be put in their hands and they will be summoned into service.

What kind of weapons? Why, votes for women, to be sure!

Pulling the Wool

A NEW and interesting feature in the advertising pages of all the spring magazines is the announcement of the Woolen Trust that it is highly desirous of having the good will of the American people. Although it has nothing that admits of legitimate advertising, for its sales are never direct to the consumer and it has a closed trust market for its wares, nevertheless it has appropriated a large bunch of money out of its surplus and has started out on a missionary campaign to gain the favor of public sentiment. Thus the Philadelphia Evening Post gets two full pages of display a week, and the New York Outlook has a reading story covering 16 pages. Both of these periodicals are known to be opposed to the present tariff on wool.

Collier's tells us how the thing works. That paper published a page advertisement of the wool factory and then deliberately ran an editorial, denouncing schedule "K." Straightway there came to hand a diplomatically worded letter from the head of the Trust, asking whether it was customary and was it in accordance with good taste and business ethics to attack the interests of one of the paper's customers.

Of course Collier's is broad enough and brave enough, and, what is more to the point, rich enough, to stand a jolt of this kind, but the same is not true of all publications. Note how many of them will fall down completely. Others will continue to favor wool tariff reduction—with all the ginger left out. "But in making this reduction we must proceed slowly with due consideration of the rights of vested interests, etc." We can all whistle the tune and can almost give the very words.

These advertisements tell us that there are a quarter of a million people at work in the woolen factories. That is one out of every 360 of the population. The one is usually a Slavonian or a Hun who works like a horse and lives like a dog. His employer pays him what he must to keep him from working elsewhere. The other 359 of us pay from a dollar to two dollars for a 50 or 75 cent garment or piece of goods, theoretically for the benefit of the one, but in reality to enrich the owner of stock in the woolen trust.

About a century ago England had four or five people starving to one that was well fed. There was a tariff on wheat of a dollar a bushel, kept there for the benefit of the farmers who were about one-fifth of the population. But the working farmers were as poor as the rest, because they rented their lands of the gentry and the latter demanded all the profits. At last, after several million people had died from under feeding, and there were incessant bread riots and threats of revolution, even the statesmen were able to see the point, and the tariff was abolished. To this day, if you say "protection" to an English workman he makes a wry face. He had his illustration of how the game can be worked in such a raw and rudimentary form that he has never lost the lesson.

We do not starve people in this country to any great extent but we certainly do kill them off pretty fast with consumption and pneumonia and other diseases of exposure. Are there 100,000 people who are really benefited by the high tariff on wool and would be actually hurt by its lowering? Possibly; and that is the number that die in this country every year from tuberculosis, a disease specifically of the poor, for which the only remedy is plenty of fresh air, and complete protection of the body from cold. For every one that dies there are nearly a score that are affected and are fighting hard for their lives. Have these million or more of people no standing in the argument? We do not see them mentioned in the elaborate case set forth by the woolen trust.

The Unhappy Rich

A YEAR OR TWO before the outbreak of the Civil War a Southerner, named Helper, published a book, "The Impending Crisis," which was comparable to "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in the uproar it created and was reckoned one of the causes of the great struggle that presently ensued. Helper belonged to the order of society known in the South as "Poor Whites"—people that kept no slaves and were "out of it" socially, politically, financially and every other way. His book is a pathetic document, even when read today, more than half a century since it was written, and more than two score of years since the peculiar institution of which he complains passed away.

Helper's objection to slavery was not that it hurt the blacks, but that it ruined the whites. He contrasted North and South in their growth and real prosperity, showing the complete absence of the artisan middle class in the slave-owning states. In a community where bondsmen did most of the work, there could be no recognition of the dignity of honest labor; and the poor man, no matter though he was white, must sink into the depths of lowest degradation. It was the pitiful cry of a submerged class, helpless and hopeless.

Everybody's Magazine has been publishing a series of papers, concluded with the April number, entitled "The Passing of the Idle Rich." They purport to be written by a man of large wealth, moving in the highest New York society, who claims the right by association and experience to speak the sentiments of his class. The internal evidence of the articles themselves seems to support this claim as to their authorship, although the virility and grasp of the discussion of social and economic problems showing in the second and third paper suggest the presence of a collaborator, while the first paper contains just the thin, kindly and soft stuff one would expect from a "society leader" left to his own devices in literary composition. In other words, the performance may be composite, but it is none the less significant and well worth reading.

We have referred to Helper's "Impending Crisis," because of the peculiar and almost touching parallel between that work and the "Idle Rich" papers. In each case there speaks a distinct social and economic class through a genuine representative. Each writer depicts a state of ruin of his class brought about by the heavy pressure of a vicious industrial system—in 1858, slavery; in 1911, privilege. The ruin took the form—at the earlier date—of material poverty; at the later date, it appears in the shape of moral and intellectual barrenness. History makes no question as to which fate is the worse of the two. Out of the poor whites of the South came Abraham Lincoln. From the idle rich comes Harry Thaw. Individuals, nations and the whole human race have suffered the very last extreme of poverty and have somehow survived, but no form of society can long endure the corrosion of luxury and sloth.

Are the idle rich "passing" as the writer contends? While the general tone of the articles is sorrowful and all but hopeless, he describes two influences, one from within his class and one from without, that give promise of a better adjustment between the world and those who enjoy the fullness thereof. He finds that the younger generation of the rich, have, within the last few years, begun to demand a right to labor for themselves, affected in some degree by the growing public contempt for their class and in some measure by the baleful results of idleness which they behold in their elders. The influence from without is the active public sentiment in favor of legislation that will break up the big fortunes and scatter them among the people at large. The latter is as yet little more than a tendency, although the income tax, the inheritance tax and the curbing of corporations are concrete examples of the measures to be adopted. But as to the cure from within—the disposition on the part of the rich to reform themselves, to resume their ancestral habits of industry and thrift and voluntarily to carry their part of the world's burden—is this a reality or a dream, a genuine class movement or the fad of a few individuals?

The social structure has grown too complicated and its elements are too intimately related, for any one class or any set of individuals to work out their salvation alone and by a process of self-reform. These papers on the idle rich—not unique, for the same story has been told by others—are in their last analysis a Macedonian cry for help. True, it is merely the utterance of an individual, and we may question whether the rich, as a class, appreciate how the very luxury they court is destroying them; but the loss to the Republic when the brains and energy of great industrial leadership runs out to vapid nothingness in one or two generations is none the less real and deplorable; and just as this nation had to abolish slavery not merely for the benefit of the slaves but to redeem the whites as well, so it must abolish excessive wealth not alone to help the poor but to save the rich from the poison of their useless lives.

Might He Not Prove Quarrelsome?

The satisfaction with which British sentiment received the suggestion of the President, that the two English-speaking nations should join in making such an all-embracing treaty as will leave no form of controversy that may not be settled through arbitration, should not be lost on the American mind. Such a treaty might establish such a precedent as would lift the burden of war-footing from the back of the world, but the suggestion of Britain that the "dreibund" go so far as to place the navies of both nations at the disposal of either one, in the event of war, is to be entertained with respectful passivity. There lurks a fear that, with Uncle Sam for backing, John Bull might indulge his propensity to bluff and so become quarrelsome. Let those who make the quarrels be the only ones to fight.

The Stayless Torso

It has been put out, perhaps as a feeler, that, the harem skirt achieved, the next innovation of fashion will be the abandonment of splints in doing women up in attractive packages, that their native suppleness and grace may not be stiffly obscured. So far as husbands, and other girls' brothers, are concerned the amendment will doubtless be accepted, with the proviso that lean women may still pad and that the fat and flabby may substitute swaddling bands for corsets. No man of sound mind will make objection to woman making herself as attractive as possible, no matter how she does it. It is her propensity to do quite the other thing that drives her consort to distraction.

There are now five States in which the women vote. In the others they merely control the voters.—Los Angeles Herald.

To the man who would succeed, a wishbone is not in it with a backbone.—Puck.

Practicality Vindicated Fifty years of railroad herding had given the people of California, away down deep, a feeling that legislatures would be little safer turned loose than marauding Apache bands, that they would all of them be "out for stuff" if not for scalps. Well, for one thing, the thirty-ninth session of the legislature of California proved to the people that a free Legislature is a practical thing, that the people can elect Senators and Assemblymen whom it will be safe to permit to stand unhitched and go unherded. What has been done once can be done more than once. Walter Parker was not on the watch and Jere Burke was conspicuous by his absence, and yet the state treasury was not looted and our "Western Wild Horses" early settled into their traces and worked like plow teams the whole legislative season through. The session's contingent expenses were some $10,000 less than those of the session previous, although the thirty-ninth session lasted five days longer. The quality of retrenchment was not drastic, but there were fewer squealing pigs avid for trough or pie counter. The practicality of a free legislature has been vindicated.

Will The People Stand Steadfast? It will avail California little to have demonstrated that a free legislature is a practical thing unless the people steadfastly determine that no other sort of Legislature will be tolerated. It is an incident of blessed memory to many that, once in a while, a much enduring Mother rose in her wrath and gave the household a clar'n out, not even suffering Dad to go unadmonished for his shortcomings, but alas! afterward, when the maternal indignation had spent its force, the household fell back into the old careless ways and Mother went about as patiently as maybe picking up after one and all from Dad to Baby. A community, a city, county, state, even a nation, is only a larger family now and again set to rights with righteous wrath and then suffered to drift back into the old order, or disorder, perhaps not quite as intolerable as of old, but only some better at best. Is this to be the fruits of insurgency against the old order in California? The old "organization" is counting on it. There is not a malefactor of them all who is not abiding his time in his tent, with powder dry, awaiting the relaxation of the popular vigil, the indifference of the voter, that tired feeling in the public mind, with the purpose of entering upon a campaign of reaction when the psychological moment shall arrive. If this were not so, half of Herrin's men would be out-surging the insurgents, consumed with zeal for the new order. The test of fitness to be free does not consist in doing a good thing once, but in keeping right on doing it. There are plenty more "bully fights" where the fight just won came from. For instance, we must be up and at 'em for the good things to be added to our constitution October 10.

Shall We Fall Out Among Ourselves? There is another possible opening into which the ever vigilant Herrin will thrust the thin edge of his handy wedge if ever so small a rift develops. Indeed, his entire political policy may be summed up in this: "Divide the opposition and then make common cause with one faction as against the other." Can the forces of reform in California maintain an unbroken front? They must do it if the ground that has been gained is to be held. Like the signers of the Declaration of Independence, the leaders of this movement must hang together or they will hang separately. During the late session of the legislature every effort was made to develop a line of disaffection between Governor Johnson and Meyer Lissner, between Governor Johnson and Lieutenant-Governor Wallace, between anybody and everybody who stood for Right Things and anybody or everybody else. Fortunately, the more dissensions reported the more closely the reform ranks closed up and the better front they presented against insidious attack. And yet it is no easy thing to hold together for a common purpose several hundred independent, individualistic, free minded men! Good men differ at a thousand points and many a good man, zealous for Right Things, gets switched off at a tangent on some point of pique or precedence, or on some issue of minor importance, to the almost incurable injury of the cause he fights for. What a time Lincoln had with such men in his army and in his cabinet! Meanwhile one whiff of good graft, one smell of political patronage, will bring bad men into each other's arms and set them to marching to a quickstep shoulder to shoulder. This also must be looked out for, we must not fight our own friends upon any occasion.

One Crucial Test of Faith The final, crucial test of the faith of the reform element will come when Governor Johnson distributes the offices at his disposal. He has been so busy with the Legislature that a number of official positions are still held by the appointees of former Governor Gillett. Not all of them were rampant "organization" men. Some of them have held over from the Pardee administration and some new positions have been created by recent legislation. There will be anywhere from half a dozen to forty candidates for each office carrying a salary, but only one person can be fitted into each such niche. Are those who do not get in going to feel sore, be grouchy, throw down their arms and refuse any longer to fight in the ranks for Right Things? Are they going to exclaim, in the language of Jim Rea, "damn the man who makes a slate and leaves me out it"? The natural man, the man who has only been born once and that very early in his career, is likely to feel that if he works for a cause more than another he should have the office he has set his eye on and not that other and, so he should, other things being equal, but the supreme test should be that of fitness for the position in question and it is not always that a person is the best judge of his own qualifications. Besides, we must all of us leave Governor Johnson some margin for making mistakes. Every executive does. The wisest cannot always know how an appointee is going to fit his job until after he has been tried in it and then every fool can tell. What The Watchman wants is this: To see the forces of reform, now so splendidly triumphant, stay put and stand pat. We are not yet half through with this "bully fight" of ours. There is only one good and that is the common good, in whose cause we are enlisted 'till the end of the war.

Good-By To Simple Life When we see in cold, black figures that the recent Legislature enacted 1032 statutes, amendments, joint and concurrent resolutions, and realize that not only are our new codes back numbers already, but that a bulky volume of statues must be added to our libraries if we would make good the legal presumption that every man knows the laws, we are inclined to remind the legislators that the state capitol is not a factory but a place for deliberation. But it is of no use to kick against the pricks. Our social order is coming to be fearfully and wonderfully complicated even under an individualistic civilization. We touch each other at ten thousand more points than we did in pioneering times when plain horse stealing occupied the premier position on the criminal calendar. California in common with the other states of the Union, has bidden good by to the simple life and we may as well resign ourselves to a regulated existence first as last. Besides, while a great part of the legislating done is like unto digging holes at one session only to fill them up at the next, let us remember in extenuation of the possible excess of legislative industry that our Senators and Assemblymen are fitting and trying to the best of their ability to make the machinery of government work better than it has been working. How else can progress be made? To cease to try would be to cease to make headway at all. Let us take the will for the deed where we cannot accept the deed at par value. We are yet a long way short of that philosophical anarchy that needs no law at all.

Justification For Freak Legislation Complaint was made that no little attempted legislation of the recent session was of the freak order. Let us think kindly of that also even if we cannot champion it. Again we have to look to results rather than to accepted principles of legislation. Spitting on sidewalks and in street cars was an abominable practice due to heedlessness. Legislation penalized it. Fines have seldom been imposed and yet there is not now one spitty-spat on a walk to where there were a hundred a decade ago. Is the treating habit at the foundation of drunkenness and drunkenness the foundation of the liquor evil? Then why not penalize treating? The answer is that treating is not within itself a wrong and to prohibit it would be to invade personal liberty. Shall we endure the curse of excessive liquor drinking forever because to legislate against it would be to seek to regulate the social conduct of individuals? Tacoma says not and the whole country is laughing at Tacoma for its freak legislation. Wait and see. Tacoma's anti-treating ordinances will, first, be the sport of the bibulous fraternity, but the evil consequences of treating will be the talk of the town, of the state and of other towns and other states. If Tacoma stands to its guns and fights it out on that line, treating in Tacoma will diminish one-half in a year and another half of that half in another year. Men who formerly treated will say "Pardon me, but I must obey the law," and the liquor evil will diminish that three-fourths in a decade as a result of freak legislation. Are the sheets at hotels too short for long men so that their toes stick out? Freak legislation will lengthen those sheets and, apparently, nothing else will. Considerable can be said for freak legislation. It may be puerile, but it very nearly does what it sets out to do. There is that at least to justify it.

Pasadena Elects Berkeley's Mayor The election of J. Stitt Wilson mayor of Berkeley on Saturday last, gave not only Berkeley, but all the other bay cities a sharp shock. It was not looked for. It was known that the Herrin old guard was doing what it could for the Socialist ticket, with the view of teaching the reform forces to keep their places and, hereafter, suffer gentlemen who make politics their business to attend to the business of governing, but that vote could not, alone, have turned the scale to J. Stitt Wilson and away from Beverley L. Hodghead, the incumbent, a splendid man with a splendid record The number of downright Socialists in Berkeley is not legion. It was Pasadena's experiment in supplying its own electric power and lights that turned the scale. The Hodghead

THE COMMITMENT OF THE INSANE IN CALIFORNIA

From an Address Delivered Before the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco by A. W. Hoisholt, M. D.

(Dr. Hoisholt is a graduate of Cooper Medical College, San Francisco, and of the University of Heidelberg, Germany (1884), and has spent four years abroad in the study of medicine, especially nervous and mental diseases. He has been assistant physician at the Stockton State Hospital since October 1, 1889. —Editor.)

During the last twenty-five or thirty years, the only change made in connection with the commitment of the insane has been a change in the make-up of the examination blank furnished the two physicians who are called upon to examine a case of insanity. More questions are asked in this blank form than were contained in the form furnished the physicians prior to the advent of the State Commission in Lunacy, about sixteen years ago; but while they aim at a more thorough examination, the practical results are in the majority of instances not an improvement upon the information and judgment brought out in commitments a quarter of a century ago. The qualifications exacted of the examiners in lunacy are no greater today than they were in the '80's, and the work done by the average examiner is not better than was the case many years ago. The fact remains that the physicians called upon to do this work do not, on an average, carry out this work with the same energy that is asked of them in private cases of consultation of one physician with another. The majority of commitment papers on the face of them still show a hurried routine manner of carrying out the examination. There is some excuse for not getting papers showing a good knowledge of psychiatry or insanity, seeing that the medical schools in general, as well as those on this coast, take so little interest in an up-to-date instruction in psychiatry. It will therefore be some time before the general practitioner can be expected to be possessed of this knowledge. More energy, however, to get at detailed facts can be expected to be thrown into the inquiry, but this will probably not be developed until the law and regulations governing the subject are changed, or until our judges of the Superior Courts realize the importance of better and more energetic work.

The inquiry into the mental state of a person alleged to be insane is still largely looked upon as being in the main a legal inquiry—the judge not infrequently thinking that he knows as much or more about it than the physician; while in reality it should be regarded as chiefly a medical investigation supervised by the judge, with the object of protecting the legal rights and interests of the person about to be deprived of his liberty for a shorter or longer period of time.

I have reason to think that in some instances the commitment paper hardly does justice to the work which under the particular circumstances had been devoted to the case under examination; perhaps because the physician did not feel that he could afford to bestow the time which the proper writing up of the case required. It is for this reason that I advise in the paper about to appear in the April number of the State Medical Journal, that a stenographic report of the testimony of witnesses at the examination or "trial," as it is still often called, be taken, and appended to the order of commitment. This employment of a stenographer will not only give inspiration to more thorough work by the examiners, but will be of great assistance to the asylum physicians in coming to an understanding of the nature of the mental disease.

The poor unfortunate, the insane person, is brought before the medico-legal committee of three, consisting of two physicians presided over by a judge of a Superior Court, who, in the majority of cases, see him for the first and last time at this examination. He is observed and questioned, but in most instances the greatest source of information upon which knowledge of the case is based is the testimony of persons who appear as witnesses to his behavior prior to his apprehension, or "arrest," as it is called. It is almost a regular occurrence to find that some of this testimony is faulty, or incorrect; mostly, it would seem, because of the hastiness with which it is gone over, which faultiness of testimony tends to confuse the understanding of the case when it is subjected to a re-examination by the hospital physician; at any rate frequently causing a delay in arriving at medical conclusions there.

The new law, enacted sixteen years ago, appeared to provide for better qualified examiners in lunacy by the requirement of an application for appointment as examiner, which for a short time was confined to one, two or more physicians, with their alternates, according to the size of the community. Of real educational requirements, however, there were none, and it was but a short time before quite a number of physicians had been appointed in each county, with the exception of the City and County of San Francisco, where the number of examiners has for years been limited to four. In the new law it was provided that the person arrested should be detained five days before commitment should finally be determined upon. This proviso has in the course of time been disregarded so generally that of late it has become a not infrequent observation that persons, in whose cases there was no reason for a hurried transfer, have reached the asylum in twenty-four to thirty-six hours from the time of their arrest. There should of course be no routine to be followed in all cases. In very acute mental illness, unnecessary delay should be avoided, while in others, for instance certain alcoholics, a delay of a few days would frequently tend to a convalescence from the self-limited state of delirium tremens, where this had not been recognized.

If the history of the case were carefully ferreted out, as many witnesses being examined as the particular case might require, and their testimony dictated to a stenographer, the information would not only be of great assistance to a correct understanding of the case after its admission to the hospital, but the extra expense would probably lead to a saving of further outlay by the State in unnecessary commitments in cases of delirium tremens or questionable insanity. The former land in the asylum by no means infrequently (20 to 25 per cent of the alcoholic cases received at Stockton have been cases of delirium tremens), and cases of "not insane" are now and again met with. We had one such in June, and two in August, of this year, which would not have been committed if the medical work had been done more carefully. One of the August patients was a pitiful case of delirium, caused by a cysto-pyelonephritis, which terminated fatally after three weeks. A case of "not insane," received last January, died 25 hours after admission from pneumonia; another case admitted last month died in 27 hours, also from pneumonia.

It is of course possible that the testimony against a person alleged to be insane could under certain conditions lead to his commitment under the supposition that a form of insanity exists, when in fact the man is sane, or the disease has already run its course, as in a case of delirium tremens, but errors in medical diagnosis where the alcoholic delirium is at its height or where a delirium attending a physical disease is present, should not be made, and the only way of preventing these mistakes is by instituting more painstaking work in the examination, and by raising the standard of knowledge in psychiatry required of the medical examiner in lunacy. The latter can only be accomplished in time by an advancement of the teaching of scientific psychiatry at our medical colleges. This branch of medical science has, up to the present time, been given very little attention at the medical schools on this coast, or, in fact, with very few exceptions, anywhere in the United States. It might perhaps be possible to insure a higher grade of work by the examiners in lunacy at the larger county seats if an office of county physician were created, the duties of which should be, as in many countries in Europe, to superintend all inquests, make the examinations in lunacy, act as medico-legal expert for the courts, and attend to matters of hygiene. If all these duties were combined, they would command such salary as would make it worth while for one or two specially qualified physicians to devote their time exclusively to the office.

During the first half of the fiscal year, July 1, 1909, to June 30, 1910, 18.4 per cent of the male patients admitted to my department were alcoholics; during the second half, 16.21 per cent were alcoholics. Since July 1st, this year, the percentage has been higher than ever, in July 8 out of 33 men, in August 10 out of 26, and in September 8 out of 31 were alcoholists, which for the three months is 26 out of 90, or 28.88 per cent. When alcoholists constitute one-fourth of all the men sent to an institution for insane, it becomes a question whether it pays the State to care for so large a number at a hospital for insane. The alcoholic has always been considered a nuisance at an asylum, where as much liberty as possible is extended to inmates, because alcoholics are more or less quickly restored to a mental state approaching the normal, and therefore have a just claim for more liberty than the average convalescent mental case. The influence of alcoholics upon the other inmates is not the best, but above all they themselves do not receive at the asylum the social surroundings and the opportunities for reeducation extended to them at homes for inebriates. To keep convalescents from delirium tremens, or from the subacute forms of alcoholism, for months at an insane asylum, simply gives them a place of detention where they have no opportunity to get liquor, that is all (and not even always that, as they sometimes on passes to town, as far as the Stockton hospital is concerned, get opportunities to imbibe at saloons).

The State Hospital receives a great many old men and women, many of them former inmates of county hospitals and almshouses in various parts of the State. Some of these old people are childish, perhaps filthy in habits, and are said to wander off. The county hospital authorities say they can't keep them unless they shut them up, but that is just what the asylum authorities likewise have to do in most cases. I wish to emphasize that I am speaking of mild enfeeblement of old age, or men in their dotage, and not of maniacal cases of old age. To keep these latter in county hospitals would be to return to county-care of the insane, which has never been in vogue in California, and would be a deplorable backward step.

It is of importance to a case of insanity when it first makes its appearance that it be sent to a hospital as early as possible, not only so as to give it every chance to get well by placing it in proper surroundings and care, but also so as to protect it against itself in case of suicidal or self-mutilating inclinations, as well as to prevent violence towards others. While this should be given due consideration, it should at the same time be the work of the examiner in lunacy to keep cases from being committed which do not really require commitment. This task is a difficult one, if the community and the individual are to be properly protected without forgetting to have proper regard for unnecessary expense to the State. The better educated the medical examiner is in the line of psychiatry, the better he can properly serve the State. When I review in my mind the different cases which from time to time have been admitted to the state hospital, I can not but feel that proper scrutiny with consideration for economy has not been exercised in some cases, and it occurs to me not only that more and better medical work should be done, but that greater difficulty should perhaps be placed in the way of committing a person to an insane asylum; repeating that this must be done without losing sight of the importance of having the legal requirements allow for the commitment of acute cases as early as possible.

In my address before the Northern District Medical Society in 1896 I said that "the transfer of the person declared to be insane from the court or jail to the insane asylum is managed by the sheriff or his deputy without the advice of a medical man acquainted with the nature of insanity and the ways of the insane. It is a common thing for the sheriff's officer to deceive the insane as to their destination. * * * The question of the necessity of restraint is left entirely to the sheriff, and he is frequently too ready to put it on. * * *" This is still true today. It is a common experience to find that the new arrival has been told by the deputy sheriff that he would only stay in the hospital a short time, or that he would be given privileges which can not be granted him, and it is likewise often found that a patient restrained with hand-cuffs and anklets on the way to the asylum is found to be quiet and harmless when he arrives in the ward. It is of course true that the escort must be very careful to protect a patient against himself and others while en route; at the same time if the deputy sheriff had the knowledge and experience of a trained hospital nurse, he would be able to understand better when he can take certain risks with regard to omitting restraint, and in a general way how to afford various comforts to the patient he is escorting. Apropos of how sheriffs sometimes show a lack of consideration for the patient, it may be mentioned that we received a woman some sixty years old last month, whose mental condition was not such as to require immediate transfer, who had traveled from midnight until 5:10 a. m., at which hour she was taken from the station to the institution. (Report in the Stockton Mail.) Are considerations of comfort not much more essential to a sick person, the insane, than they are to the person the deputy sheriff usually escorts, the criminal?

The subject of the escorting of the insane from jail or detention-hospital to asylum was taken up by several State Senators during the session of the Legislature in 1897, and a law was drafted in accordance with the above regulation in vogue in the State of New York. As soon, however, as the sheriffs heard of the bill, they banded themselves together, and used every influence until they had succeeded in killing it. Since then I have several times sounded the prospects of having such a bill become a law, but have each time found that efforts would be futile on account of the organized opposition. Now that reform is the watchword, and machine-politics seem no longer to be the master of the situation, I am hoping that such an act can be passed at the next Legislature. That this transfer is feasible, humane, and in every way apt to be a success, is attested to by the trial it has been given in New York State.

This procedure is not only more humane in giving the patient a more correct treatment en route in accordance with the particular circumstances of each case, but it is more economical. It is a fact that during my 21 years' experience as assistant physician at the Stockton Asylum, I have not yet seen a case (man or woman) brought to the hospital from certain counties during the day. They are always brought in the evening, so that the deputy sheriff can not return the same day, and therefore charges his per diem for two days for himself and his assistant, when he has one, which is usually the case. This amounts to a large sum in the course of a year.

If the transfer is to be done by nurses from the different hospitals, it may be necessary to district the State, as has been done in New York.

But not only are the sheriffs not the proper persons to serve as escorts for the insane on the way to the State hospitals, but the police and constables are frequently unqualified to take charge of the alleged insane. Sometimes they use force where this is not required, at other times they are too uninformed to be able to give proper attention to the true interests of the patient.

To sum up the evils which are confronting us in connection with the apprehension, detention and commitment of the alleged insane, and their transfer to State institutions:

(1) They, as sick people, are not understandingly looked after by the police or constables at the time of their arrest.

(2) They are still in some quarters kept in unsanitary places of detention (jails), in which they are given little if any medical attention, which places are now and then infested with vermin. They are not kept clean while there, nor as a rule furnished with clean clothes when they leave.

(3) They are not given as thorough an examination prior to and at the time of their commitment in court as many of the cases require, the special qualifications of the examiners in lunacy being much below par, a matter, however, which time and proper teaching of psychiatry in the medical schools only can rectify.

(4) They are escorted by men who are accustomed to take care of criminals but unqualified as nurses to look after this particular class of sick people, and who are doing this in a very uneconomical way.

THE HUMBOLDT HUMMER

You know that poet wail about the fatal-gift-of-beauty business. 'Tis nothing as compared with the fatal gift of gab. For every Cleopatra who needs snakes to put her out of her beauty-induced misery, there are a million public speakers who ought to be chloroformed to save their suffering constituencies. For it is not only the hearers who suffer—it is the folks back home that sent the perspiring orator to the Legislature to get their bills passed and lo! they are not passed because the orator has blown them to pieces with the hurricane of his eloquence. To put that down in plain Spanish, many a flossy speaker has talked his own pet bill to death.

Herein lies the serpentine wisdom of Charles P. Cutten, the Humboldt hummer, the bouncing boy from the backwoods of extreme northwestern California. Senator Cutten wears glasses and looks wise; when he talks he does it with all the spirit and fire of our best fire departments; but just the same, he does not talk much. He has a theory—we know he has this theory, because he has repeated the announcement of it no less than thirty times during the late lamented session—a theory that he has never had more ideas on a given subject than he could spill through the channels of speech in five minutes by the watch.

Now, this is not such an inferior theory if you will only practice it, and Charley Cutten does. It does not imply that he has any fewer ideas than his eminent associates, either. In fact, it simply indicates that he has one idea more than most of them have, namely, that there is usually a good time to stop talking soon after you begin. If a good many people would do this, and put the stop just before the begin, and conscientiously practice the rule for about forty years, the fund of public enlightenment would grow so fast that vaults couldn't be built to hold it. Most of our leading orators empty themselves so fast that when they rush the growler back to the fountain of inspiration the busy barkeeper turns the spigot quick and send back suds instead of the strengthening stuff that makes Milwaukee wobbly.

Anyhow, Cutten has a strong gift of shut-up. Maybe this is what makes him so popular with his fellow members. And if Humboldt was to get any bills passed at the late session, she had need that he were popular somehow, because he had about the most unpopular job in the heap, chairman of the Committee on Finance. The gentleman who has to sit on the back of this fretful porcupine has the pleasant job of telling all his fellow members that they are natural born hogs and have just simply got to quit shoving into the trough that way; that the feed won't hold out to half their appetite and they had as well know it now as later, because they're going to squeal anyway.

There have been chairmen of the Finance Committee that used just this artless and tactful style of verbiage. We leave the gentle reader to guess how many votes they got in the beauty contest at the session's close. But not so Charley Cutten. He knew that he was handing out a staple line of extra proof disappointment to his fellow Senators, but he was wise enough to realize that if you pour oil on the face of the troubled vinegar you've got a salad dressing, and that everybody likes that. Hence the short speeches. When he had to talk, he said it quick, with the bark on, and quit. Not too much to remember, enough sense to give the mind something to digest, a bit of humor for a relish. The style made a hit. So did Charley. When the Senate adjourned, a grateful body of fellow-workers gave him a gold watch, presumably to remind him about the five-minute rule, or maybe to show that they appreciated the way he had remembered it.

Cutten is a strong man, able, conscientious, and a hard fighter. He has been one of the foremost figures in the present reform movement. He said something recently about not coming back to the next Legislature, but if the First Senatorial district is wise, it will make him change his mind.

The Value of Franchises

Time was when public utilities franchises could be had for the asking. The privilege-grabbing opportunities were very generally taken advantage of by the astute combinations that traded on the ignorance of the people of the value of State or municipal grants. The times are changing. As the people get an insight into the value of public utilities they become more chary of the indiscriminate giving of franchises without fair return of compensation. Almost fabulous fortunes have been made in the United States through corporate grants. A better understanding of the value of these monopolistic grabs is enabling communities to realize the income which they are worth to the people and how to secure it.—Livermore Herald.

Wooden Block Pavement: The only important change that has come in the street paving business in the past ten years is the steadily increasing use of creosoted wooden blocks in the largest cities. Thirty or forty years ago most of the paving done in the big cities was with cedar blocks. The street was graded and finished off with sand. Over this planks were laid, and then eight-inch blocks, either round or oblong, were laid, with tar and gravel for a binder. This pavement usually went to pieces in three years, and its wreck was complete as soon as it broke through. Under the modern system, however, which was brought over from Paris about the beginning of this century, the blocks are laid on a concrete base, eight inches deep, and on a cushion of an inch layer of sand. They are thoroughly soaked in creosote and petroleum, and are fitted tight together. The blocks measure 4 inches by 4 inches, and are 5 to 10 inches long. Laid after this fashion, they outlast asphalt or stone, and, indeed, those put down on Tremont street, Boston, where they had the most incessant wear, showed no deterioration at the end of ten years. The only objection offered to this style of pavement is that in eastern winters it is slippery for horses, a difficulty that can be obviated in various ways. New York has done most of the region west of Broadway and south of the City Hall with these blocks, and Chicago is now doing the whole of the Loop district, that is to say from the river to Jackson street and from the Lake to the South Branch. Seattle has a little wooden paving of the new type, but none exists in California, although some bridges are paved with wooden paving blocks.

Blowing off Steam: The rows on the subject of speech-making in the streets usually terminate, as did the one in Fresno recently between the police authorities and the socialistic organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World, with the designating of certain street corners and vacant spaces where speaking can be done. This principle was long ago adopted by the city of London after many years of fierce uproar on the subject of freedom of speech. Of course it will not do to have speech-making in progress everywhere, but on the other hand to stop it entirely is to bottle up forces that may at last break out in explosion. The fact that a good deal of this talk is crazy and irresponsible, and even that some of it is treasonable and anarchistic need cause no particular alarm. It is very much as the Quaker said to the young man who was swearing: "Truly, friend, if thee has that kind of stuff in thy system, it is better to spit it out." The anarchy of the shallow street orator gawked at by a handful of listless bums, contains only an insignificant atom of danger to the republic in comparison to the sinister anarchy of Big Business, corrupting politics, undermining the bench, owning newspapers and instilling useless partisanship into the people.

Stabbed in the Back: The people of Columbus, Ohio, are desirous of acquiring their street car lines, and a bill was introduced into the Legislature giving them that right. In spite of sharp opposition from the corporate influences that controlled a large part of the Legislature, the bill seemed likely to pass, when it was "discovered" that it contained a provision abolishing the rule that now prevails in Ohio cities whereby a street car line cannot occupy a street without the consent of a majority of abutting property owners. This killed the bill. There are many ways by which legislation unfavorable to private interests can be headed off, and the average Legislature understands all the tricks in the game.

Reconstruction of Street Car System: New Jersey has now a Public Utility Commission similar to the New York, Wisconsin and Massachusetts bodies. A protest on the conditions of the Trenton street car system led to an investigation and finally an order that completely reorganizes the business physically and in operation. It will take some time to do the reconstruction work ordered by the commission, but the company has set about it, and in the end Trenton people will have good accommodations instead of miserable as at present.

The Apostle of Civic Housecleaning: The best authority in the United States on the subject of "How to get a city clean and then keep it clean," is Mrs. Caroline Bartlett Crane. She goes from one town to another as she is summoned, either by town authorities or by civic organizations, and gives an expert report on health conditions and cleaning methods, and outlines plans for improvement. She is at once sanitary expert and a civic missionary. She helps the officials and she stirs up the people. She is doing a great amount of good in protecting health and preserving human life.

Pittsburg Slowly Wakens: Pittsburg is the most striking example in the whole country of a city run in accordance with reactionary business ideas. The people own very little in the way of public utilities. Even the bridges crossing the river, five in number, are owned by private companies and a toll is exacted of all that use them. But the city is gradually waking up. Arrangements have just been perfected by which the people have taken over these structures at a cost of nearly two million dollars and the toll will be abolished. The bridges had been paying their owners large dividends.

Efficiency of Filters: Analysis of the Ohio river water in January, before it enters the Cincinnati filters, showed all the way from 6,700 bacteria to the cubic centimeter up to 360,000. The average was 63,000. The average for the filtered water was 11 bacteria to the cubic centimeter per day. Some days there were none at all and the highest was 110. This shows an efficiency of 99.98 per cent for the filter.

A Fire Chieftainess: Port Tampa, Florida, is probably the only town in the country that has a young woman for Fire Chief. Her father was for some years Fire Chief in Savannah, and she acted as his secretary. When they removed to Tampa he took the place of Fire Chief there, and she was assigned to the neighboring town of Port Tampa, where she organized a volunteer department and was chosen as chief.

Putting the Garbage to Work: Atlanta has two garbage crematories and also two receiving stations for garbage some distance from the crematories. Railways are to be built connecting the stations with the crematories, and it is estimated that the heat of the burning garbage will make steam enough to generate the electricity required to operate the system.

Radical Fight Against Smoke: Youngstown, Ohio, which, as everybody knows, is a great manufacturing center, has at last risen in wrath against the smoke nuisance which has rendered the town almost uninhabitable. It has adopted a smoke ordinance of the most drastic type, and there seems to be a robust public sentiment back of the law to insist on its enforcement.

Gift of Shade Trees: The head of the leading dry goods house of Woonsocket, Rhode Island, has presented the school children of that city with 10,000 catalpa trees to be set out in streets and yards. Each child is required to promise that he or she will plant the tree and care for it. The catalpa is hardy, a rapid grower and produces a dense shade.

Paid by Subscription: The Mayor and Aldermen of Clay Center, Kansas, were recently fined by the Supreme Court of Kansas for contempt, because they chopped down the poles of an electric light company before the court ruled on the company's right to use the street. A popular ten cent subscription was started, and the fine was paid for the officials.

Redueing Number of Counellmen: Richmond, Virginia, has 64 city councilmen, and a move is on foot among the business men to cut the number down to 24. A good many citizens, however, think that while they are about it, they had better go further and cut the number down to five under the commission system.

Regulating Sale of Revolvers: The police authorities of Louisville, Kentucky, are urging the passage of an ordinance requiring all dealers in firearms to keep a record of each weapon sold and the name and address of the buyer. They claim it would reduce the volume of crimes of violence and aid greatly in detecting crime.

Municipal Expositions: Hartford, Connecticut, and Toledo, Ohio, are both holding municipal shows. They are attended by large numbers of people, and are doing good service in increasing popular interest in the work of their city governments.

Better Than Horses: Walla Walla, Washington, has a big 80 horse-power fire-wagon, which it finds most efficient to haul the steam fire engines to fires. It does traction work at the rate of 15 miles an hour without injuring itself.

Heads or Tails: York, Pennsylvania, has seven councilmen, and recently when a vacancy occurred the vote was three to three on the choice for his successor. It was finally determined by tossing up a coin, after which all six voted for the winner.

Use of Calcium Chloride: Duluth will this summer make use of calcium chloride instead of water to lay the dust on unpaved streets. Experiments seem to prove that two or three applications will be enough for the season.

Southern Cities Moving: Macon, Georgia, is one of the first of the Southern cities to join the playground movement. It has just appropriated $3000 to make over a city square into a children's playground.

The Mission of the United States

What America Has Done and What She Still Must do For the Salvation of Europe and of the World

By Baron d'Estournelles de Constant

"The Mission of the United States: What America Has Done and What She Still Must Do for the Salvation of Europe and of the World," was the theme expounded by Baron d'Estournelles de Constant under the auspices of the City Club Tuesday evening, March 28th, in Simpson Auditorium.

Baron de Constant is a member of the French Senate, representative of France at the Hague Conference, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1909 and founder of the International Conciliation Association. The Baron said:

The people who laugh at old-new efforts at old-new ideas, are accustomed to say that peace is a very fine subject, but what does it mean? Simply a generous scheme, a dream, and nothing else? And they are always ready to object to our efforts and say, "Why are you trying to start a peace movement, when there are so many difficulties, so many complications everywhere?" And, indeed, the very first words the newspaper men spoke to me when I landed at New York were "we will have war with Mexico." They were much amused with the idea that a man had crossed the ocean to speak of peace to a nation that was just going to war.

People seem to be alarmed with things which are quite natural. They speak of this Mexican affair as if it were quite an exceptional drama, something awful dangerous, something which will surely tomorrow or any other day lead to war. But all my diplomatic life I have seen everywhere those difficulties. Everywhere you have them; chiefly when you have such a big country as this, a desert country like Texas and a country like the north of Mexico. It is impossible to prevent all difficulties in life with your neighbors. But the question is not to aggravate these difficulties. The question is not to speak of war, when it is only a question of one of the most ordinary difficulties we are sure to meet, and not to give, if I may say, the character of a national quarrel to a local issue.

I speak always not as a foreigner but as a friend. I speak always with great caution. But in connection with your relations with Japan I tell you very frankly that, having not only known, but meditated all these questions, you may believe me if I tell you and if I swear that I really cannot see, I cannot even imagine, what would be the advantage of war for either Japan or the United States. I say that war is not necessary, and I say that Japan, as well as the United States, wants peace; wants peace much more than they can believe, much more than you know. Because I have lived my life, I do not come here to try to get the kind of popularity to be elected to the senate here. What I want is not to let my friends, my brothers, be deceived by ignorance. I understand that if I do that it is not so visionary. It is simply that if you are deceived by your ignorance and they are deceived by their ignorance, it will bring upon all the world such trouble, such catastrophies that we, too, shall certainly have bad times. And I think it is my duty for my children as well as for yours to do my best to avert this catastrophy.

I may go a little further and give you an idea. Speaking of the special question of Japan and the United States, I can give you an idea of the deep ignorance of public opinion, generally speaking. How can we speak now of preparing for war—war means destruction—when you have and when they have so much to do in constructive work and so much is to be done?

Let me speak only of your own country.

You have done so much in a short time. What is a century? Almost nothing. You have done marvelously. When we reflect that this is not a small country like our countries in Europe, like France, like Germany—that the United States is almost a continent as large or larger than Europe, one realizes that you have done in only one century marvelous things.

The present question is of struggling, not with the complicated armaments of today but with other kinds of armaments which are labor, brain work; science, art, agriculture, industry, commerce; that is the real struggle of tomorrow. In this struggle, if you stop your national development, if you give too much of your force to the war of destruction, to the preparation for war,—well, what are you going to do? You are going to waste what you want for developing your national resources. You are going to waste your money. That's not much. You are going to waste your time. Well, that is more serious. You are going to waste your men, your young men, and these, your young men, they are not numerous enough for such a big country as yours.

And that is the second part of what I wanted to explain to you. They say that this organization cannot be effected. But, indeed, it has been already started. It is at work. This organization for peace, for the last 12 years, since the first Hague conference, has been at work. And here is one of its results. This is the beginning of what I call the American mission. Why should not I tell the truth? At first, when the first Hague Conference met, nobody would believe, in Europe, at least, that it would get votes. Everybody was more or less sceptical about it. It was in 1899, and since that time we have seen, if I may say it, the work of the first Hague Conference disappearing little by little. Nobody would believe in it. No government consented to appeal to the Hague court, the first court of international justice. Nobody, no government, would consent to treat it as a real existing institution.

When the European governments wanted to do nothing, then the American government said, "It is a pity not to use it; it ought to live. The European governments could use it. Hague is in Europe. But, as they don't do it, we shall do it." And then began the action of the United States. And with whom? That is very striking just now,—with the Mexican government. They agreed to appeal first, to send the first case to the Hague court.

This case was a small one indeed. That one was objected to by the sceptics. It was the case called the Pius Fund case of California. And is has been settled in the most admirable way and so perfectly well that nobody now even thinks of it. But wait a moment. This beginning has been something like good luck falling down and waiting on this poor Hague court, which was condemned, which was almost dead. This first case has been, indeed, its first steps; and when public opinion saw that it was possible to use this Hague court, then, at once an interest came from everywhere and so strong and so living that then quite a serious affair, namely, this great difficulty between Russia and England, was settled by being referred to the Hague Convention.

You remember what was the subject. It was a very, very serious question. Everybody agrees and recognizes that 20 years ago it would have been quite enough to light the fire of war between Russia and England. When the Russian fleet was going out of the Baltic Sea, it met the English fishing bark—the Dogger Bank case—and nobody could understand how the misunderstanding came about, but they fired. The Russian man-of-war fired at this British fisherman. The day after all the newspapers were quite indignant. They wanted at once satisfaction for such an outrage, and there would have been war if it had been only 20 years ago. But it was settled in the most admirable way by application to the Hague Convention.

At the first Hague Conference only 26 nations had been invited. Why 26 nations only when there are 44 all together? All the world belongs to 44 nations. You invite all the nations of the world and it makes only 26. Why? Simply because they had forgotten the American republics. They had entirely forgotten to ask them to come to the first Hague Conference; and, indeed, except the United States, your republic, and the Mexican republic, no other had been invited. And when it was a question through American initiative of convoking a second Hague Conference, of course, they could not forget America this time—the new world, and all the American republics, that is to say, 21 instead of two, were invited. And they came. And do you know what has been the result of all this? The result is that, being 21—in fact 19, because two have been missing—being 19, instead of two only, they have changed the majority,—our majority for progress was very, very small at the first Hague Conference; so small that it was no question of peace to settle to start an international abrogation. But at the second Hague Conference, the majority was strong enough that when we arrived at the splendid result and we counted our votes, and we were 33, 34, some days even 35, as against only 5. And so we had the support of what I call the American bloc. We had, indeed, 32 33, 34 votes for compulsory arbitration, as against only 5 votes.

And one of the helps in this splendid discussion in favor of international justice, in arbitration, was your American delegates, who always went hand in hand with the French delegates.

It is because I have seen how nations can go near war without even suspecting it that I thought this my duty—now that I have enjoyed diplomatic life for 20 years, I find it a pleasure. I left all the fine and agreeable diplomacy and stopped the life I was living, but I am very happy and very proud when I feel that I may bring to my friends everywhere some arguments against ignorance, and then I find I can learn of them some arguments against war. In other words, my dear friends, when I come here, I bring you the results of my experience. You are young; you are full of initiative; you renew the sources of my confidence in the future; and that is why I was so anxious to come and see you a third time and that is why, when I go back to my country and when they ask me about Los Angeles, California, and all your difficulties, I will speak of them with confidence. I know you are good, wise people and you will bring the weight of your lofty conscience on the general conscience, on the general education, and it will be more and more difficult to deceive the people, as long as the American and French conscience are together.

GLEANINGS FROM 50 YEARS AGO

The year 1861 was not a local option year, we judge from the Sacramento Union of April 1st. In fact, the elements seem to have been on a spree, for about two columns of that paper were consumed in a compilation from the press of the state, showing the results of "The Great Storm"—bridges washed out, cattle drowned, houses adrift, mails delayed.

At just this inopportune moment, the San Francisco Bulletin had the bad taste to announce, "they say that the water is to be let into the Spring Valley water works in the course of next week." Beautiful thought! Touching reminiscence! How often since has "water" been "let in" to the Spring Valley water works!

No less inappropriate at such a season of deluge is this item from the Sacramento Union of April 3rd:

"Anti-Alcohol—The 'Pledge' announces the arrival, from Canada, of the Rev. James A. Davidson, a distinguished temperance lecturer. It is supposed that he will soon begin a crusade against King Alcohol in this State, which is a field ripe for the harvesters."

We fear King Alcohol harvested the ripe crusaders, or fielded the crusading harvesters, or however you choose to disentangle the Union's mixed metaphors, for it is only now, fifty years later, that the local option bill "got by."

And while we are on the subject of morals, Redwood City will be glad to be reminded of

"An Acquisition.—The San Mateo Gazette says that for the first time in the history of Redwood City, there is a resident minister at that place. His name is Rev. J. S. Zelie, and he preaches in the court house every Sunday."

The gold fever still had a good many victims, and reports of new strikes were still a staple article of news. The Union announced the discovery of

"New Diggings.—At Lumkinville. Butte county, there have been several claims opened within the last few weeks, with good success; some of them paying an ounce a day to the hand. One day last week a man named Gilmore took out a nugget weighing seven ounces, besides several smaller ones."

Other and more serious traces of the frontier character survived. The Union's correspondence from Trinity county contained the following Fennimore Cooperian incident:

"News was received yesterday that the Indians at Soldiers' Camp, in Humboldt county, had murdered John Fulweider, an old and much esteemed resident of this place. They also killed all the stock in Ketin Chow Valley belonging to James Howe and others, and burned the cabins there. Eight men are in the valley, and have sent out an Indian, bringing a letter, in which they ask men to come and assist them to exterminate the whole tribe. They represent that the snow is so deep that the savages cannot escape from a sufficient force."

We suggest attention to the grim finality of the sentence before the last, as grim and final as the humor in the last phrase of the following:

"Four Chinamen were carried over Beaver Dam, on the Trinity, last Thursday. Three of them were drowned; the fourth can still pay his poll tax."

The wicked Legislature was still in session, and, like our own that ended last week, was scrapping vigorously over the decennial reapportionment of the State. In reading the following quotation you must remember that the present Constitution was not in effect:

"A bill for the apportionment of the State will be reported by the Committee of Twenty (one from each Senatorial district) this morning, in the Assembly. The committee, we hear, are unanimous in the belief that the apportionment should be made this session; and, without waiting for returns from Washington, in answer to the demands of the Legislature upon our Senator, have yielded compliance to the demands of their own constituencies in drafting bill, from the data furnished by the census abstract in the Secretary of State's office. According to these figures, the basis of Senatorial apportionment is 9,500, and, for members of Assembly, 4,750. The number of Senators is increased from 35 to 40, the highest constitutional limit; but the Assembly retains its present number of members."

It is interesting to note that, on this basis, San Francisco and San Mateo counties together got six Senators and Los Angeles county got one: also, that San Francisco got twelve Assemblymen and Los Angeles got two.

But the Legislature had more serious things than this to do. Under a heading, "Laws of California, Passed at the Twelfth Session of the Legislature," we read this melancholy record:

"Chapter XXXIV.—Act to change the name of Andreas Christian Michelsen to William Smith."

No wonder poets sometimes suicide!

But all was not sadness in those golden days. We turn to the San Francisco Bulletin of April 1st, and read where it quotes from the Washington Star this blithe and jocund item of the West:

"The Hon. Ned McGowan, who narrowly escaped hanging in California, when the vigilance committee ruled, has become one of the most respectable and prosperous citizens in Arizona, and has just been elected to Congress."

FROM THE PRESS OF TODAY

The big storm of fifty years ago has its parallel this week in the Roosevelt storm which swept the state and disappeared in a torrent of verbiage and a cloud of hats last Wednesday, when the Strenuous Lifer crossed the state line into Oregon. An area of high pressure is now central over the Web Foot State and will continue with loud explosions until T. R. goes somewhere else.

The State Board of Health last Saturday referred seventeen cases of violations of the Pure Food Laws to the district attorneys of the counties in which the offences were committed. For the future guidance of Dr. Chapman and other champions of Local Option, it should be called to their attention that a number of these are cases in which the manufacturers of patent or other medicines have failed to put the alcoholic content on the label. For their information, and also as a hunch to those fierce booze fighters who simply will get theirs at any price, we will publish the fact that the cheering stuff can be found in effective quantities in such unexpected oases as a favorite grip cure, an old reliable dead-shot cure for consumption, essence of Jamaica ginger (we never knew before just why we liked that stuff with sugar and water), sweet spirits of niter and witch hazel. None of these routes to the solacing jag is quite so devious as the "varnish skim," which is popular in the Navy, but all combine novelty with exhilarating qualities, soon, if the prosecutions stick, to be spiced with a tang of adventure.

"Senator John B. Curtin and Professor Carl C. Plehn are in Sacramento today (Monday, April 3rd), attending the meeting of the State Board of Equalization, which is still wrestling with the taxation problem, as it confronts them in connection with Constitutional Amendment No. 1. The Board is in receipt of a voluminous typewritten report, fairly bristling with technicalities from the Huntington urban and interurban railroads of Los Angeles County. The Board is working over this report today, endeavoring to ascertain from it just what are the earnings of the Huntington roads."

This item suggests two poignant ideas: one, that "Constitutional John" and "See! See! Plehn" will soon be known as champion wrestlers, as they always appear in the news columns as "wrestling" with Amendment No. 1; the other and more sweetly solemn thought, that there appear to be in the State of California only two men who have any idea of what the law means under which the taxes are levied and collected, and that they don't know enough about it to be very awe-inspiringly cocksure about what will happen when the law is applied.

The law seems to be plain enough in the case of the champion pugilist of the world, however. The Supreme Court seems to have recovered from its attack of megrims, and after mature deliberation upon the ease of Jack Johnson, under sentence of twenty-five days in jail for 'steenth conviction of traveling so fast as to be indistinguishable as to color, has decided that he cannot be liberated on any ground, technical or otherwise, thus determining another of those harassing and intricate questions of public policy to the satisfaction of all except the victim.

All is still excitement on our borders. The Mexican insurreetos have both been seen near the boundary line about dusk. Reports from San Diego the following morning indieate that the local supply of lager beer is depleted almost to exhaustion by their raids into neutral territory. President Diaz has issued a manifesto offering a reward of half of his kingdom to anybody who will bring these desperate characters into eustody, dead or alive; or a suit of clothes and a square meal apiece to the said d. cs. if they will come in and surrender. No takers, either way, and so the heartless and bloodthirsty business continues.

President Diaz, by the way, was buried day before yesterday. President Diaz attended the races yesterday afternoon, and surprised all with his vigor. He won three million dollars (Mexican) on the second race, and bought a new hat (American) with the winnings. We have positive information that President Diaz is a patient in a private lunatic asylum in New York, and has been there for the past six months. President Diaz led the charges against the rebels in Sonora last night. President Diaz is an infernal lie.

Governor Johnson is still signing bills.

Law Enforcement in Connection with the Northern Securities Case

By S. R. Van Sant, Ex-Governor of Minnesota

At the regular Saturday meeting of the Los Angeles City Club, on Saturday of the past week, the feature was an address by the Hon. S. R. Van Sant, ex-Governor of Minnesota, on the subject "Law Enforcement in Connection with the Northern Securities Case."

Governor Van Sant spoke in part, as follows:

In our State, for more than a quarter of a century we had a law upon our statute books which forbade the uniting of parallel and competing lines of railway. That law was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States and was declared constitutional. In 1901 an effort was made by the organization of a company in New Jersey, under the name of Northern Securities Company, to unite two great and competing lines of railway—the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific.

I felt, as Governor of the State, that it was my duty to prevent that consolidation if it were possible. And I gave out an interview, in which I stated that, in my judgment, no law made in New Jersey, no company organized in New Jersey or otherwise could come to Minnesota and thwart our people's will as expressed in our statute.

Now, I was not an attorney. I was simply a business man. But it seemed to me that that ought to be good law, if it was not. I was ridiculed from one end of this country to the other. And they said that I was not an attorney; that the greatest attorneys in America were paid a vast sum for the organization of this company, and they said to the man who organized it that it was legal.

And do you know, my fellow citizens, that the most charitable thing ever said about me was, "Van Sant is not to blame. He doesn't know any better."

I authorized the Attorney General of our State to bring suit to prevent, if possible, the consummation of this company, and to prevent its carrying out its plans. And so suit was brought in the United States Supreme Court.

But, realizing how great that fight would be and what it meant and how powerless a single State was to cope with a corporation of this kind, I called together a conference of all the Governors of the States through which those lines run, at Helena, Montana.

That resulted in great good in this way: Not only united those States—for we agreed to stand together—but it aroused a great public sentiment. And let me say in this presence that there is no power, after all, greater in the United States than the aroused public sentiment.

So intense was the feeling and so thoroughly aroused were the people to the dangers which threatened them that it was not hard work to go to Washington and present the matter to the then President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt.

He instructed his Attorney General to examine into the matter, and if this was found in violation of the United States statutes to bring suit to dissolve the company. You all are familiar with the case. Attorney General Knox decided that it was in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law.

To my mind, it was the most gigantic scheme ever conceived by the brain of man to stifle competition and to promote monopoly; and while we have many, many reasons to praise the then President of the United States—for I believe, by reason of his services to his country today we have higher ideals of business, higher standards of citizenship, than we ever had before—he never performed a greater service than when he struck that $400,000,000 corporation between the eyes and killed it forever.

Do you realize what it means, had that not been destroyed? First, a Northern Securities Company. Second, a Southern Securities Company. And then a United States or a Central Securities Company—all the great corporations of this entire republic of ours would be in the hands of a few men, who would control it for their own and not the public good.

Our country need fear no dangers from without. Our enemies, our worst enemies, are the enemies in our own household.

And what is the chief danger in our country today? It is disregard of the law. Isn't that true? Disregard for law! And if our Republic is to stand the test of time, every man must yield obedience unto the law.

I said we were making rapid progress, and I like to think of my country as one in which we not only have liberty, in which we not only have equality before the law, but we have equality of opportunity. And I would like to see this pace maintained until we not only have this equality before the law, this equality of opportunity, but something at the present time more needed than either of these and that's equality of punishment; the same measure of justice meted out to the rich criminal as to the poor one without money and without friends.

When this time comes, as come it will, indeed, then America will arrive at that high position that we hope to see her finally come to. You business men, you men who are making this Southern California blossom as the rose, you men who are building up here one of the great cities of the continent, must realize that you have other duties to perform.

There is just as good fighting here in California as there is in Minnesota. I was going to say as good as in Illinois, but I believe I will take that back, because I think they have got a little more to do just now than the other states have.

I would like to see this pace maintained until every man would earn the dollar he spends, and then he would see to it that every other man does likewise.

I would like to see this pace maintained until every dollar of stock in our great corporations represents 100 cents of actual value. And if we are true to ourselves, and if we are as patriotic in the service of our country as we are vigilant and diligent in our business, there will be no trouble in the future.

You cannot escape this responsibility if you are a good citizen. Our Republic might be likened to a great corporation, and in this great corporation every one of you is a stockholder and responsible to the extent of one vote for its management. Your great corporation is the United States Government, and your President is the President of the United States, and its board of directors the American Congress. And so you see, the duty devolves upon you literally, as individuals, to see that the proper men are selected as your president and your board of directors.

I have no patience and never have had and never expect to have, with that man, be he minister, professional man, business man or laborer, who is too good to go to the primaries of his party but who berates the man nominated to office.

If in my statement of this case I have been somewhat egotistical and spoken too much of self, I know that you will excuse me, for it seemed that the occasion required it. I deserve no credit. I simply did my duty as I saw it, as an American citizen. I asked no man, no party leader, no chairman of our central committee, no attorney general. I took that step believing that I was right and fearing if I took advice it might deter me, and I was determined to make that fight. There was a petition presented to me by men representing more than $50,000,000, and I have that petition in my possession yet, requesting me to let up until some overt act was committed. I no more could let up than I could fly. Not at all. And while I sometimes do think perhaps that I did some little service, it came from the fact, as I said in the start—and that I consider the proudest moment of my life—that, when my country needed me, I, as a boy, shouldered my gun and for nearly four years fought to preserve this great American Union.

I was asked the other day if I was out of politics. The gentleman said: "I see you are out of politics." I said to him: "You never made a greater mistake in your life. I am out of office, but I am not out of politics." And what is more, I never expect to be, and I hope every man here will be an earnest, active, zealous politician, fighting for what he believes to be right; doing something in this great fight.

So I say to you: Get on the firing line and do your duty and this Republic that we all love so well will stand forever. And I want to close with a sentiment from Abraham Lincoln on the enforcement of the law:

"Let reverence for law be breathed by every mother nestling the babe that prattles in her lap. Let it be written in our spelling books, our almanacs and our histories. Let it be preached from the pulpit. Let it be proclaimed from legislative halls. In a word, let it become the political religion of the land."

President Finlayson followed with an exoression of thanks for Governor Van Sant's address, saying in part:

I sincerely trust that no matter what the law may be upon the statute book, every minister of justice sworn to uphold that law will enforce it, though the heavens fall, regardless of what the law may be. And if there be laws upon the statute books which ought to be repealed, then, let them be repealed in accordance with the methods provided by our constitutional form of government. And that brings me to this: There are in this age, as in every age, certain great, underlying, fundamental currents, representing the aspirations of the people. As a result of one of those currents today, we find consolidation the order of the day. We find on the one hand capital organizing and consolidating into great corporations. On the other hand we find labor endeavoring to do the same. And I believe that labor has as much right to organize as capital has. I believe that it is its duty to do so; and I believe that, when it finally is organized, then labor will get its rights and capital its rights also, and eventually out of these two forces will come a real industrial democracy. But what I am now particularly aiming at is this: I believe that, while the Sherman law is upon the statute books, it must be enforced; and I hope the time will come and come soon when that law will be very materially modified; for it is endeavoring to oppose itself to an irresistible tendency, and that is the tendency to consolidate capital. I say it is an irresistible tendency. It is in accord with the economic trend of events, and I believe it to be a good tendency, and I believe that all of these modifications will come as, with a tremendous sweep, it is moving on to some goal that is of benefit to the human race.

DRAMATIC CHIT CHAT

The resurrection of an old ordinance forbidding the public presentation of objectionable plays, and the application of it to put a stop to two pornographic farce comedies whose alleged salacious features had been widely advertised, seems likely to result in regular theatrical censorship becoming an institution in Los Angeles.

Guy W. Eddie, the city prosecuting attorney, upon whom the functions of censor devolve under the ordinance, does not relish the position and so he has asked the City Council to provide a permanent committee to review all plays—a sort of a death watch to attend all the "first nights."

The trouble started when the billboards announced the coming of "The Queen of the Moulin Rouge." "The Queen" a short time before had attained a great deal of profitable notoriety through a magazine article denouncing her as one of the most shameless females who had ever smiled across the footlights. In the same article another lady, "The Girl from Rector's" had been denounced.

When it became known that "The Queen" was on her way to Los Angeles and was to make her local debut at Temple Auditorium—a church on Sundays and a theatre the other six days in the week—a certain class of citizens was shocked. There were appeals to the Mayor and to Mr. Eddie to prevent the proposed "desecration" of the church-theater. It was then he found the ordinance giving him power to interfere with plays falling below a certain ethical standard. Mr. Eddie witnessed the first performance, taking with him a committee of citizens. The verdict was "thumbs down" and an order was given against a repetition of the play. Later a compromise permitted it to finish its engagement but with costumes, lines and situations greatly altered.

The action set a precedent which made it impossible for Mr. Eddie to ignore the coming of "The Girl"—booked at the same theatre—last week. Again a committee attended, again the verdict was unfavorable, and since the management was unwilling or unable to make suitable changes the first performance was the last.

One application of the ordinance constituted a precedent, two a custom. Censorship is now established and will have to continue unless the council repeals the ordinance, which is not likely. The point has been raised that censorship of a single theatre is unfair and impossible and those who are opposed to censorship on any terms have indicated a disposition to force a strict enforcement of the ordinance so that the public will become impatient of it and demand its repeal.

Mr. Eddie's action in asking the Council to give him a committee is regarded as being in the nature of battening down the hatches and reefing the sails.

The intellectual wife of a rich money-grubbing Philistine becomes infatuated with a young society poet who is a frequent visitor in her husband's home. He makes surreptitious love to her and she runs away with him. Her husband gets a divorce and tries to forget her. The poet soon tires of her, they quarrel and she leaves him, and becomes an actress. Her little son whom she deserted and who is still with his father, proves the magnet that draws her back and the bond that at last reunites wife and husband.

Upon such a threadbare plot Henri Bernstein built the three-act play that he called "The Redemption of Evelyn Vaudray," and it is in this that Olga Nethersole has come to the Pacific Coast, playing this week at the Majestic theatre in Los Angeles. Notwithstanding that the subject is hackneyed and the treatment not very original it becomes a powerful and interesting play in the hands of Miss Nethersole and her leading man, Walter Edwards, an exceptionally able actor, who portrays the deserted husband. The piece was staged by Ben Greet, which means that it is a finished production scenically. Without exception the members of the company lend adequate support to the star, who, in this play, is probably giving the public the best insight into her powers as an emotional actress that it has had during her successful career.

administration favored municipal ownership and was making tentative advances toward it, but the haste it was making was of the slow variety and Berkeley people became impatient for action. Stitt Wilson carried about with him the issue of The California Outlook containing the review of Pasadena's experience with monopoly and emancipation therefrom, written by Mr. C. W. Koiner, and read from it or referred to it in every address, invoking applause at every reference. He promised, if elected, to do something about municipal lighting for Berkeley instead of contenting himself with talking about it. Berkeley, in common with all the other bay cities, except Alameda, which owns its own plant, pays 9 cents per kilowatt hour for domestic lights and, also in common with other bay cities, believes that it pays too much. A review of the experience of Los Angeles with municipal water supply also helped Wilson, but it was Pasadena that decided the issue, without a doubt. While, all day Sunday, the eyes of the Socialists beamed like coals of fire, because of their victory, staid and sober folk, not a few of whom had neglected to vote, looked as though they had lost a near relative. The humiliation of having the college town of the state go Socialistic is not easy for them to bear. It will be a fortnight, and a warm one, before the consorts of Wilson on the city ticket will be rattled out of the big dice box and the conservatives may be counted on, to the last man to turn out at the final election and help to weight the Socialistic administration down with as prudent and slow-going associates as possible.

Oakland Town Taking Notice The surprise meted out to Berkeley put Oakland into a commotion. Now Oakland politics are different. Berkeley set itself up as a model of purity and progress as well as sweetness and light. Oakland enjoyed such bad government under the old Herrin domination and for so many years, that the setting up of a quasi reform administration seemed to the people like entering into the promised land. Mayor Mott has been mayor for three terms and a very good mayor, too, but he has never been too good to do polities, so outspoken as to antagonize the saloons, or so aligned with the radicals as to make them cocksure of him. Whether or not it was because he came into office on a rising tide of progress or whether it is that persuasive way of his, is not quite certain, but it is at least coincident that Oakland's greatest progress has been made under and during the half dozen years of Mott's administration. The Socialists are after his scalp. They hanker for it. Although nearly devoid of capillary substance where the capillary substance ought to vegetate, they want that scalp even if they have to tie it to their belt with a string. J. Stitt Wilson and all his Berkeley contingent will come into Oakland (between speeches in Berkeley) to make speeches in Oakland for the candidacy of Thomas Booth. The preliminary election will be held April 18. What the outcome will be no one can foretell, but the situation is not as in Berkeley. The Southern Pacific old guard is not as hostile to Mott as it was to Hodghead and the opposition to Mott is not unlikely to be divided between the Socialists' candidate, Booth, and Dr. F. F. Jackson, a radical reform candidate who was defeated by Mott two years ago. The Watchman does not regard the defeat of Mott as at all likely, but then he has to confess that the election of Wilson seemed to him well-nigh incredible. The people believe that they are being overcharged by the public service corporations all down the line (and they are), and they are growing restive under what, under the existing regime, seems to them to promise little relief from such exploitation. The Socialists are few but the discontented are many. The Socialists promise deliverance. The best that others promise is amelioration. There is the issue in a nutshell, amelioration or deliverance. This, taken with the fact that Socialism strikes terror to few hearts, makes the contest, even in Oakland, more problematical than it would have been a year or two ago.

Congress Is At It By the time this issue of The California Outlook reaches its readers the extraordinary session of congress will be in full swing. The Democrats are starting off well. They seem likely to complete the work of insurgency in the lower house by making autocracy less likely and democratic government of that body easier. Canadian reciprocity will doubtless go through all right after the mails shall have been loaded with addresses, never delivered, to be sent out for home consumption. Republican bourbonism will hardly dare kill it although its fingers will itch to get at its weasand. The chief business of both sides of both chambers will be to deploy for position for 1912, although it would seem from the common sense of the situation as though most of that work might have to go over until the regular session in December when the tariff board will have finished its investigations of the wool schedules and perhaps of cotton and steel, too. It will scarcely profit either side to stay in session half the summer to manufacture thunder that may spoil on its hands when the first frost comes. Therefore The Watchman looks for a short session and a going home to feel of the public pulse until December. The nation needs a breathing spell.

Pertinent Editorial Extracts From Our State Exchanges

Awful!

The members of the Triangle Shirtwaist Company, of New York, are dealers in such shirtwaists as Madame wears. Also, but merely as an incident of their regular business, they are dealers in human lives, staking them against dollars in profits. A week ago last Saturday Harris & Blanck made an unmentioned number of dollars, and for them they paid the lives of one hundred and forty and odd human beings, mostly women and girl children, not to mention another hundred or so who were crushed and maimed. It is a nice business that the Triangle Shirtwaist Company conducts, precisely such a nice business as might be expected to flourish in hell under the old brimstone dispensation.—San Francisco Star.

Gamblers Were the Main Thing

Racing is dead throughout the country. Its death is due to the stringent laws against bookmaking which the states have passed.

This proves that horse-racing cannot thrive without gambling as its main attraction.

When the anti-race track bill was before the last Legislature desperate efforts were made by the race-track men to show that the race-track was not a side issue for the gamblers. It was contended that racing was "the sport of kings"; that crowds went to the track to see the ponies run, and for nothing else, and that the gambling, objected to, was but a minor matter.

But when the Legislature put a ban on bookmaking, racing stopped. No one wanted to see the horses run around the track, if it was impossible to get a little bet down.

So it is all over the United States. Where gambling is prohibited there is no racing.

All of which proves that the bookmakers were the main thing at the tracks. The horses were only a secondary consideration.—Oakland Enquirer.

People's Interests First

The attention of those who voted against Hiram Johnson last November because he was "the son of his father" is respectfully called to the fact that Assembly bill 718, drafted by Grove L. Johnson and making it unlawful for any one not a member of a fraternal, benevolent or secret society to have in his possession or to print or sell any expose or statement of the secret or unwritten work of the society was barred from the statute book by the Governor's veto. The Governor said he could not approve of the intent of the proposed law in endeavoring to protect something about which the law can know nothing.—Napa Register.

A Free Legislature

Another California Legislature has passed into history. It is the first, since the days when the corporations took a business interest in politics, that the lobby did not direct the making of the ordinances or the clinking of gold and the passing of bank notes influence in part or in all the law making function. Not that there have not been men of integrity in the legislatures of the past, not that in a few instances legislative action has been directed towards the weal of the State, but these instances stand out so prominently as to be distinguished as exceptions to the rule. To the shame of the people of California, boodle and corruption have stalked unchecked through its legislative halls. Their representatives in the majority of instances have been the mere puppets of greedy interests, corporate and otherwise, which dominated through the "boss system" and whose power was expressed by the dollar symbol.—Martinez Standard.

The Camorra Drama

More thrilling than the most sensational melodrama ever penned by playwright are the scenes which are being enacted daily in the trial of the thirty Camorrists at Viterbo. As one reads the proceedings in court, it seems impossible to believe that they recount actual events in the twentieth century and are not the product of the fevered genius among the moving-picture impresarios.

"Temperament" is given free play at Viterbo, but if the result of the trial is the breaking up of one of the most blood-thirsty and dangerous gangs that ever disgraced civilization there will be no need to scoff at justice as it is administered in Italy.—San Francisco Post.

Public's Refusal to Allow the Saloon to be Linked with Recognized Wine Industry

The Wholesalers' and Retailers' Review of the California liquor interests naturally feels grouchy over the result of the local option contest in the Legislature. The failure of the saloon "interests" to hide behind the grape growers and thus secure some form of favor it would be impossible to secure if they stood alone, was doubtless disappointing to them. Moreover, it is alarming to the opponents of majority rule to note the disposition by the public to meet the saloon issue without diversion from the main subject.

The liquor interests have been made to realize that they cannot and will not be dealt with in the same manner as the wine interests. The saloon presents a distinct issue. It must stand or fall on the public will. It is not a business, but a privilege revocable at any time by the people. —Central California Record.

Our Lumber Consumption

The consumption of timber by the United States for domestic purposes, largely for the construction of houses, is far in excess of the quantity employed by other nations for similar purposes. Germany uses 37 cubic feet per capita, France 25 feet, Great Britain 14 and the United States 230 cubic feet. Cheap lumber in the United States has contributed toward an immense fire loss bill, and if our people should be forced by dearer lumber to use more durable and less inflammable materials it would be a blessing to the country.—Redlands Review.

Roosevelt a Factor

A strange discrepancy is noted between the brave assertions of the foes of Theodore Roosevelt and the secret quakings over his tour of the country. The reactionary press proclaimed Roosevelt "a dead one," but quite inconsistently they admit in private that they are much disturbed over the journey which he has taken this spring through the West. It would naturally be assumed that no sane man would be disturbed over the prospect of a corpse being hauled from city to city to be exhibited to the people. So that the perturbation of the reactionary press over Roosevelt's tour is but an illustration of the insincerities which so often are noted in the expressions of many modern newspapers. He is and will continue to be a very large factor in our national life, and that man will not be forwarded in any political venture who enlists the antagonism of Mr. Roosevelt.

Interest in Mr. Roosevelt's tour is increased by the authorized assurance that he will support a progressive candidate for President in 1912. He will not take the field as an active fighter for or against Taft or anyone else, but his influence will be exerted along the lines laid down by the National Progressive Republican League.—John E. Lathrop, in April Pacific Monthly.

WHO KILLED THE TARIFF COMMISSION?

It is the morning of the 4th of March. The hands of the clocks in the House of Representatives point to the hour of ten. In two hours the 61st Congress will have gone into history. The Tariff Commission Bill is before the House for action upon the Senate amendments. Two-thirds of its members are in favor of the bill. Fitzgerald, of Tammany Hall, the Democratic ally of Cannon, has been leading a filibuster against it. Cannon is apparently using all of his great power as Speaker to defeat Fitzgerald and save the tariff commission. He holds motions made by Fitzgerald dilatory. The friends of the Tariff Commission look on and it appears to them that Cannon's last hours are to be his best hours; that his last act as Speaker will be for the public good instead of for Special Privilege.

The roll is being called for the adoption of a rule, providing for a vote upon all the Senate amendments at one time. Only one of these Senate amendments is of any importance. When this roll call began the friends of the Tariff Commission said that the fight of years had been won. Apparently nothing now could prevent the passage of the bill. The rule prevented any other business being considered. Two more roll calls were the most that could be demanded by Fitzgerald. These could be completed before 12 o'clock, the hour of final adjournment, with 15 minutes to spare. Nothing could defeat the bill now. So thought the friends of the Tariff Commission.

Section 29 of the House Rules contains the following provision:

"The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order except when the journal is being read, while the roll is being called, or the house is dividing on any proposition."

The roll call is half completed by the clerk. Then Tawney arises from his seat. Speaker Cannon, deliberately disregarding this rule, recognizes him to present a conference report on the general deficiency bill. A storm of protest arises from the House. Cannon refuses to hear. In willful violation of his own rules which he has so often lauded, he arbitrarily suspends the roll call upon the Tariff Commission Bill and the ayes and nays are ordered upon the motion made by Tawney upon the conference report. The House witnesses the spectacle, unparalleled in parliamentary history, of two roll calls pending at the same time. The thirty-five minutes necessary for the roll call upon the deficiency bill makes it impossible to complete the vote upon the Tariff Commission bill before 12 o'clock. The last roll call cannot now be completed before 20 minutes after 12. The friends of the Tariff Commission see victory wrested from them through the most shameful outrage ever perpetrated in the House.

By unanimous consent, the bill, now dead, is withdrawn. Cannon and Fitzgerald and Tawney have won the battle for Special Privilege. The people have again been betrayed.

Now that the Tariff Commission Bill is dead, the Speaker orders the hands of the clock turned back. But a moment since and the clock registered 20 minutes to 12. We look again and it is a quarter past eleven. Now there is ample time for the transaction of business by unanimous consent. The conference report upon the general deficiency bill which was used to defeat the Tariff Commission could now have been adopted by unanimous consent, for at no time was there any real opposition to it.

The first session of the 61st Congress began with an alliance between Cannon, Tawney, and their followers, and Fitzgerald and his followers. The third session of the 61st Congress closed with the combination still intact, and in splendid working order. Will it continue during the 62nd Congress? Let us watch and see.—La Follette's.

Buffalo's Municipal Experiment

Commission government for cities up to 150,000 has spread to all parts of the country and has been generally successful. Buffalo is the first large city seriously to propose its adoption.

The Buffalo Chamber of Commerce has fallen in line with twenty-two other commercial bodies of that city in indorsing the commission plan and the city will doubtless adopt it. The scheme lodges the power of passing ordinances and administering the city's affairs in a council composed of the mayor and four councilmen.

The distinction of the mayor, who is without a veto, is his headship of the department of public safety, which includes the police, fire and health departments. All city officers and employes are appointed by the council, subject to civil service regulations; iniative, referendum and recall are provided for, and the granting of franchises is expressly reserved to the citizens, the expense of a special election being borne by applicants for the franchise.

It goes without saying that other large cities will keep an interested eye on Buffalo and be governed largely by its experience. The most significant thing about its proposed charter is the inclusion of the recall, initiative and referendum. It shows that the pioneering done in this line by Los Angeles is bearing fruit to the farthest points; that the conservative East no longer regards those instruments of democracy as mere rattle-brain theories of the wild and wooly West.—Los Angeles Herald.

ANARCHY—TWO KINDS

Hon. J. Scads Plunket at the Prosperity dinner of the Hogitall Association: But now looking around in our fair land what do we behold? The mobs led by demagogues are seeking to take power in their own hands. Their banners flaunt strange devices; the initiative, referendum and recall. Politics has long been so corrupt that most of us have refrained from voting, but now it grows worse and threatens the very foundation of our industrial system. We have survived the seven weary years of Roosevelt, but we cannot long endure this spirit of Rooseveltism that has seized upon the people. It must be stamped out, and our resources must be freely used to that end. These wanton persecutions of our captains of industry must cease. We must stand solidly together to oppose all organization among the working classes. And we must not ignore the people as we have too often done in the past. We must secure control of the influential publications and must advertise freely. Liberal subscriptions should be made to both political parties, and skilled men should be employed to look out for freak legislation that is dangerous to our interests. We, to whom the Lord has given charge of the wealth and prosperity of this nation, carry a great responsibility, which it needs all our patriotism to sustain. [Loud applause.]

Max Mouldy, the Red : They tell us—these robber capitalists that grind the faces of the poor—they tell us we should respect the government, and they expect us to cheer when their flag goes by in the street. I don't cheer. I groan or I hiss. What has the government ever done for me, I ask? Here I am and there you are, without the price of a beer in our pockets. I know that, because if we had the price none of us wouldn't be here. What has the government ever done for us but rob and oppress us and throw us into the cooler? They're just a lot of grafters, over there in Washington, cooking up tricks to skin the people out of their last cent. To hell with government, I say! Smash it! Bust it! Down with it if I had my way—[Is collared by policeman and dragged off to the lock-up.]

The Kohlsaat Case

The press generally has applauded vehemently the conduct of Editor Kohlsaat in sitting tight and refusing to answer when questioned as to the source of his information regarding the Lorimer slush fund. The correctness of the press view is to be questioned. It may be true to say that information, conveyed in confidence to a newspaper man, has as good a right to be privileged as if conveyed to one's spiritual adviser, his physician or to his attorney, but it does not follow that a sound public policy any longer justifies privileged communications at all. At a time when our civilization seems well-nigh on the verge of collapsing because of failure to administer justice it ill becomes parson, editor or lawyer to go about immune from questioning when he has locked up in his breast evidence that would bring the guilty to justice and sinners to a repentance. "Underwriting" the candidacy of any aspirant for senatorial honors is moral treason to nation and state, and shall treason go unpunished because some person was "told in confidence?" Somewhat of rotting in jail for contumacy in refusing to tell might lead to a more rational journalistic view of the proprieties in such cases. It should be conventionally understood that every promise not to tell, to whomever given, is abrogated at the bar of justice. There is no other way adequately to protect society from those who love darkness rather than light.

A Job for Roosevelt

The supreme need of the world is for an inter-acting, compound, reciprocating, all-embracing arbitration treaty to which all the great nations of Europe, Asia and America shall be parties. Nothing else since the dawn of the Christian era would so ameliorate the lot of mankind. It is a job for Theodore Roosevelt and one to which he may well devote the remainder of his life if need be. To this end the President and Congress should constitute him ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, with abundant credit, and set him at the job. He is the foremost personality in the world, has the ear of all nations and can "turn the trick," if anybody can. As for the little nations, the juvenile experiments in free government—well, they may have to be swallowed by bigger fish in order to be made to behave. No mere legalities should stand between the race and the peace of the world.

Neither Drunk nor Sober

Mr. Charles K. McClatchy, writing from Italy, declares that, during several weeks of sojourn in that land of sparkle and of wine, he did not see one drunken person. Very likely, but did he see one person who was thoroughly and absolutely sober? That is much more to the point. Science has demonstrated that alcohol, taken into the system, even in the most moderate quantities, instantly impairs, to an appreciable extent, the normal action of the brain when tested accurately. The pleasure of having the cobwebs now and again cut out of the throat and the delightful palateableness of that which tastes "like your foot's asleep" may justify an occasional impairment of brain reactions just for the nonce, but a nation that is never thoroughly sober has little to boast over another people that sometimes gets drunk but, all the rest of the time, is as sober as a judge. Mr. McClatchy should supplement his casual observations with careful experiments in a psychological laboratory and then report further.

"There Was a Man!"

Broken in fortune and in body, Tom Johnson succumbed finally to the inevitable. So be it. But who shall write his life down a failure? Sleek and comfortable men, who have looked out for themselves and the main chance, will doubtless say, "What a fool! He might have been one of us;" but millions of his fellow citizens who never saw him, but only knew of the brave fight he waged for a square deal on the part of their public-service masters toward the people of his city, will say of him what Mark Antony said of Brutus when he stood over his dead body: "There was a man!" "He was one of us." Tom Johnson fought, beaten again and again, only again and again to fight until, beaten, broken, bankrupted, he could fight no more. Nevertheless, he triumphed in that he forgot self in warring for the common good and the work he did will live to make other fights for Right Things more easily won. "There was a man!"

Vive Women of Washington!

Those of us who are in a consenting frame of mind, but have not become enthusiastic for female suffrage, find ourselves so minded chiefly because of the dread of doubling the non-participating electorate, the enticing out to the polls of which now constitutes the chiefest burden of free government, but the women of Washington state have turned out and voted so far as they have had opportunity so to do. They did it at Seattle and recalled an unfit mayor. They did it at Tacoma with results that the "push" despised. If the women of Washington can demonstrate that, having the franchise they will exercise it, and not merely double the burden to be carried by those strivers for Right Things who exhaust themselves trying to get out the reputable vote, they will win the cause for the suffragists of California, too. Therefore watch the Women of Washington. See how they do.

Toujours Le Bryan

FOR a space of three years, eleven months and twenty-nine days, the American people think pretty well of Mr. Bryan, and then comes a day, early in November, when they are accustomed to say "no" to his one perennial, ever-blooming ambition. The arrangement seems to have all the earmarks of permanency. If conditions are bad with the Democratic party, Bryan is willing to run as a forlorn hope. If conditions are favorable, who more than he is entitled to take advantage of the opportunity? If things are just medium, then he can be run on general principles.

The present situation certainly comes under the second head. The first big, royal chance that the Democrats have had since 1892—and bigger than that showed at the time—is right now on deck. A party that would ask for anything easier to beat than the Republicans in their present condition of blundering, quarreling, hopeless demoralization, certainly must be made up of a lot of political mollycoddles. If there ever was, or will be, a first-class chance to repay the Peerless One for his tremendous sacrifice of time and words in behalf of a losing cause, now is the very flood-tide of its opportunity. Signs are not lacking that he and his friends understand the situation, and are planning to play up to it.

It would be a strange turn in the whirligig of politics, if the very forces that fought Bryan fifteen years ago should struggle to accomplish his nomination in 1912—yet it may easily work out that way. Let us trace the probable sequence of events.

First, with respect to the Republican nomination, the political prophets seem to be almost unanimous in the belief that it will go to Taft. His prospects certainly look good at present writing—an admission we make unwillingly but under compulsion of fact. In spite of reciprocity with Canada and the tariff commission, the stand-patters look upon him as their man. With the air so full of radicalism, they recognize that he is about as far as they can hope to go. Having fooled him so successfully with Ballinger, with Aldrich and Cannon and Tawney, on the tariff law and the parcels post, they figure that when he is safely embarked in another term, he may come out squarely on the side of privilege. He will get the delegates from the conservative Eastern states, and of course of the entire South, which always gives its convention vote to the man with the offices in his control. He may even get some insurgent support—of the moderates who dread a row and possible Democratic success.

But Taft's nomination, while it counts as a victory for the reactionary element in the Republican camp, is likely to strengthen the hands of the progressive element in the Democratic camp. The supporters of privilege can scarcely hope to carry the day in both places. Their man seems to be Harmon, although Dix, if he should chance to strike a popular chord, might do. On the other hand, the man they have most to fear is Woodrow Wilson—a democratic Democrat, clear-headed, courageous, magnetic, with a tremendous following of the young independent progressives of both parties. He is precisely the kind of man Privilege fears, because he is thoroughly in earnest and knows how to make good politically.

With respect to the Democratic nomination then, it will be, on the part of the reacprimaries, a case of anything to beat Wilson. They must beat him, or he may beat Taft.

In the "Hoosier School Master" one of the characters is a half-crazy fellow who thinks one side of his head is made of potato. He is rational on every other topic but that. When he is a witness in a case, the opposing lawyers craftily bring the matter around to potatoes so as to ruin his testimony.

Now Bill Bryan is the potato side of Democracy's cranium. An old-line member of that party will be talking with perfect sanity on some subject of politics or government when someone calls out "Bryan." Instantly he yells "Whoop," and proceeds to throw a fit. Reason retires to a safe distance, and political discretion shakes its head in despair. The thing seems to be quite incurable, and the attacks are just as acute now as they were when it began in 1896.

Early in January of this year Mr. Bryan announced his "Three Tests for the Democratic Candidate of 1912." Two of them do not matter, but the third was that he must have supported the Democratic ticket continuously from and including 1896.

Now there are those who say this test absolutely excludes Woodrow Wilson; that he voted and spoke for Palmer and Buckner in 1896, and was for McKinley in 1900. They say furthermore that Bryan has absolute evidence of this, and that he intends to cut Wilson out of the nomination. A combination of the reactionary element that dreads and fears Wilson with the wild-eyed element that is for Bryan anyhow if he wants it, would make something over a majority, wouldn't it? And anyway Wilson must have two-thirds of all the delegates to win.

Of course reactionary support of Bryan in the Democratic convention would be based on the theory that he would be easy for Taft to beat; radical support of him would be the result of habit. Between the two he is likely either to be nominated, or to name the nominee. He is not likely to name Wilson. If conditions continue as favorable as they now are, he is most likely to take the nomination himself.

This may seem rather a gloomy view of the outlook, but it is just as well that progressive Republicans and independents should look the facts squarely in the face, and should base their fight in the party on the theory that there is not much to hope for in the other camp.

C. D. W.

Employers' Liability

THE history of the sanctioning of the fellow servant principle by the supreme court of California affords an interesting chapter in "Man's Inhumanity to Man." It was consummated by the Southern Pacific Company after years of waiting for a time when it had constituted the supreme court of the state with that object in view. When the psychological moment arrived the program went through without a hitch on the strength of an unquestioned decision then lately rendered in the State of New York, doubtless planned for in the same way. In consequence thousands of maimed men have been cast out to be burdens upon the general community with as little compassion as if they had been so many mules.

But California, at the late session of the legislature, thanks largely to the indefatigable persistence of Senator Roseberry of Santa Barbara, undertook to undo this wrong which working men have suffered and the indications are that, with time to get the new machinery in working order, great gain will result to society as a whole and to injured persons in particular. The fellow servant principle has been abrogated by statute and the doctrine of contributory negligence has been confined to a lessening of the recompense for injury instead of forestalling it altogether.

This is part of a world movement in which the old world has far out-distanced the new, possibly because European nations more highly regard the working man as a national asset than is the custom with us. We are accustomed to feel that if one man is killed we can import another from Europe to take his place, so what is the odds. This in part accounts for the fact that we kill in our industrial life two and a half times as many in proportion to working population as are killed in France, Germany or England, our total death roll approximating 35,000 and our injured list reaching nearly 2,000,000 a year.

Some disquietude has been felt for this new measure by reason of the invalidating of an employers' liability law by the highest court of New York, but that law was special in that it related to hazardous industries and afforded automatic compensation apart from any negligence whatever on the part of either employer or employee. The court found the statute in question in conflict with the "due process of law" provision in the state constitution, and the inference is plain that it would have been held by the same court, had it been necessary, to be in conflict with the same provision in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, although the makers of neither constitution had any such purpose in mind when such provisions were made and adopted. The court read them in, for the doing of which the justices thereof have been very generally and sometimes severely criticised.

The California statute appears to have provided for this contingency in advance by making it optional with employers to come under the provisions of the law, and submit to a graduated liability, or take their chances in the courts with jury trials under the old system whereby lawyers were fattened and only employers and employes made lean. Of nearly $100,000,000 paid to accident insurance companies by American employers in eleven years, it has been estimated that less than $30,000,000 found their way into the pockets of the injured, all the rest going either to the insurance companies or to the lawyers who prosecuted the claims.

The purpose of this new form of legislation, in which New York led and California and New Jersey followed, is not to mulct employers except where they have been grossly negligent, but to make the compensation allowed for accidents a part of the cost of doing business to be carried on to the consuming public for wide distribution in the price rate. Where there has been culpable negligence the employer, and none other, should bear the cost of it.

Properly administered, this law should, in time, for it will require no little time to work its way into the confidence of employers and employes, prove of great advantage to Californian industries and help to bring to us an increasing labor supply, but of course many safeguarding appliances will have to be installed and preventive measures taken for the reduction of hazard. It is to be hoped that the new law will be received in a cordial spirit inasmuch as its purpose is to establish justice and not to mulct anybody beyond his deserts.

State and National Rate Making

THE doctrine set forth by Judge W. H. Sanborn, in the United States Circuit Court of Minnesota, on the question of a state's right to legislate on railway rates within its borders is new and rather startling. It is in effect that a state has no power to make freight or passenger rates, when the result of such legislation can be shown to bear directly or indirectly on the making of an interstate rate.

At first glance this does not look revolutionary, and yet it is; for carried to a logical conclusion it may deprive the states of all power to fix railway charges, or for that matter, to regulate railways in a fashion that will affect their finances—a general police power alone excepted.

Judge Sanborn's logic is plain enough, although the mere synopsis of the decision given by the Associated Press compels us to figure it out for ourselves. The states granted to the general government the power to regulate interstate commerce. In doing so they surrendered all powers over the railroads that would conflict with the general government's exercise of that power. "To the extent," says the Judge, "that it does not substantially burden or regulate interstate commerce, a state may regulate intra-state commerce and the fares and rates therein." But a study of the general system of through and local rates and their interdependence, especially where freight passes from one road to another, will show that it is quite impossible to inaugurate a general intra-state system, like a flat two-cent passenger rate, for example, without upsetting interstate rates in all directions. This may be described as direct interference, and it is so "substantial"—to use Judge Sanborn's word—as to forestall, under his ruling, any general rate making by state railway commissions.

As to interference indirect, by touching the finances of railways, there is no limit to that. Whenever a state lowers a rate, it presumably diminishes the earning capacity of the road, and this of course interferes with the fixing of interstate rates, for the latter must be graded to allow fair dividends.

It might seem that a state had final power of action with respect to a road that was entirely within its borders, but such roads connect up with others and make interstate rates in conjunction with them, and hence are subject to the rate-making power of the general government.

Judge Sanborn seems to wish to provide a theoretical basis at least for the exercise of some powers by the state, for he not only limits the prohibition by the use of the words "substantially burden," but he says, furthermore, that the state may enforce regulations that "only incidentally or remotely affect interstate commerce." But this is a good deal like allowing the pound of flesh, provided there is no flow of blood.

Colonel Roosevelt in his New Nationalism speeches has warned us to be on our guard against the "twilight zone" between the power of the states and that of the national government, where corporations would seek to hide themselves. Judge Sanborn seems to have shot a searchlight ray into this zone, though whether from the right or wrong angle is a matter that will call for more consideration.

The Case of Boss Cox

BOSS COX of Cincinnati lied. Unfortunately for him he lied to a grand jury of two years ago in stating upon oath that he had not received any moneys from the treasurers of Cincinnati, whereas he had received $48,500 from one and $17,500 from another. This constituted perjury and he was indicted.

He thought himself safe from prosecution. He had selected and elected every judge, except one, of the court of common pleas of Hamilton county and they all knew their master's voice. This one was a Democrat who got in somehow and was to be transferred from the criminal court the first of April. All looked well except that an upstart of an insurgent, of the name of Hunt, had somehow been elected district attorney when Boss Cox was not looking, but even he could do nothing with the judges all against him, so Boss Cox went into hiding to await the incapacitating of the one free judge on the bench in that city.

But he was smoked out and haled into court and the insurgent prosecutor and free judge put their heads together and took a change of venue from Cincinnati, where Cox controlled all the courts and half the probable jurors of the town, to Clermont county, where he does not control anybody. What the outcome will be nobody knows, but decent folk may hope with some reason for a triumph of justice at last against one of the great malefactors of our time and country. That hope lies in getting the case away from Judges Boss Cox has made and from the city whose political life he controls.

And yet the citizenry of Cincinnati is, no doubt, gravely warned against thinking evil of the local judiciary. They are admonished by press and pulpit that if faith in the judiciary is lost all is lost, and some may be frightened thereby, whereas the need of the time is to strip from the judiciary the mask of the most injurious sham of our era and resolutely inquire who made it. It is as impossible that a judiciary constituted by a Cox or a Herrin can be worthy of veneration and trust as it is that a police force dominated by the tenderloin of any city can be a safe reliance for good order.

We, in California, have suffered much at the hands of legislatures dominated by special interests, but we have suffered vastly more from a judiciary so dominated for the reason that, while the legislatures, speedily so lost the confidence of the people as to make a legislative position devoid of honor, only just now being restored, the traditions of a better time so safeguarded the judiciary as to beguile the people into believing that a scrub politician, once elevated to the bench, straightway became a different man and worthy of trust and reverence. This was dangerous.

Before we accord veneration to the occupant of any bench we must diligently inquire how he got there; who it was that made him a judge. If the answer be a Herrin or a Cox we must, as good citizens, keep that judicial officer under surveillance while on the bench and get him off it as soon as ever we can. Fortunately for California, we, The People, may now, if we will, select and elect our own judges, and if we do not we shall deserve to be adjudged and policed by minions of boss and tenderloin.

Snob Schools

PRESIDENT WHEELER, of the State University, has given expression to some, for him (for he is habitually guarded in his statements), decisive opinions in regard to private schools of a certain class, the particular class in mind being those snob schools which have no reason for existing except that snob-ocratic persons desire to prevent their children associating with the progeny of the common herd. He declares them un-American. They are all of that. They are unpatriotic. They make against the solidarity of the American people, they accentuate that class consciousness that is the most portentous evil of our time. They are generally not as good schools as the public schools, inasmuch as they toady for patronage at the cost of discipline and thorough mental training. But their greatest harm is visited upon the progeny of the snob-ocrats themselves in that they separate these exclusive children from the inclusive constituents of our civilization at that period of life during which they can best understand and appreciate manhood and womanhood in the making. They will be aliens in their own land, uncomprehending, unsympathetic and unloved. Private schools we do need to do work that the public schools do not yet do, schools to lead the way for public schools to follow, but private schools that merely ape the public schools, without being public, are vain things, things to be under the ban of public disapproval. They should be made ashamed to exist.

Wickersham the Wonderful

ONE more intrepid political explorer in the eastern part of this Union has discovered the initiative, referendum and recall and has made haste to warn people against them. This time it is Attorney General Wickersham, the bitter and relentless persecutor of bad corporations, a man who thinks nothing at all of slapping a trust two or three times right on the wrist.

To this bold Mr. Wickersham belongs the extraordinary honor of having discovered a brand new reason why direct legislation will never do. We have been told that it was dangerous and revolutionary and Socialistic and contrary to a Republican form of government and that it struck at the very foundations of our commercial prosperity; but it remained for Mr. Wickersham to adduce a reason so keen and penetrating and at the same time so overwhelming that the onward march of democracy must surely stop to consider it.

Speaking to the Chamber of Commerce of Cleveland, Mr. Wickersham declares his chief objection to the initiative, referendum and recall to be: That they indicate a complete lack of faith in the people.

There you are now! Looks like a misprint, but it is nothing of the kind. On the contrary, this is an admirable illustration of what the "legal mind" can do when it gets down to business on a really difficult problem.

Give the lay reader three guesses at the process by which the great trust buster has figured this out and he retires foiled, giddy and all unstrung. But to a lawyer it is simple enough. After one has learned to believe that a murderer is innocent if the name of the state is misspelled in the indictment, a problem like the one given above is a mere titivation.

How do these laws show distrust of the people? Wickersham tells us it is because they are based on the assumption that the people lack the judgment to choose genuine representatives and faithful executives.

Quite so. These laws are based on that assumption and the said assumption is perfectly sound and in accordance with fact. And here we have a good example of that form of sophistry where something that is true in itself is offered as a reason when it is not a reason at all. The mind is caught and attracted by the question of verity and forgets to run back and check up the sequence. Take that home, Mr. Legal Mind, and try it on your piano.

Does it show distrust of ourselves when we add to the powers we already possess the further power to correct any error we may possibly make? But the thing is really too absurd to argue. If anybody but a Cabinet officer had offered it to the public we would have been tempted to answer as the countryman did who was shown the kangaroo at the circus: "Aw, come off—there ain't no such animal."

Our National Sin

IT IS passing strange that, bred in school of Puritanism as we were, dishonesty should become our national sin, but it has. Our foreign trade languishes chiefly because of bad faith in filling orders—short weight, adulteration, impairment in quality as compared with sample, sharp dealing. Our home traffic is a constant war against spurious brands, labels, mixtures and decoctions. Go into any dry goods store or haberdashers and evidence of our national dishonesty will be encountered on every hand. The genius of invention is devoted, not to making goods "all wool and a yard wide," but to making cheap imitations of real things look like genuine and pass for such. We have in the aggregate, practiced petty larceny to greater pecuniary advantage than we have promoted trusts or exploited our resources. In all other attributes we Americans rank well. In this particular, chiefly in manufacturing, we outdo the Hindu. Is it because our excessive protective tariffs have made going through the pockets of our own people so profitable as to make our producers indifferent to the markets and reputations of the world? "Made in Germany," is a guaranty the world around, and the sign of the lion or the unicorn on a fabric makes assurance of its genuineness doubly sure, but whoever saw "Made in America," put on anything? Only our raw materials are accepted without question and even these are remeasured and reweighed for the prevention of accidents. God give us grace to be honest!

Secretary Ballinger said, when Washington women were given the ballot, that he was "ashamed" of his State and if he had been there he "would have voted against it." The recent elections in Seattle (and Ballinger used to be Mayor of that city) explain why Ballinger was disgusted. Women's votes out there were thrown almost solidly against the politicians of the Ballinger type.—La Follette's.

Theodcre Roosevelt Would Have Said So The President's message to Congress was prudent and unpretending. It did no more than to present the Canadian Reciprocity treaty to Congress and to urge its adoption. What the President wishes Congress distinctly to understand, however, is that he wants that body to pass that measure, pack its grips and go home without standing upon the order of going. He desires to have it understood that any tariff legislation enacted before his tariff board makes its report will be vetoed and that tariff tinkering in advance of the making of that report, promised in December, will be time wasted. He is right about it. The tariff board is now at work on the woolen schedule and on high grade, highly protected cottons. These schedules need revision in the light of accurate knowledge, a kind of knowledge that Congress has not now and never has had. The President will find a way delicately to convey to Congress his ultimatum, but his regard for the proprieties of his position prevents his taking the country into his confidence also. Theodore Roosevelt would have said so openly, the people would have been with him and Congress would have bowed before the storm. Under Taft Congress will storm before it bows to the presidential will, if it does so at all, and a needless, and very likely false, issue may be the result of an imprudent prudence. It is not always that the conventionally correct thing pays the best. The President's message was a sham in that it did not say what he wanted to say or what the soher hetter sense of The People wanted him to say.

How the Amendment Is Being Killed There are evidences that opposition to the adoption of the income tax amendment to the Constitution of the United States is being systematically waged hy powerful interests in New York. The assumption is that it is being done legitimately, hut the presumption is that "slush" funds have come to he looked upon as legitimate arguments to be employed in special cases where nothing else will prove effective. In New Hampshire, for instance, both political parties endorsed the amendment in their platforms and at the polls, but the State Senate, which contains only fourteen members, refused to ratify the will of the people specifically expressed. Attention has been devoted almost exclusively to the upper houses of conservative States. Twelve States can defeat the amendment as the Union is now constituted, but if New Mexico and Arizona be admitted it will require thirteen. Arizona will vote right, hut we cannot be sure how New Mexico will line up. There is, however, no especial need for worrying over the issue. If war should come, and an income tax be needed, there would be a race between the recalcitrant states and the Supreme Court to see which could validate the income tax the quickest. Public sentiment would raise such a storm that neither courts nor controlled states could withstand it.

Mammon and the Inheritance Tax If the Mammon of Wall street is, as reported, fighting the income tax with one hand it is also giving the inheritance tax laws of that State a few sharp digs with the other and to considerable effect. New York has a wonderfully progressive inheritance tax law, thanks, no doubt, to the influence of former Governor Hughes. It is graduated. It taxes the biggest fortunes at an increasing rate when they come to be parceled out at the death of the accumulator. That is as it should be, but in New York the scare has been raised that the inheritance tax law is driving capital out of the State. That is a real difficulty with State assessment and collection of inheritance taxes. Fortunes tend to make their nominal abiding place where the lowest tax rate is. This may drive the national government into assuming to levy and collect inheritance taxes for the States if not for the uses of the government itself. At present the greatest confusion results. Securities held in one State, covering property in another, may be assessed for an inheritance tax in that State and the property itself may be assessed again in the State where located. It is said to be possible, under existing conditions of the laws, for a single fortune to be levied upon for inheritance taxes four different times in as many different States which, of course, is not right. Neither is it right to tax the wife on community property inherited from her husband or husband on community property inherited from the wife. These tangles need to be taken out and then inheritance taxes should be made graduated and universal. This is a right way to get great accumulations back into the common fund without which society must stratify itself forever.

The "Underwriting" Of the Blonde Boss The Lorimer incident has furnished us with a new meaning for an old word and not at all unnaturally. From subscribing for all the capital stock of an over-capitalized American industrial, and working the risks off onto a confiding public for a big bonus, paid in shares, to subscribing to a "slush" fund for the election of an unfit man to be a United States Senator is not such a far cry, come to look back at it. The "practical" man who "gets what he goes after," and thinks it right to get it any way he can, will draw few distinctions between "underwriting" a campaign for Senator and buying the way in for the tool he wants to use. Nohody doubts that Lorimer's election was bought or that Lorimer had guilty knowledge of what was going on, and nobody has doubted the truth of these averments since Roosevelt refused to sit at table with the tainted tool of special interests. No far-away look in the eyes of any Lorimer is likely to deceive any person of sound mind and it is unlikely that any Senator who voted against unseating the blond boss was deceived as to the fact of his candidacy being "underwritten," but only the blindest of Bourbonism can, now that the subject is up again for consideration, persist in not seeing the bald, bad facts. We of California know that if Judge Works is set to unraveling that mystery he will go to the bottom of it, and very likely make the Lorimer incident the last of its class. By the time it has passed into history the present system of electing United States Senators will have passed with it. It will be no easy task to "underwrite" a whole State. Meantime let us hope that Illinois will become so ashamed of itself as to ferret out the local "underwriters" and give them nice jobs breaking rock at Joliet wherewith to fill some of the chuck holes for which the roads of that State are famous.

Something Must be Saved

A Violent Presumption—Judge Hanford, of questionable notority, declared, in the Alaskan coal land cases tried before him, that "Congress intended to enact a practicable, workahle, coal and timber lands law." Upon this assumption, he proceeded to read into the law declarations that were not put into it by Congress. The presumption of Judge Hanford is violent and not warranted by the fact. If Congress had intended to enact a rational, workahle, coal and timber lands law there was nothing in the way to prevent its doing so. Not a woodsman in the nation but knew that, honestly executed, the law authorizing the selling of hig timbered tracts in homestead areas to actual settlers, or big coal mines to poor pioneers, was a farce; that no poor man could harvest the timber crop from his quarter section or mine and market the coal under his Alaskan holdings. Our Congressmen are not fools. When, decades ago, they extended the preemption idea to coal lands and timber, it was done with a full understanding that these lands would pass from dummy locator to financing speculator with all the celerity with which red tape will permit. The grahbers were content with things as they were and, had they pronosed other and more direct methods of getting what they wanted, they would have provoked discussion and opposition. The people were content with a semblance to a right law and the grahhers with the substance of a bad one, and so the nation waited, sleeping, for the advent of Roosevelt and

Is Direct Legislation Unconstitutional?

The California Outlook has repeatedly called attention to the effort that is now put forth by opponents of direct legislation and the recall to get them declared unconstitutional in the courts, on the ground that they are contrary to Article IV of the United States constitution, which guarantees to every State "a republican form of government." This matter is soon to be passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, on a case that went up from Oregon some years ago. But in the meantime the Supreme Court of that progressive State has rendered a decision covering that exact issue, and the language used is so clear and convincing, and the quotations from Jefferson and others who took part in the making of our constitution so perfectly adapted to the new order of things, that we reproduce herewith the sections of the decision bearing on that issue. It is to be found in Pacific Reporter 112—No. 3, pages 403 to 408; Kiernan v. City of Portland, et al., Dec. 31, 1910:

Article 4, section 4, Const. U. S. reads: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence." In Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 48, 12 L. Ed. 581, the court observes: "Moreover, the Constitution of the United States, as far as it has provided for an emergency of this kind, and authorized the general government to interfere in the domestic concerns of a State, has treated the subject as political in its nature, and placed the power in the hands of that department. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on the application of the Legislature or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence. Under this article of the Constitution, it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantees to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal." See, also, Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) pp. 42, 45; Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700, 730, 19 L. Ed. 227; Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U. S. 548, 20 Sup. Ct. 890, 1009, 44 L. Ed. 1187, and 6 Mich. Law Review, 304, where authorities sustaining the above view are collated. We have an illustration of the principles announced in Luther v. Borden in the admission of Oklahoma as a State. Before its statehood was recognized, Oklahoma had adopted, as a part of its Constitution, the initiative and referendum lawmaking system, patterned after the Oregon plan, regardless of which its Senators and representatives were "admitted into the councils of the Union," and "the authority of the government under which they were appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority," thus determining that state, with its comparatively new legislative system, to be republican in form. This recent historieal precedent should in itself be adequate to set at rest the temporarily mooted question in hand.

This court, however, has heretofore taken jurisdiction of cases of this character (Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222; State v. Cochrane, 105 Pac. 884), and, owing to the importance of the points presented, we will proceed to a consideration thereof. To ascertain whether taking from the Legislature and delegating to the municipalities, or to the localities affected, local self-government, or a right to enact, maintain, and alter their charters as the Legislature formerly did, and whether the taking from the Legislature the right to make special laws upon the subject violates this provision of the national Constitution, makes it important that we first ascertain what is meant by a republican form of government. It is an expression which all assume to understand, yet, judging from the many unsuccessful attempts of eminent statesmen and writers to give it a clear meaning, it would seem the phrase is not susceptible to being given a precise definition. Especially is this true when sought to be applied to the constitution of different States, concerning which Mr. James Madison, a member of the Constitutional Convention, said: "* * * If we resort for a criterion to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or may at least bestow that name on, a government which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure for a limited period or during good behavior. It is essential to such government that it be derived from the great body of society, and not from any inconsiderable portion or a favored class of it. * * *" The Federalist (Hamilton Ed.) paper 39, p. 301. Another and more pointed definition appears in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419, 457, 1 L. Ed. 440, by Mr. Justice Wilson, a member of the Constitutional Convention, who, but a short time after the adoption of the federal Constitution, in adverting to what is meant by a republican form of government, remarked: "As a citizen, I know the government of that State (Georgia) to be republican, and my short definition of such a government—one constructed on this principle, that the supreme power resides in the body of the people." From which it follows that the converse must be true; that is to say, any government in which the supreme power resides with the people is republican in form. See, also, Mr. Justice Wilson's remarks to the same effect, reported in 5 Elliott's Debates, 160.

Measured in the light of the above, it is difficult to conceive of any system of lawmaking coming nearer to the great body of the people of the entire State, or by those comprising the various municipalities, than that now in use here, and, being so, we are at a loss to understand how the adoption and use of this system can be held a departure from a republican form of government. It was to escape the oppression resulting from governments controlled by the select few, so often ruling under the assumption that "might makes right," that gave birth to republics. Monarchial rulers refuse to recognize their accountability to the people governed by them. In a republic the converse is the rule. The tenure of office may be for a short or a long period, or even for life, yet those in office are at all times answerable, either directly or indirectly, to the people, and in proportion to their responsibility to those for whom they may be the public agents, and the nearer the power to enact laws and control public servants lies with the great body of the people, the more nearly does a government take unto itself the form of a republic—not in name alone, but in fact. From this it follows that each republic may differ in its political system or in the political machinery by which it moves, but, so long as the ultimate control of its officials and affairs of state remain in its citizens, it will in the eye of all republics be recognized as a government of that class. Of this we have many examples in Central and South America. It becomes then a matter of degree, and the fear manifested by the briefs filed in this case would seem to indicate, not that we are drifting from the secure moorings of a republic, but that our State, by the direct system of legislation complained of, is becoming too democratic—advancing too rapidly towards a republic pure in form. This, it is true, counsel for petitioner does not concede, but under any interpretation of which the term is capable, or from any view thus far found expressed in the writings of the prominent statesmen who were members of the Constitutional Convention, or who figured in the early upbuilding of the nation, it follows that the system here assailed brings us nearer to a State republican in form than before its adoption. Mr. Thomas Jefferson, in 1816, when discussing the term republic, defined and illustrated his view thereof as follows: "Indeed, it must be acknowledged that the term 'republic' is of very vague application in every language. Witness the self-styled republics of Holland, Switzerland, Genoa, Venice, Poland. Were I to assign to this term a precise and definite idea, I would say, purely and simply, it means a government by its citizens in mass, acting directly and not personally, according to rules established by the majority, and that every other government is more or less republican, in proportion as it has in its composition more or less of this ingredient of the direct action of the citizens." Writings of Thomas Jefferson, Vol. 15, p. 19. It is well known that at the time of the adoption of the federal Constitution there existed in some of the Atlantic States a system of local government, known as "New England towns," in which the people had the right to legislate upon various matters, the masses assembling at stated periods for that purpose, all of which was within the knowledge of those composing the Constitutional Convention. After observing that a true republic, under his definition, would necessarily be restrained to narrow limits, such as in a New England township, and that the next step in use at that time was through the representative system, Mr. Jefferson pointed out that the further the officials of State or Nation are separated from the masses proportionately less does such State or government retain the elements of a republic, and on page 23 concludes: "On this view of the import of the term 'republic,' instead of saying, as has been said, that it may mean anything or nothing, we may say with truth and meaning that governments are more or less republican, as they have more or less of the element of popular election and control in their composition; and believing, as I do, that the mass of citizens is the safest depository of their own rights and especially, that the evils flowing from the duperies of the people, are less injurious than those from the egoism of their agents, I am a friend to that composition of government which has in it the most of this ingredient." The observations quoted are in full accord with the recorded views of all the writers and statesmen of that time, when the intention of the framers of our national Constitution was fully understood, in the light of which it seems inconceivable that a State, merely because it may evolve a system by which its citizens become a branch of its legislative department, co-ordinate with their representatives in the Legislature, loses caste as a republic. The extent to which a Legislature of any State may enact laws is, and always has been, one of degree, depending upon the limitations prescribed by its Constitution; some Constitutions having few and others many limitations. But in all States, whatever may be the restriction placed upon their representatives, the people, either by constitutional amendment or by convention called for that purpose, have had, and have, the power to directly legislate, and to change all or any laws so far as deemed proper—limited only by clear inhibitions of the national Constitution. SENATORIAL SKITS

CONSTITUTIONAL JOHNNY KNOW-ALL

Of course, we all know that the Constitution is a mere incident among friends, but when the show-down comes between the friends and the enemies of a certain piece of legislation—any old piece of legislation—isn't it awful to see the number of friends the dear old document of our fathers suddenly acquires? They blossom like the flowers in the spring.

But the Constitution has one steadfast friend, one true, tried—and convicted—staunch, unfaltering, faithful, steadfast, loyal, leal, and all other brands of friend rolled in one. We refer in these commendatory tones to the Honorable John Curtin, otherwise known to fame and the State Senate as "Constitutional Johnny Know-All," the proprietor and sole patentee of all organic documents framed by the Peepul for the enrichment of constitutional lawyers, Legislatures without end, amen!

How often have we seen it happen in the Senate. A reform measure comes tripping confidingly into the chamber, looking as sweet as the sixteen-year-old graduate on the front row in the June exercises, when gradually the lank form of Constitutional John rises up from the desk which it adorns, and drapes itself over the surrounding scenery. We all know what is coming. We recognize the pained look upon his countenance, the grieved grouch about the eyes, the sorrowful droop at the corners of the mouth: somebody, some cruel and inhuman brute, has swatted Constitutional John's old college chum, the Constitution, in the gazeeta, and Constitutional John is now about to begin his anguished and bitter wail of protest. Stranger, if you have never seen it did before, take our friendly tip—beat it, skidoo, vamoose, twenty-three it to the tallest pinetops, for you are about to listen to the most moving appeal, short of a Bekin's van in action, that it has ever been your sad lot to go up against. What Brutus said to Antony is idle twaddle, compared to the line of tears that is going to assail your seat of sympathy in about a minute.

Not that John loves the reform the less—no, a thousand times no to that base suspicion—but only that he loves his old chum, the Constitution, the more. That's it; there you have it in a nutshell. John loves reform, but oh, you Constitutional flaw in the hill before the house.

Never would we have believed it, had not this great legal authority assured us in pathetic and solemn and warning tones and looks, that there could be such a fatality as seems to pursue reform measures when they are drafted into law and come up before the Legislature. Much as it grieves this great legal luminary, it is his sorrowful duty invariably to rise and, in heartfelt tones of sadness, point out those cussed flaws. "This law is all right in theory," he says, "and its purposes have my warmest sympathy, but——" and here he buttons on a few more mortal defects that the Supreme Court is surely going to find in it, and all this nice law wasted if we pass it, so let's cut it out this session and wait till next time, when we will try to find a few more flaws to assist your reform bill to demise itself.

You should be able by this time to realize what a true and tried, cemented and concrete friend John is when he wants to be, so you may now step up and congratulate the new taxation law of California on its intimate relations with him. Understand me, he will never, no never, abandon his loyalty to the Constitution which he has supported all these years—not to mention that it, in turn, has supported him and his family—but that, barring the Constitution, he loves nothing mortal so much as he loves taxation. When all others have been crying in peevish chorus: "New taxation is vexation, Amendment One's as Bad," John has been making love to the logarithmic tables, the calculus and other charms hidden in the breast of the new revenue law. The result is that only Professor Plehn of Berkeley and John Curtin of Sonora have any idea of the way that new law is going to work. We may here breathe in gently calliope accents our suspicion that it is going to work exactly as Constitutional and Taxational John wants it to work, and that it is not going to hurt any of his friends, constitutional or otherwise. At this point 'twould seem to be pertinent to inquire who his friends are, but far be it from us to pry into any man's private affairs.

Senator Curtin's other weaknesses are strong cigars and Herpicide. His principal friends in the Senate are Wolfe and Wright. These three are the remnants of the old machine, and each looked at the last session a good deal like a man who had tickled a buzz-saw. The State will lose a picturesque character in each of them when they drop from the roll-call. But there are other virtues than picturesqueness.

EVILS OF PUBLICITY IN DIVORCE CASES

Los Angeles, Cal., April 6, 1911.
Editor The California Outlook,
Dear Sir:

In the issue of April 1st of your excellent magazine I find an article entitled, "Open the Court Records," referring to the divorce courts, in which I wish to take issue with the theories and conclusions of the writer. He said that publicity lets in the light and air which destroy divorce germs as certainly as that of other malignant maladies. Were this true the evil would have been long since extinct. Instead we find that notwithstanding the most widespread publication of the divorce cases in which the nauseating details are printed, in full, the evil has not only not diminished but has increased with alarming rapidity. May not therefore this publicity, instead of being deterrent, have been contributory to the increase? May not the press through emphasis and enlargement in the daily publication of court evidence have been cultivating a morbid appetite in the public mind for the salacious details brought out in the divorce trials?

To habitually expose the mind to the contemplation of human foibles, frailties and depravities, with their consequent unhappiness and misery must tend to lower the moral standard and roh the mind of its purity. The evil suggestions thus received sinking down and taking root in the subconscious mind will sooner or later reappear in acts of the same character.

Again quoting from the article above mentioned, "Only those will suffer humiliation who deesrve it." Were that the fact there would be some mitigation to the objections to publicity But it should be remembered that through the severity and unjust partiality of society in its judgment, the woman in the majority of cases is the chief sufferer through the attacks upon her reputation. Very often the charges against her chastity, though utterly false in fact, are nevertheless sustained through perjured testimony.

But in so far as her reputation is concerned, it matters little whether true or false, the allegations and insinuation once made, are taken as published, gossiped and commented upon and accepted as true, without even being given the benefit of the doubt. Hers is the suffering and humiliation from a reputation forever blasted.

Besides there are the immediate relatives of the woman who must share, in a degree, in her humiliation through the widespread publication of the charges. Very often she is more sinned against than sinning through being the victim of the hypnotic power of a villainous and professional seducer whose dominating sway but few are able to withstand.

No, I would say, by all that is sacred in life, by all that is innocent in childhood, by all that is chivalrous in manhood, close the doors and shield and save the woman.

ONE "BENEFIT" OF MACHINE RULE

The advantage of a boss-controlled Legislature was illustrated by Lieut.-Governor Wallace at the Los Angeles City Club luncheon, last Saturday, as follows:

"There is a very serious disadvantage in not having a boss. I will tell you what it is. When you people want something done in Sacramento and you send a body of men to represent you there who say, 'We want this measure or that, because it is vital to Southern California,' you have no one to go to, who can control a given number of votes. You have to go to the Legislators man by man. And sometimes that is difficult. You want a great movement and you want that measure pushed through rapidly. It is really a convenience to have a boss. You can go to him and tell him you want the thing done, and if he is really in favor of the proposition, it is done. Now you have to convince a dozen Senators from your part of the State; twelve different minds; twelve different consciences; twelve who are going to be guided each by his own conscience. That is the price you have to pay if you are going to elect independent legislators."

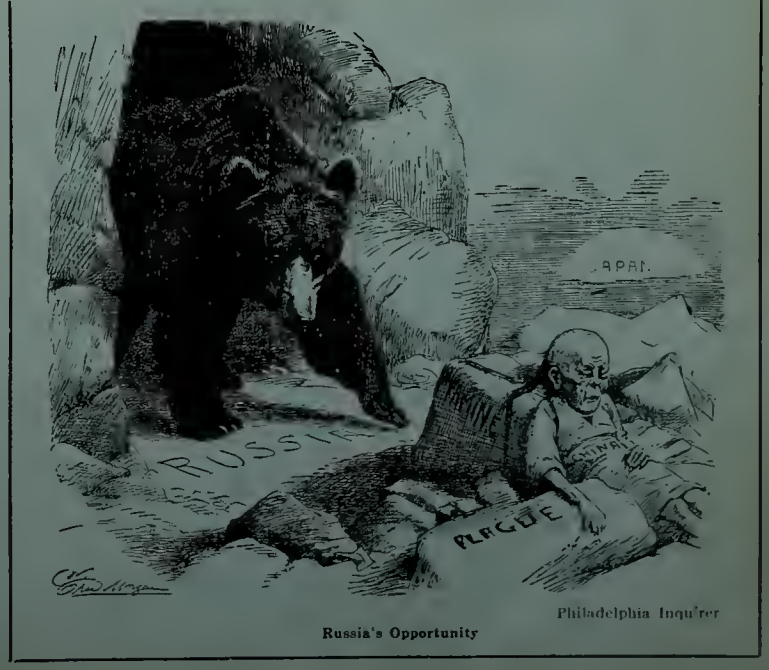
CALIFORNIA AN EXAMPLE TO MASSACHUSETTS

California occupies with reference to our Western coast a position comparable with that of Massachusetts in the East, and in the political status of the two commonwealths is much that suggests similarity.

Both States, to cite one example, have long been under domination by railroad influences, but whereas California has shaken free of the Southern Pacific control, the steel-in-velvet grip of Charles S. Mellen upon what he wants in Massachusetts was never tighter than it is today.

Still, Massachusetts may take hope in what California's recently adjourned first free Legislature for a generation did to put popular above special interests. Among the more important laws placed on the statute books were these:

Enlarging the powers of the Railroad Commission; authorizing the physical valuation of railroads; prohibiting the employment of women for more than eight hours a day; the Oregon primary law; the Australian ballot, absolving party emblems, and a more stringent anti-betting law.



The following constitutional amendments will be submitted at a special election in October:

For the initiative and referendum; for the recall of elective officers, including the judiciary; for woman suffrage; eliminating technical errors as a ground for reversal in criminal cases.

California found its leader in Hiram Johnson. Massachusetts, more placid, is awaiting one. But he will come. And then the revolution against privilege which is now history on the Western coast will become fact also on the Atlantic seahoard.—Boston Common.

Russia's Opportunity

Steady Lowering of Death Rate: A recent report of the health authorities of New York City shows that the death rate has come down, in the forty-three years during which records have been kept, from 27.90 per thousand in 1868 to 16.10 in 1910. During the first 9 years of this period, from 1868 to 1876, the death rate varied from 26.36 to 30.96. Up to that time the work of the health board had been chiefly to head off cholera, small pox and yellow fever. Gradually the scope of the work has widened, although devoted almost exclusively to infectious diseases, and just in proportion as health conditions improved through the exercise of municipal authority to that end, the death rate lowered. The New York Municipal Journal, commenting on this reduction of death rate, says that, at the present population of New York, it means 54,000 lives saved each year; and if this proportion were to hold all over the nation the saving would be over a million lives a year. The saving has been largely in the lives of young children. As a matter of fact, there has been an actual increase in the number of deaths of people over forty-five years of age, and that too in the face of general improved conditions of living and great advance of medical and surgical science. It is probably to be accounted for by the greatly increased strain of life, together with the use of alcoholic drinks.

Fire in Fire-proof Buildings: The Triangle building in Washington place, New York, where 150 girls met a horrible death by fire was truly a fire-proof building, for now that the affair is over, it appears that nothing is needed but a few coats of paint and trifling repairs to put it back to its original condition. The fire started on the eighth story and burned that and the two stories above it, but destroyed only the inflammable contents of the building, such as shirt waists, cloth, wooden parts of machinery, etc. The employes on the eighth floor went down by the stairways and elevators and those on the tenth escaped by climbing on the roof of a neighboring structure. Those on the ninth were nearly all killed because the flames sweeping up from below cut them off from the stairways. Had there been automatic sprinklers or had there been a fire drill to instruct them how to get out quickly and in order this horror never would have happened. Those two things will be required hereafter in all the factories where inflammable materials are used or stored.

Arnold to Report for Los Angeles: The Harbor Commission of Los Angeles has engaged Bion J. Arnold, the most eminent traction expert of the country, to make a preliminary outline report on transportation and terminal facilities at the harbors of San Pedro and Wilmington and in the business region of the city. This is preliminary to the planning of the municipal railway connecting the water front with the Los Angeles wholesale section. Mr. Arnold will also give some suggestions on the improvement of traction conditions in the city.

Reckless Administration in Milwaukee: The Socialists in office in Milwaukee have shown an obstinate contempt for existing law that has put them and the city into a number of serious difficulties. The illegal appointment of a commissioner of Public Works has invalidated nearly a million dollars worth of special assessments and has involved the city in a great volume of litigation. The Socialists do not seem to be making good use of their chance to show what they can do.

Limitation on Initiative: The Supreme Court of Texas has ruled that an ordinance passed by the people of Dallas by process of initiative and popular vote, fixing the rate for telephone charges is not legal because the charter provides that rates shall be fixed only after due notice to the utility companies and a fair hearing as to the reasonableness of the proposed rate. The court holds that these conditions cannot be fulfilled when the rate is fixed by popular vote.

Pure Water for Schools: Buffalo has had so much trouble with the purity of its water supply that it has been found necessary to buy drinking water for the schools. Allowing at the rate of a pint a day to each child, the cost is $281 a day for the schools, or $18,800 for the season. A complete system of filtration will be installed in all the schools hereafter.

Too Heavy for Pavements: After the pavements of a number of principal streets were broken through by a traction sewer-digging machine weighing 25 tons, as it progressed through town, the city council of Portland, Oregon, passed an ordinance requiring a special permit for the movement of such big things.

The Gas Company Objects: An example of how a gas company manages to own the city's streets comes from Trenton, New Jersey, where the local gas concern is protesting against the city's putting in an underground drainage system with a large storm water canal, on the ground of its interference with their system of pipes.

Single Tax Gradually: The commission appointed by Mayor Gaynor to report on congestion and land values in New York city recommends that the rate of taxation on buildings and improvements be fixed at half the rate on land, and that the reduction be made gradually during a period of five years.

Municipal Ownership Demanded: The people of Superior, Wisconsin, are petitioning the city authorities to follow the example of Duluth and establish a municipal water system. They claim that the Duluth establishment pays all expenses and supplies water at half the charge now prevailing in Superior.

Railroad Declared a Nuisance: The city of Brownsville, Texas, has officially branded a railroad whose track runs through the center of town a public nuisance, and has ordered the rails torn up. It is a branch connecting two main lines, and nothing is ever hauled over it except flat cars loaded with wood.

Wires Underground: The people of El Paso are moving to get the poles and wires out of the residence streets as well as the business section. It is contended that any street that is populous enough to be paved should be relieved of its burden of unsightly poles.

Veteran Horse Pensioned: Minneapolis has a police horse named "Billy" that has done faithful service twenty years. By special vote of the Police Commission, he has been retired and turned over to the Humane Society to provide comfortably for his declining years.

Good Roads Agitation: The offer of General du Pont of the powder company to finance the construction of a main highway through the entire State of Delaware has stirred up the people of that State and of Maryland to a general campaign of good road construction.

Municipal Restaurant: Kansas City Park authorities have decided to open a restaurant in Swope Park. There was great demand for something of the kind within the park—which is 1324 acres in extent—and it was thought best not to admit a private enterprise on public ground.

Commission Government: The cities of Wilmington, North Carolina, Wyandotte, Michigan, Aberdeen, South Dakota, and Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, all voted by good majorities to adopt commission form of government. Peoria, Illinois, voted against it.

Dry Sweeping Dangerous: The street department in Chicago has finally granted the demand of the health officials that all dry street sweeping be discontinued. Streets will be washed hereafter. Dry sweeping throws the germs into the air.

Winnipeg to Own Utilities: Winnipeg has recently acquired by purchase the street car system, electric light, telephone, gas and power enterprises, and now owns every public utility, being the only city on this continent of which that can be said.

Deadlock on Reduction of Light Rate: City Council of Toledo proposes to cut the electric lighting rate of the private concern that is serving the citizens of that place to 5 cents, and the result is a war, with a threat on the part of the company to cut off the service entirely.

Profitable Municipal Water Works: The reports of the last two or three years of Youngstown, Ohio, municipal water system show such considerable profits that rates will be reduced to users.

Between These Two: Cincinnati must look to its laurels. The prize for being the worst governed city in the United States is likely to go to Pittsburg.

Women Police Officers: A bill is pending in the New Jersey Legislature, allowing the appointment of women on the police force of all the cities of that State.

Car Letter Boxes: Washington is to have letter boxes on all its street cars.

Interchange of Service Between Competing Telephone Companies

From an Address Delivered by F. H. Woods, President National Independent Telephone Association

(Editorial Note—Much effort has been made by patrons to secure interconnection between telephone companies. All sorts of objections have been raised to the proposal by both Bell and independent companies. It is significant that the national president of the "independents" should come out unequivocally for "physical connection," and it would seem to presage the desired service in the near future.)

Commission regulation will not bring its maximum of benefit, unless linked with it is the power to require the compulsory physical connection of telephone properties. I emphasize this because it places the public policy and advantage above all other considerations. It must be patent that the public good requires that the entire telephone facilities of a section or of a community he subjected to the use of all. When this means an added revenue to the companies furnishing service, there can be no adequate reason why the privilege should not be granted.

The tendency, even among Independent telephone companies, has been towards consolidation. The stronger companies, in order to protect their connections, have been forced to buy out those who have become wearied of the strife, those who were so anxious and willing to get out that they stood ready to sell even to the Bell, to fight which they had been formed.

As the Independents have extended their lines there have grown up two large systems, dividing the people of a city, or of a section, or even whole countries into separate groups. Such a condition cannot be permanent, and certainly will not be allowed to continue when once the commission idea reaches its fullest conception and scope. Relief from it will not come through one ownership of all companies. The diversity of interests, the strong predilection for home ownership and management of utilities, the immense capital required for universal service on one system, make this a dream incapable of realization. But when the public sees, as it must, that this company reaches this section of a city or state, that that company reaches another group and section, and that all of the companies together cover all desirable territory, it will insist, for its own advantage, that interconnection be had.

Independents Should be First to Secure Advantages

It is for us to say whether we will wait on compulsion or secure for ourselves whatever advantages arise from being first to insist upon interconnection. I believe that the only way in which we can retain the favor of the public, without which no such development as we have made could have been possible, is to keep up with puhlic sentiment, and to do whatever in reason is demanded. The nuhlic desired competition, and we furnished it. The public desired relief from monopoly competition, and we gave it. If it is now the desire of the public to have universal service, it is our duty to furnish it. If the public regards duplication as unnecessary, then let us shape our course so that whatever annoyances exist under the present service shall be eliminated on our own initiative.

These results can be achieved only through a public utilities commission law carefully drawn in the interest of the public and in the preservation in the telephone business of the competition which has furnished excellent service at a fair price. Such laws must be national as well as state in their scope to accomplish the desired results.

The question of physical connection may be treated from two standpoints, that of the public and that of the telephone companies. Six distinct advantages to the public present themselves. Let me summarize them:

1. It will give real universal service.
2. It will prevent division of the public into groups without communication, one with the other.
3. It will permit private branch exchanges with dual trunk line connections to give competition without duplication.
4. It enables the public to retain all of the advantages of competition.
5. It enables a subscriber to get cheaper service by patronizing the smaller system, and at the same time to reap the benefits of the universal system when he needs it by making payment for extra service only when used.
6. It gives each community the right to choose the kind of equipment and service it prefers and to be free to conduct its own telephone business.

Advantages from Standpoint of Company

From the standpoint of the telephone company a larger number of advantages are apparent. Here are some of them:

1. It makes every company part of the universal system.
2. It enables it to compete on an equal footing with the local exchange of the trust.
3. It removes all fear that it can be crushed out of existence, and thereby enables it to finance itself.
4. It removes all prejudices against the second system on account of duplication and the annoyance and expense of two telephones, thereby popularizing competition under new conditions.
5. It insures connections with long distance lines and neighboring exchanges.
6. It makes contracts with other companies unnecessary.
7. It adds commission regulation to insure a fair interchange of service and to prevent rate cutting, placing it in a position where it can defy the trust.
8. It removes none of the advantages now possessed. It means continued local ownership with all of its advantages, and that sooner or later the foreign competitor will he glad to retire from the local field, asking only in return that he be given a toll line connection.
9. It assures the companies that if they serve the public the commission will protect them against parasites.
10. It means added revenues to the local companies.
11. It will be the first step towards measured service, a fair system of charging for service rendered.

Intercommunication Will Satisfy Subscriber's Requirement

The value of a telephone to a subscriber lies in his ability to reach those with whom he has or may have business or social communications to interchange. We strive to increase this value to our present subscribers by reaching out after more patrons. Every new subscriber gives added value to the service furnished the older subscriber. For the service rendered by a telephone company every reasonable man ought to be willing to pay a reasonable price. If, through physical connection, we place all other systems at the command of our individual subscribers we have fulfilled every possible requirement that they may demand for service.

As a result of the competition of past years in territory well covered with lines of communication, certain sections, cities, towns and counties have been segregated, due to the fact that either the Independent or the Bell has so well fortified itself that an invasion of the field would be manifestly unprofitable, or competition or consolidation has driven one or the other out of it. It is intolerable, from the standpoint of the public, that this condition should continue, and unwise from a revenue standpoint that the companies should permit it. Clearly, physical connection is the one remedy.

Most of the duplication complained of comes from business houses, hotelkeepers and professional men located in the heart of the city in large blocks and congested territory. Most of these could be well served with private branch exchanges having trunk line connections with both systems. This obviates the payment of two telephone charges and still preserves all of the advantages of competition.

The impulse that gave rise to competition in telephony came from a people denied the benefits of a great necessity, dictated to by a monopoly and given an indifferent service. The people do not desire a return to those conditions, and they know that that is what a restored monopoly would mean to them. It is clear that their interest lies in the maintenance of competition, but not under conditions that make service too expensive or annoying. They do want a wider service, a service possible under enforced physical connection, and our interest lies in helping them get it.

A very large percentage of the subscribers to any system never feel the necessity of communicating with any considerable number connected therewith. It is the common experience that the user of a residence telephone has but a small circle of communications. Yet we build our systems so that every subscriber may talk with every other subscriber, and each user pays his or her proportionate share of the cost of such service. If there were but one company—and that company giving a universal service—the question of cost would be pressing. If the business of furnishing telephonic communication could be so subdivided that cheap communication could be furnished only those whose needs are met with a smaller number of possible communications, with the privilege, upon the payment of a small fee, to reach any and every one else, there would be a telephone in every house. This is an ideal condition, and compulsory physical connection is a long step towards it.

As the situation is now the person about to install a telephone has not the choice of equipment and service, but is compelled to base his decision upon his own personal necessity, and the possibilities of communication open to him. This would no longer exist if by choosing either he could command the services of both.

No less advantageous to telephone companies is the right to enforce connection with each other. At present the Independent companies are hampered to some extent by the distrust that exists as to whether competition is furnishing the maximum of benefit. The natural attitude of the public mind is against all trusts, and if we can remove the last vestige of doubt by proving the case for competition, this will restore its popularity and bring to the Independent systems added support in their fight against the Bell. Physical connection, which makes every company a constituent part of the universal system, will accomplish this result. It will make competition possible where it does not now exist and maintain it where it does exist.

I want to reiterate as my opinion that centralized and effective control of concerns operating under franchises is certain to be adopted as a permanent policy by the people of the various states and of the nation. As I have said, we have it in the

MAKING THE SPARKS FLY

GLEANINGS FROM THE PRESS

OF 50 YEARS AGO

It appears that there was a State Capitol Commission fifty years ago, in spite of the fact that it had nothing to commit except a nice paper plan of a capitol, and the beginnings of construction. However, it had to make a show of being important, so it reported the large gobs of money it had spent and then gave the capitol contractor a slap on the wrist just to show him who was boss. Or, as the Sacramento Union of April 8, 1861, announced:

"The State Capitol Commissioners report the sum of $23,341.02 expended under the present contract for building the State Capitol. Also, that they have notified the contractor to use more diligence with the work, or that it will take possession of it in the name of the State."

Take that!

Rapid transit was not as rapid as it is now, but we can imagine even the following intelligence being of grateful interest fifty years ago:

"The roads are now open between Sacramento and Stockton, and stages have resumed their trips."

And the first record of the predecessor of the modern "Lark" was probably even more pleasant reading to certain parts of the State:

"By telegraph, we learn that the first Overland Mail stage from San Francisco, via the Coast Route, arrived April 6th, at two o'clock a. m., at Los Angeles. Time, between San Francisco and Los Angeles, 72 hours."

Not so bad, when you realize that the "Lark" takes fourteen and a half. Still, you can make it to Chicago in that time now, and sleep in comfort on the train, not to mention that soda fountain promised on the Overland next summer.

The bulk of mail that was passing East and West in those days is evidence that the correspondence ran strictly to love and business, for it was pretty small, undoubtedly because it came high. This item does not read much like the accounts of the daily mail train that now runs from Oakland to Omaha:

"The Pony which arrived Saturday, brought forty letters for San Francisco and seven for this city (Sacramento). The departing Pony, yesterday, took hence sixty-six letters from San Francisco and twenty from Sacramento."

Other things came high, too. Witness:

"Grean Peas.—Green peas have made their appearance in the Nevada market—selling at forty cents a pound."

Sounds like another gouge from the Meat Trust.

History does not record how many lickings the boys of Sacramento got on the morning of April 11, 1861, but we can surmise that they were numerous—and also that the boys didn't care an awful lot. For the day before "The Circus Arrived.—The United States Circus, under the control of Dr. Bassett, arrived in the city yesterday morning from San Francisco."

And didn't the boys line the river bank when the "wagons containing the animals and apparatus" were unloaded from the boat, and didn't they whoop alongside the parade, and steal under the tent when "the first performance was given last night"? Of course not! Boys were so different fifty years ago!

Easter was coming, and Easter then, as now, meant hats. The "Union" of the 11th devoted two columns and a half (stolen from the New York Herald) to "The Spring Fashions." We learn that the most perfectly loveliest darling hat of that year was "the snowflake." Oh, it was a dream. Honest! Listen:

"The material was white chip; trimming, marabout, tipped with a fringe of heavier ostrich feathers. Over the cape was a fall of rich point d' applique, and round the edge of the hat ran a trimming of the same material. In the inside was a bandeau of marabout, caught up at one side by a bouquet of white violets. White strings and white lappets, trimmed with a quilling of blonde, preserved the uniformity of the whole design."

Read that to your wife; she'll know what it means. If you haven't got one, try it on the pianola.

But any dub of a man can tell that this isn't a hobble skirt:

"The skirt is worn as long as ever, trailing a little in the back, and very full at the bottom, where it measures seven yards in width."

Our thoughts still run to Teddy at the slightest provocation. The following is a sample of the way they passed the short and ugly, fifty years ago, without saying it:

"One of the San Francisco papers published yesterday what purported to be a list of California appointments received by the last Pony. We have the best reasons for believing the information to be unreliable."

As we would say now, "the crust of it!"

No wonder it was considered about time for "Shasta Butte to Have Its Altitude Taken." The tall timbers seemed likely to be in demand.

OF TODAY

Sarah's coming, hooray, hooray! We mean Bernhardt, of course; Sarah the "divine," Sarah the "supreme artiste," Sarah the soul of temperament, Sarah the supernal, and eternal. She is going to act 19-year-old "L' Aiglon"—and send the money back to her great granddaughter in La Belle France for her dot. She is going to play "Camille" and "La Tosca" and thirty or forty other plays—maybe—and she is going to play the dickens with our pocketbooks and make us all glad she did it—we hope. Every dramatic critic in California is brushing up his phrase book, and making presentable such suggestions as "age cannot wither nor custom stale her infinite variety," and similar original mots. "Dot" and "mot" is all the French we know, so we will now quit.)

The preceding paragraph is timely, but it would be just as appropriate in the first column on this page, so we have instructed the printer to use it in which ever place he needs it most. Perennial Sarah!

Another hardy perennial and familiar California garden flower is Grove L. Johnson. He has caught the infection from Sarah's advance notices, and he, too, is going to retire. But, never a servile imitator, his retiring mood will take a different hue. Whereas Sarah comes to America from Europe to earn American dollars, Grove L. is going to Europe to spend American dollars. And as he goes, he gives. A great private library, collected during the last forty-five years, is being disintegrated, and much of it has been given to charity. But even at the last a trace of imitation does creep in; he is not sure he will play a return engagement: "I leave in a few days for Europe, and do not know when I will return. I am going sightseeing and if I like it well enough in the old country, I may never return home."

Ah, but they always do, though. Look at Sarah.

That poetic soul, Assemblyman Stuckenbruck of San Joaquin, introduced two bills at the Legislature: one, to encourage the slaughter of meadow larks, and the other to tone up the health of our hogs. The latter bill got by, with a $15,000 appropriation to make effective a campaign to check the spread of cholera among swine. Whereat the Sacramento Bee rises to howl that humans are worth more than hogs, and to inquire why that money wasn't appropriated to help children instead of porkers. Without undertaking to more than suggest the possibilities of such thoughts as that better hog health and consequent better hog meat might make stronger parents, we hasten on to chide the Bee for its heartless and unchristian coldness toward the hog. But it was always so: nobody loves a hog; he has been, adown the ages, the butt of thoughtless jests; no poets have sung his virtues; the only good word for him in history came from a man who had a fellow feeling because his name was Lamb and he'd somewhat been the goat himself. And here is the Bee, the friend of the oppressed, grouching at the first signs of charity shown by men toward an animal who has so many very human traits as the hog.

We have been a reformer until now, but here we stop. There is such a thing as carrying things too far. It has been done in the bill, signed by Governor Johnson last week, making it possible to force a husband to work for the county for a dollar and a half a day and give the money to his wife. If this is reform, give us the good old days. Subversion of the Constitutional right of freedom of contract, that's what it is! Work? Never!

Sacramento is trying to get a commission charter. Berkeley got one, and see what it hatched—a real, live, squirming Socialist for Mayor. Horrors, we'll have one of the frightful things in the Governor's chair one of these days if we aren't careful.

The bifurcated management of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company has got one leg into its harem skirt by naming the "business" management. The "social" management will be named later. C. C. Moore is the "President," or boss of the business end. We suggest Ned Greenway as the appropriate "Director General," or director of the social floss and fluff.

DRAMATIC CHIT CHAT

"Peg o' My Heart" by J. Hartley Manners, Eleanor Robson's Kentucky play that has just closed an engagement at the Belasco theater where it had its premier, has added one more to the long list of new productions that is making Los Angeles known as "The Town Where the Good Shows Come From."

Producing a new play is always a gamble. The assertion that no one can tell in advance whether a play will be a success has been made so often as to be regarded as a trite truth. Really it is not true at all but it only seems true because no one has gone deep enough into the study of what makes for success in plays to be able to predict with certainty. Certainly there are conditions upon which success depends and whoever discovers them and provides them is sure of a success.

Producing a new play, therefore, is always a gamble in view of the prevailing hazy ideas of what success depends on. Notwithstanding this Los Angeles theatrical managers have been bold in their policy of giving new plays a chance and careful enough in their judgment to have achieved a series of successes that seems to have justified the boldness.

Real "first nights" have been so frequent that many citizens of Los Angeles have become habitual first-nighters. Many of the plays that were first given to the public here, afterwards went East and became highly profitable to their owners.

The two leading stock houses, the Belasco and the Burbank, have set the pace in the production of new plays. It was the Belasco company that first presented Eugene Walters' "The Undertow." It was a success here and in the East and made more than $8,000 royalties for the author. Another Belasco success was "The Dollar Mark," by George Broadhurst, which had a record breaking run. Two other plays of Broadhurst's had their premiers here, "The Price" and "The Garden of Lies." "The Price" was a big success in the East but the other play for some reason did not take so well.

Another big money maker was Porter Brown's "The Spendthrift," which was produced for the first time by the Belasco stock company. Some of the other Belasco first nights were Lela Burton Wells' "The Case of Sergeant Wilde," Mrs. H. C. DeMille's "The Way Out," and Gertrude Andrews' "Through a Window."

The list of Burbank successes is no less imposing. There were "The Judge and the Jury," and "The Half Breed," by Oliver Morosco; "Mizpah," by H. D. Cottrell and Ella Wheeler Wilcox, all of which enjoyed long runs, and "Under The Bear Flag," by C. W. Bachman, which ran two weeks.

Later came "A Society Pilot," by Oliver Morosco and C. W. Bachman; "The Greater Claim," by Linton Tedford; "Invasion," a war drama by Julian Johnson; and Edgar Selwyn's big success, "The Country Boy."

Another play that attracted much attention was "The Eternal Three," by Frederick Eldridge and Reed Heustis. The last new production to be put over the Burbank stage was Lee Arthur's "The Fox," which has been given extensive eastern bookings.

Walter De Leon, a member of the Ferris Hartman Opera Company, wrote "The Campus," a musical comedy of college life and Mr. Hartman produced it at the Grand in Los Angeles where it is just closing its fifteenth week.

LOS ANGELES CITY CLUB WANTS LORIMER RE-INVESTIGATED

At the regular meeting of the City Club of Los Angeles held last Saturday, the following resolution introduced by Marshall Stimson was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved that the City Club of Los Angeles strongly urges the passage of the resolution of Senator La Follette for the investigation of the Lorimer case."

In moving the resolution, Mr. Stimson said: "Among the many praiseworthy acts that were done by our late Legislature, I think no act commanded more consideration and attention and commendation throughout the land than the passage by the Assembly of the resolution urging the unseating of Senator Lorimer."

INTERCHANGE OF SERVICE BETWEEN COMPETING TELEPHONE COMPANIES

nation and in twenty-two states now. That control, however, will not stop with mere regulation of rates, but will include supervision of service. It will not stop short of complete control, which means that it will demand the right to say whether or not, in order to avail himself fully of the telephone facilities of a city or of a community, a person must subscribe to both operating systems.

In this demand there is no hint or threat of confiscation.

In fact, I believe that in its fullest development, it will be the best protection to the industry controlled, since it will mean the conservation of existing investments by securing a reasonable return thereon. It is absolutely necessary to have public opinion back of a public service corporation in order to make it a permanent success, and that can be secured only by earning it.

"Lightening" the Cost of Living

Every little helps. As the first direct result of the government's anti-trust suit against the so-called "Electric Lamp Trust," the department of justice has received intimations that the prices of all electric light bulbs will be reduced 33⅓ per cent all over the United States. By such a cut in present prices, people who buy the electric lamps will save more than $6,000,000 a year.—River News, Rio Vista.

Schedule "K"

The first step of the extra session of Congress will be to pass the Canada reciprocity bill and the second step will be, it is said, to materially reduce the tariff on wool and woolen goods. If this can be accomplished, the western Senator who has been called the greatest shepherd since Abraham will lose a million or two dollars, but ninety millions of Americans will have their clothing bill materially reduced.—Vacaville Reporter.

Reno as a Roadhouse for Free Love

Alluding to the ease with which divorce can be secured in the Nevada courts, someone styled Reno "a roadhouse for matrimonial joy-riders." The divorce mill is one of the chief industries of Reno.

Nevada seems determined to justify the reproach embodied in the quotation made above. Instead of making the divorce laws of the State more stringent, the Legislature which has just adjourned threw down the bars still lower and made divorce still easier. It has thus given an unmistakable endorsement to progressive polygamy. It has made marriage a joke, so far as law can make it, and by legislative enactment has given the world a clear idea of the Nevada estimate of the sanctity of the marriage relation.—Berkeley Courier.

Law Against Treating

Tacoma has just passed an anti-treating law that applies to saloons. It imposes a heavy penalty on the saloon keeper, if he permits a customer to treat another one. It is a splendid law to our way of thinking, and it will bring good results. The treating habit is one of the very worst features of the saloons. If they had less of the so-called sociability in the saloons, there would be less drunkenness, and the evil of the open saloon would be that much less.—Santa Ana Bulletin.

One Result of the "Sane Fourth"

The directors of the Pain Manufacturing Company, the best known fire works firm in the country, have filed a petition in the New York supreme court asking that the corporation be dissolved because the national movement for a sane Fourth of July has made it unprofitable to continue business. This is encouraging to say the least.—Merced Express.

Rubber, Capital's New Fetish

Convinced that the tightening of the grip of the Interstate Commerce Commission about the railroads, the tobacco trust, the beef trust and the other great industrial combinations which have of late run afoul of the federal laws, has ended future melon cutting, New York's money men are going in strong for rubber raising.

J. Pierpont Morgan, Thomas F. Ryan, the Vanderbilts, the Goelets and half a dozen of the other owners of large fortunes in Gotham have set the pace and others it is said will follow. The enormous dividends, ranging as high as 300 per cent, paid to English investors last year by a number of the companies operating rubber plantations in the Far East, have sharpened their financial appetites to razor edge and persuaded them to feel that the world is on the verge of an era of rubber production likened only to the early days of American steel.—Yolo Democrat.

Green Tea a Thing of the Past in America

Green tea has been the basis of a beverage beloved by the tea drinkers of the United States from the time when the states were colonies. It will shock these devotees to know that after May 1 the government has decided to prevent further importation of green tea into the country. Investigation shows that green tea is artificially colored tea, and that the coloring process makes the tea injurious to the health of those who drink the decoction made from it.—Redding (Cal.) Searchlight.

What a Vigorous Fighter Accomplished

Through the persistent fight made by the Oakland Enquirer and four Councilmen, the Southern Pacific has finally consented to pay an annual street rental of $5,000 for the first fifteen years and $8,500 for the remainder of the period; also to pave Seventh street, at a cost of about $200,000, and to light that thoroughfare during the life of the franchise.

The city will receive a total equivalent of $742,000 for a franchise which at first the railroad company tried to get for nothing more than the cost of repaving the street.—Sacramento Bee.

Alaska's Troubles

We do not presume there is anything very serious back of recent reports that a movement has been started in Alaska looking to secession and annexation to Canada; nor is the suggestion recently made in an Eastern paper, that the United States ought to cede the narrow coast strip of southeastern Alaska to Canada, to be seriously regarded. We do not wonder, however, that there is widespread dissatisfaction in Alaska at the failure of Congress to do anything to relieve conditions which hamper the development of that wonderful country. * * * There are great stretches of coal lands that are tied up because there is at present no law under which they can be developed. Efforts were made at the last session of Congress to pass a leasing law, but that was defeated and Congress adjourned without enacting any remedial legislation. * * * The same condition of arrested development in Alaska exists in regard to other things as it does in the case of the coal. The territory is so far away and its problems are so little known that they receive little attention at Washington. The territory has less local self-government than Porto Rico or the Philippines, though it is settled by men and women who are among the finest types of American citizenship. The stars and stripes do not fly over any territory that is so poorly governed as is Alaska; and the progressive Republicans and Democrats who will be in control in the next Congress have one of the opportunities of history to reform this condition.—Riverside Press.

The Short Ballot

The short ballot seems to be growing steadily in popularity with our people. After they begin to understand what it means and that it is a long step in the direction of good government and economical administration, the people are in favor of it. Of course they are, why should they not be? The opposition comes from the class of men who in the past have been the means of dragging the State into expensive legislation and providing all forms of offices where the professional office-seeker may receive his big fat salary at the expense of the people. The purpose of the short ballot is to make the Secretary of State, as well as those who serve on boards of commission, appointive by the Governor. This seems like radical legislation to some people, but how many of our readers would favor the election of these men were they to constitute the cabinet of the President of the United States? We give the incumbent of the presidential chair the power to select the men that are to be entrusted with the most delicate affairs of the administration. Yet in our states we elect the governor and give him, in many instances, a lot of machine manufacturing helpers who oppose his purpose time after time and interfere with the measures that are the most desired by the administration, and then if the administration proves to be a failure load the blame upon its head. The appointment of these men by the Governor would result in a higher class of officials being chosen, for the very best material available in the State will not now plunge into the mire of politics in order that they may land in an office that oftentimes proves more expensive for its attainment than the salary will repay.—Pomona Times.

[illegible] to conservation the impetus needed for the inauguration of a wise system that promises better things hereafter. The presumption raised by Judge Hanford is as amiable as his decision was unfortunate. It is to be hoped that the Supreme Court of the United States will be better advised and that it will entertain no presumptions not warranted in truth as well as in form.

Carl Plehn, Adviser The appointment of Prof Carl Plehn to be expert adviser to the State Board of Equalization, is to be received with much satisfaction. The Watchman felt anxious that this be done, partly because the Board of Equalization needs to be advised, and partly because California needs to habituate itself to the acceptance of expert advice wherever and whenever such advice is to be had. The only member of the State Board of Equalization especially fitted to grapple with the subject of taxation is the State Controller, who is member ex-officio only, and whose own office makes huge demands upon his time and strength. As stated heretofore, Carl Plehn does not know all about taxation. Nobody does, but taxation is a subject that merits the most careful and painstaking study to the end that the burden of government may be placed where it can be borne easiest and with as much justice as possible. We are about as far from that goal as we well can be, and we are not getting nearer to it very fast.

Geo. Radcliffe The Right Man The caring for, and supplying, the State capitol building and grounds has long been unsatisfactory. The Watchman is not justified in saying more than this for the bottom facts are not and have not been known for many a year. Let the dead past bury its dead. It is with the future that we must deal. In selecting George Radcliffe, the robust Watsonville editor, to be superintendent of capitol and grounds Governor Johnson has made no mistake. Of course the new superintendent will have to learn his job. It will be all new to him. He may fit the job like a glove and the job may not fit him at all. Time will tell about that, but this much The Watchman does know: The first lout caught loafing will be boosted over the chain fence by something resembling a Scotch-Irish bull, and the first dealer in supplies who suggests that a nice little remnant of soft velvet, for the superintendent, can be had by placing the hand behind the back will witness an aurora to be remembered. Every separate hair of the roached mane of the Man from Watsonville will stand on end and emit sparks swifter than a consuming fireworks factory. George Radcliffe is aggressively, pugnaciously, almost maliciously, honest. He cherishes contempt, if not hatred, for everyhody who is not as square as length, breadth and thickness can make them. There will be no "fooling" from henceforth around the capitol building or grounds. Radcliffe is the man to get the State a dollar's worth of value for every dollar expended on or in capitol grounds.

The Right Kind of Advertising California has had so much of the wrong kind of advertising, with especial reference to the grafting embroglio in San Francisco, and the generation-long domination of the State by the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, that it seems good to have advertising go out of a different tenor and effect. What Theodore Roosevelt had to say in the State and out of it in relation to the good work done by the Legislature of California has gone all over the nation and is being repeated from mouth to mouth greatly to our advantage as State and people. But the ejaculation most frequently made is: "However did they do it?" Well, it was done by getting a good start with that object in view. Two years before the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League resolved in favor of electing "one good Legislature," and came near to doing it. In 1910 the resolution of 1908 was made good, and the more especially because with the good Legislature there was installed a good Governor who did not shirk his function as being a part of the legislative department of government and the particular factor of that government which represents the State as a whole. The legislators all represent districts of the State, and are more or less hampered by local issues and interests, whereas the Governor, as a factor in legislation, represents the commonwealth as a whole and it is to him that the commonwealth must look for a broad comprehension of State polity. This time it was not in vain that the State so looked, and that is one answer to the query, "However did they do it?"

Memphis' Bid For W. J. Bryan The bid made by the city of Memphis, or a committee representing the same (perhaps self-constituted), for possession of Mr. William Jennings Bryan is really very funny. In the largeness of their demonstration they suggested their ability to raise $2,000,000 as a bonus if he would become the first citizen of Memphis. Time was when residence in Memphis would have been dear at the price, but since repavement and sewering and the waging of successful war on the culex, that bonus ought to prove attractive. If there were added to it a residence site on the Chickasaw bluffs overlooking the Father of Waters it ought to prove irresistible to one who loves prosperity. But Mr. Bryan will abide at Lincoln. He has figured that the national center of political gravity is just there and evidently fears that if he were to change his location the old thing would tip up. He is too patriotic a man to take chances with such a catastrophe.

PRACTICAL BUNGALOW BOOK

The whole country is looking toward Los Angeles for the latest ideas in home building, as shown by the quantity of orders that are coming to that city for plans and for bungalow books. After having put out 165,000 bungalow books, the Los Angeles Investment Company, which is said to be the largest co-operative building company in the world, has just issued a second edition of its "Practical Bungalows."

This work shows improvement over its predecessor, and includes 50 architectural designs drawn and built by the company. The 270 illustrations in the volume are from actual photographs, the houses all having been built in and near Los Angeles by the Investment Company.

Legislative Opinions

Sacramento, Cal, March 13, 1911
The California Outlook,
Los Angeles, Cal.,
Gentlemen:—
Your first page is too ponderous. The paper lacks variety. It is too obviously a political organ. It tells us little that we do not already know. Give us more of human interest. "Senatorial Skits" is the one redeeming feature in this direction.
(Senator) LESTER G. BURNETT

"The Pacific Outlook,"
Los Angeles, Cal.,
Gentlemen:—
I have read the Outlook, during the session of the Legislature, with much interest. Knowing, as I do, the extensive influence of the press, and especially of a progressive paper during the present transition in California's political history, I heartily commend the good work you are doing.
Wishing you continued success, I am. Sincerely,
(Assemblyman) R. L. TELFER

Sacramento, Cal.
March 14, 1911.
C. H. Randall,
Mgr. California Outlook,
My Dear Sir:—
Am delighted with the way your paper is gotten up; one does not have to read such quantities to get real facts. The California Outlook is sure all right.
Respectfully,
(Assemblyman) J. W. Stuckenbruck

Sacramento, March 27, 1911.
Mr. C. H. Randall,
Los Angeles, Cal.
Dear Mr. Randall:
I regard the California Outlook as a strong and effective advocate of better things in government—state, municipal and national.
Very truly yours,
(Senator) N. W. Thompson.

Sacramento, Cal.

Mr. C. H. Randall,
Los Angeles, Cal.,
Dear Sir:—
The California Outlook is a publication that we have long been in need of. I believe every business man in the City of Los Angeles should subscribe for it.
(Assemblyman)
Henry H. Lyon.

Sacramento, Cal., March 13, 1911.
The California Outlook.
Gentlemen:
My opinion of the California Outlook might be prejudiced by reason of the fact that at the time I was engaged in the senatorial contest with the Honorable Frank W. Leavitt, I received very little, if any, support from the California Weekly, under the management of Mr. Pillsbury, and he was kind enough to say in his paper after I had beaten Senator Leavitt, that I should not take any credit for it as a "Cigar Store Indian" could have beaten him.
(Senator) EDW. J. TYRRELL.

The California Outlook suggested much to the past Legislature that has been adopted and has sustained all of its progressive achievements.
(Assemblyman) D. W. MOTT.

The California Outlook,

Gentlemen:
I find in the California Outlook much to commend and endorse. Your attitude on such public questions as you have touched upon (and they are many) meets with my approval and your judgment of public men and analysis of the motives which actuate them in the discharge of public duties, are critically discerning but fair and without prejudice. Our complex twentieth century civilization needs just such honest analysis and supervision as the "Outlook" seems disposed to give it; approving where possible, correcting by wise suggestion where necessary, and in all things fostering and promoting higher ideals and especially equal rights and opportunities to all with special privileges to none.
H. D. Loveland,
Railroad Commissioner.

Los Angeles,
Dear Sirs: —
From the first time I read your publication I was very much impressed with it, and it seems that each succeeding number, if possible, is better than the last. I consider it a very readable, interesting and useful publication, and believe if it continues on its present lines that it will be of great benefit to the cause of progressiveness and clean government.
(Assemblyman) F. M. SMITH

Los Angeles, Cal.

Mr. C. H. Randall,
Dear Sir:—
Mgr. The California Outlook
There are many of us whose daily life is so crowded that we need information on subjects of public importance furnished from a public spirited, and at the same time, impartial and disinterested source. This, I believe, will be provided by "The Outlook." I shall lose no opportunity to commend it to my friends.
Very respectfully yours,

I will state that I am very much pleased with the editorial articles published in the Outlook. While I do not entirely agree with every bit of what is said in these editorials, nevertheless I admire greatly the knowledge and ability shown therein.

The California Outlook,
Los Angeles.
Gentlemen:
I am glad to know that we can still get dependable news. The interests own nearly all our big dailies. I read nothing from San Francisco but the "Bulletin." I sincerely hope the "Outlook" will survive, for we most assuredly need a paper of that class in California.
Very truly,
W. N. Cunninghame.

Our Contemporaries

The consolidation of the Outlook and the California Weekly results in the "California Outlook," confessed "progressive weekly." We personally recommend the paper as the one publication to follow if you are desirous of keeping in touch with the "progressive" element that is now in control of the state's government and politics.—Calexico Chronicle.

It is worth something nowadays to find a newspaper, the sincerity of which cannot be questioned, which does not accept things at their face value and which does not hesitate to attack a wrong. The California Outlook is not a literary Don Quixote, charging windmills, but it can be counted on to espouse the cause which is right, because it is right, and which, though rare, is the only really worth-while reason for doing anything.—Gridley Herald.

The Pacific Outlook and the California Weekly have been consolidated and the publication now appears under the name of the California Outlook. It is a paper which should be read by every advocate of Good Government.—Corcoran Journal.

The California Outlook is well gotten up and will go to the subscribers in convenient form. A casual perusal of its pages will quickly convince the reader of the appropriateness and excellency of the subject matter, leaving no doubt about the wide range of information and the ability of editors and contributors.—Glendora Gleaner.

The California Outlook, which is the successor of the California Weekly and the Pacific Outlook, is starting out with very strong editorial and business force. The friends of the reform movement in California who want some independent and illuminating comment on State affairs should subscribe for the Outlook.—Riverside Press.

THE DESERT

(Gertrude King, in Appleton's Magazine)

I am the pure proud land that hath hearkened to no man's wooing;
I am the virgin land vowed sole to the service of God;
The silence that broods on my hills is my answer to human suing,
And there is the peace on my plains that marks where the Lord hath trod.

I and my sister the Sea, we fret at your insolent creeping;
She decks with a light foam wreath
the place of a strong man's rest,
And the dry skull, bleached to silver,
where the sated wolf is sleeping,
Is a trivial gaud scarce worthy to lie on my proud white breast.

Love you your fat, green valleys, the riches of man's long labor?
Love you the foulness of cities,
dark with the ages' grime?
Find you your gladness warm in the smile and the grasp of your neighbor?
Bide you there with your kin, the plaything of men and of time.

But when kisses have cooled on your lips and your eyes have grown weary of weeping,
When your pitiful loves slink down to the clasp of the eager earth,
Come you and taste of the peace that the guard of my hills is keeping,
Come and learn you the sweetness of silence, the mother of God's own mirth.

He is throned on my crimson hills
in a purple meet for His passion;
The hot bright flame of His patience plays over the leper-white plains.
The wonderful sun is His herald, and speaks Him in kingly fashion,
And the golden splendor of midnight is the veil that His glory
deigns.

Leave you the joys of green valleys to faint hearts that wait on their sating.
Here in the sweet fresh air the soul is cleansed from its fears—
Can you bargain with Age the Despoiler—will Time not grow weary of waiting?
But here in the Desert is God, the End and the Crown of years.

Recalling Horses and Judges

The Farmer said to his Son: "You may go to the Fair and pick out half a dozen Horses for our use. Get the best you can for the money."

"Am I competent for this Job, do you think?" asked the Son, doubtfully. "It is not easy. Remember, I am taking these Animals almost unsight, unseen."

"You are as competent as anybody," answered the Farmer. "Besides you must learn the Business. Of course we must take some chances."

So the Youth brought home the Horses and the Farmer said they all looked good to him.

At the end of six months the Son said to his Father: "I have been using these Horses every day, and my Mind is now made up. Five of them are excellent, but One is no good at all. He balks and soldiers and kicks things to pieces. We must get rid of him."

"But the Farmer said: "I am surprised at your Gall in offering an opinion on such a subject. Are you Competent to decide an important matter of that kind?"

"Well, for the Love of Mike!" exclaimed his Son, "I was competent to buy the Horses, unsight, unseen, wasn't I; and am I not competent now, after I have watched them working for six months, to decide what Ones are no good?"

"Certainly not," said the Farmer, "that is Different."

Then the Son went around behind the Barn, kicked himself three times and said softly: "My Father is a Chump."

Eliminating the Farmer

CERTAIN Manchester (England) spinning corporations have joined in purchasing 32,000 acres of good cotton land in northern Mississippi with the avowed intention of directly supplying their own product of long staple cotton. They declare that they can produce it at a cost of seven cents per pound instead of paying American planters and cotton speculators fifteen cents per pound for it. If so, it would seem to be a business proposition of great possibilities. It may result in more corporations buying more land for the production of more cotton. The beet sugar factories produce the greater portion of their own beets, why may not the big packing houses produce the greater part of their own cattle and hogs, the millers their own wheat, the creamery companies their own milk? The conversion of farming into a factory system is one of the possibilities we must have an eye on else the independent farmer will come to be about as independent as the independent washerwoman whom a solicitous judiciary has undertaken to forefend from the annulment of her right to barter for a sixteen-hour day as the price of life or honor.

Denman Thompson

IT WAS on the occasion of his first trip to San Francisco that Denman Thompson noticed that, night after night, the same group occupied one box, a fact that he recognized in some fitting way. Shortly after that a note fluttered down from that box to the stage, as Mr. Thompson himself told the writer of this paragraph. On it was scrawled: "We have come to see Joshua Whitcomb, this makes thirteen straight nights and the end is not yet," signed Charles Crocker and family. Nothing truer to the New England that was, was ever written or done, and Denman Thompson, lately buried, lived to outlive the life he so faithfully portrayed. Foreign immigration did it.

What General Sherman Did Say

THE ARMY AND NAVY JOURNAL declares that General William Tecumseh Sherman never said that "War is hell." What he did say was, "War is cruelty and you cannot refine it." Well, he ought to have said it if he didn't, for he made the people "from Atlanta to the sea," think so, and, anyhow, he never said it wasn't. By what right does the Army and Navy Journal seek to undermine "Old Billy's" reputation at this late day, The California Outlook would like to know?

A Ten Thousand Dollar Man

THE EIGHTEEN MILLION DOLLAR good roads fund is to be expended under the immediate direction of a ten thousand dollar man. Where can such a man be found? There are plenty of railroad engineers who command much larger salaries than that, electric engineers also, and engineers of bridge and building construction, but none of these necessarily knows how to build wagon roads. We shall not secure a ten thousand dollar man by paying a four thousand dollar man ten thousand dollars a year, although the danger is that we may make the attempt. We want the man who can make good roads out of the materials we have to make them of, sand one-half mile and adobe the next, succeeded by loam and then by dry bog. The engineer who can accomplish this within a reasonable price per mile will be worth $10,000 a year several times over, but where can such an one be found? His uncovering will not be easy, but without him California is likely to prove $18,000,000 the poorer and not much the gainer.

An Absurd Lot

THE ELEPHANT which Theodore Roosevelt killed in Africa, by request of President Benjamin Ide Wheeler, for the University of California, has arrived and the curious are much put to it because they cannot find the bullet hole anywhere in the elephant's skin. The inference has been hinted at that the Lion Hunter must have fed it to him with a spoon. What an absurd lot! Why do they not look in his trunk?

Publicity and Divorce

ALL THAT MR. OLIVER said, last week, in criticism of our paragraph entitled "Open the Court Records," was true and not without effectiveness of appeal, but he saw but one side of the shield. The other has to do with what would befall the home were the judiciary sworn to secrecy and all the restraints imposed through fear of publicity taken away. That would mean divorces while you wait and for causes as trivial as might justify a curtain lecture or a husbandly reproof for extravagance. It were ungallant not to wish to shield unhappy wives. It were to become infidel to our common humanity to fail of shielding the home.

William Keith

AN UNASSUMING, diligent man, American in sympathy, Scotch in faith and tenacity of purpose, he toiled on, transferring to luminous canvasses the beauties of a wonderful world, beauties that few could see until he had been their interpreter; toiled until his hand fell nervelessly at his side and he could toil no more, loving his art because he loved the Maker of beauty; depicting with fidelity because he loved truth. Such was William Keith, only lately dead. As the years go by, increasing numbers, unable to own a Rembrandt, whose desirability will be more owing to antiquity than to superior genius, will, if they may, possess themselves of a Keith and be content.

One More Recall Case

THE RECALL came into existence in Los Angeles in the year 1903, and was used for the first time in 1904 to get rid of a councilman that had helped the Times to graft on the city for $15,000. Within the next four years, it was adopted in a dozen California cities and used once—in San Diego. In the next year or two, it was adopted, along with the commission system, by nearly a hundred American cities, chiefly in the Middle West and South. It is safe to say that at the present time we have had 200 years of experience with the institution, that is to say an average of two years of experience in 100 different places.

Add to the two instances of its use given above, one in Texas on school directors, the case of Mayor Harper in Los Angeles, two cases in Kansas, one in South Dakota, the recall of the mayor of Seattle and now the recall of the mayor of Tacoma, to be followed presently by an election for commissioners under the recall in the same city. Also a recall has been filed in Huron, South Dakota, for commissioners.

This makes nine that have been consummated and two in hand. We do not, of course, count threats of recall nor abortive attempts to get up petitions.

As the number of places covered by the recall will average over five to each city, we may say that out of 1,000 opportunities for recall of one year's duration, it has been used in only one-tenth of one per cent.

This seems a sufficient answer to those who contend that the institution will be in constant use, and will tend to unsettle government.

The latest case, the recall of Mayor Fawcett of Tacoma, seems like all the others to have been entirely justified, and it demonstrates the absolute necessity of the recall in conjunction with the commission form of government. A year ago Tacoma went under a charter which placed the management of affairs in the hands of a commission of five. One provision of the charter was that a monthly statement of receipts and expenditures should be published, which, considering the extraordinary powers granted to the commission, was a necessary safeguard to the taxpayers' interests. At the end of six months no statements had appeared, and continued clamor and protest failed to bring forth any figures. Threats of recall followed, but it was not until the open-town policy of the commission with respect to liquor and vice woke up the morality elements that the attack began in good earnest.

Then the Mayor wheeled about and demanded an anti-treating ordinance and other forms of repression of the saloon. This was regarded as a mere bluff by the Public Welfare League which was conducting the recall campaign, and the proof of that seems to lie in the fact that Fawcett had the support of the saloons in the final fight. Many good people were, however, taken in by his professed repentance, and the contest was close. Now he goes out, and the rest of the commissioners are likely presently to follow him. This, by the way, is another case where "the woman did it."

In practically every case thus far, the recall has been used only as a last resort and an extreme necessity. And the man or men ousted have well deserved their fate. This may not always be true. It would be strange, indeed, if no mistakes were ever made, considering the great number that are made in elections. But the percentage of error in recalls will always run far below that in elections, because the former is always a short ballot and can be undertaken only by considerable expense of time and effort. C. D. W.

The Corporate Model for Civil Government

MR. C. NORMAN FAY, of Chicago, writes interestingly, but mistakenly, for the New York Outlook in favor of adopting corporate methods in civil government, maintaining that the great corporations are true democracies and yet efficiently and honestly managed.

They are not true democracies and the world will yet discover that the great ones are efficiently and honestly managed only in a qualified sense. They are oligarchies and while their managements are making good dividends for their shareholders they are making themselves millionaires over and over again by gainful manipulations in which the shareholders are not permitted to participate. Taken by and large, politics is as honest as business and business is as honest as politics. The financier who will plunder his state or his city will plunder the shareholders of his own corporation if he can do it with safety, as he usually can.

The disclosures made in relation to the car repairing business of the Illinois Central railroad would be followed by similar denouments in other corporations were it not through fear of "hurting the corporation" if disclosures were made public, just as reforms of local government are deprecated through fear of "hurting the town." It has long been open and notorious that the several rapid transit freight lines were composed of officials and promoters of the great railroad companies over which these independent freight lines were operated and through which the cream of the traffic went to a select few. The refrigeration of California fruits shipped to eastern markets yields small profit to the railroad companies that supply the ice and put it into the cars, but the refrigeration companies, made up largely of railroad officials and their friends, have become enormously rich through being on the inside of that service.

No, the corporate model is not the model by which either governmental efficiency or integrity is to be secured. It has not been found needful for the "Big Ones" to hold more than 25 per cent of the voting shares of any corporation in order to control absolutely the policies of such corporation, precisely the percentage of "push" votes found necessary to the bosses for the control of political primaries and to hold the balance of power in municipal and other elections. Shareholders of corporations seldom know for whom to vote for directors and usually surrender their proxies to the "organization" in power because they do not know what else to do with them. It is so in the so-called mutual insurance companies, which are mutual only as to benefits and are highly oligarchal as to management.

Mr. Fay would have The People elect a small directorate (legislature) composed of a single chamber with perhaps 15 members and suffer that chamber to select the chief executive, and then suffer him to select his own assistants all down the line "as the corporations do," which the corporations do not. As a rule the snug "interest" that holds the 25 per cent of stock chooses both the directors and the executives and makes them all puppets in the hands of that oligarchal group, precisely the thing that we wish to avoid in civil government.

The thing that gives thoughtful persons concern is that this appears to be a manifest tendency permeating all human activities. Neither in government nor in corporation, beyond a certain standard of bigness, is there any abiding, potential, democratic ruling power. Even the widely heralded cooperative Rochdale system, by which perhaps one-sixth of the retail trade of Great Britain is controlled, is cooperative only as to benefits. The beneficiaries know only that, under that system, they buy cheaper than outside of it and the management is highly centralized and, notwithstanding annual elections, to all intents and purposes is perpetual.

We do need to so far simplify our machinery of government as to make it possible for Democracy to have at least a reserve force of control over the governments under which the people live, but the corporate system affords a better model of government as it is than of government as it should be. Both are oligarchal and not democratic and that is a main trouble with them both.

The Composite Citizen

WE HAVE HEARD of good citizens and bad citizens; there has been much talk of the highest type of citizen, and T. R. himself took a crack at the undesirable citizen; no political discussion is complete without more or less reference to the average citizen, and we know all about the mob, and the many-headed, the great unwashed, the groundlings, the profanum vulgus and hoi polloi. But it remained for Senator Jonathan Bourne of Oregon to bring out the most important and the most interesting of the whole clan of citizens—one who has existed from the beginning of things, but is only now at this late date coming to attract general notice—the Composite Citizen.

Do not be deceived with the idea that he is practically the same as the average citizen with whom we have so long been familiar. They are no more alike than a wagon-load of rock and a marble statue, no more alike than two pounds of suet and a seven-course dinner, no more alike than a broken linotype and the play of Hamlet. And on this very misconception, this theory that the average citizen and the composite citizen were one and the same, a great deal of political philosophy has struck and gone to the bottom.

Under the old order of things this Composite Citizen was the motive power of all government, of all economics, of all human action on the face of the globe. Under the new dispensation he will be not only the motive power but also the hand on the steering gear. We have cause to thank Senator Bourne for the introduction to one so puissant—an elder brother of the race, a demigod of the new centuries.

Is it not strange that we should have waited so long to know and love him, and stranger yet that many who are rated of the highest wisdom shut their eyes to his existence, or fear and despise him?

The reader has seen, no doubt, those composite photographs made by combining the portraits of great numbers of people, centered on one point of the physiognomy, and has noted this weird fact: that no matter how plain and forbidding the faces thus brought together, the resultant picture is always beautiful and presents a character that is lofty and inspiring to look upon. Why? Because in the melting together of such numbers of lines, where the faults of one do not coincide with the faults of another, all that is harsh and unpleasant will tone down and disappear.

In like manner the composite citizen is evolved from the melting together of countless individual citizens. Now while it would seem that he should possess the faults of all in the same measure as he receives the virtues of all, yet in the mysterious alchemy of human nature there enters a new factor whereby the moral status of the composite type is lifted far above that of the average, even above that of the highest of the individual. Because all vice is in the last analysis selfishness, and because selfishness is essentially individual and not communal, the composite citizen, like the photograph described above, takes the good and leaves the bad, or rather, let us say transforms the bad into the good.

We are speaking in terms of the general, recognizing the possibility of exception when the group on which the composite is based is so small that some one phase of selfishness is common to all.

As it is with his morals so also with his wisdom. Not only is the judgment of the composite citizen above that of the average, it is in the long run superior to that of the wisest of the individuals. For the vision of the individual is limited and it is warped by self-interest. Every man has his weak spot of judgment as of morals. But in the working together of all the elements these weak spots disappear.

And this is the being—the embodiment of democracy, the soul of the people—that the writers of books and the interpreters of law delight to call the "mob."

Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number 2

IT IS HIGH TIME the voters of California were putting their thinking caps on with regard to the constitutional amendments which are to be voted on in October. There is nothing else before the people that ranks in importance with the careful consideration of these amendments, the whole blessed three-and-twenty of them. It is not lightly and for trivial reasons that the organic law of the State should be changed as, for instance, in the case of Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 2.

This amendment copies, verbatim, the first twelve lines of Section 7 of Article IX and then adds: "without any change or alteration whatsoever which will require or necessitate the purchase of new books by such pupils." As "such pupils" are nowhere else referred to in the entire section, either as it now stands or as it is proposed to have it read when amended, it is evident that the amendment was bunglingly drawn and hastily and inconsiderately adopted.

But that is not the most objectionable feature of the proposed amendment. It strikes out of the section as it stands important provisions: "The State Board (of Education) shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by law." The writer of this will not affirm that, in the absence of this clause from the constitution, the State Board of Education would be beyond legislative control, either to add to or take from the powers of that board, but it would seem to be, and, if so, a most injurious condition of affairs would exist.

The proposed amendment also strikes out of the organic law as it stands this provision: "The Legislature shall provide for a Board of Education in each county in the State." Does the elimination of these words imply that the Legislature shall have no such power and that the counties are to be without Boards of Education? If it does it is mischievous and encroaches upon that principle of government which leaves to localities functions that chiefly concern those localities and, if it does not, then those words and phrases now in the constitution are, at the worst, only surplusage and do no harm. They should stay where they are.

Finally, the following sentence is also stricken out: "The county superintendents and the county boards of education shall have control of the examination and the granting of teachers' certificates within their respective jurisdictions." If these words are left out of the constitution will such boards, if there be any such, have no control over examinations for teachers' certificates, or hold any such examinations? If not who shall? The amendment as proposed does not say. It is possible that Section 5 of the same article, as it now stands, may be broad enough to include, by implication, all of these powers but, if so, it should be broad enough to include all of Section 7, and the thing to do is to strike it all out leaving the Legislature with full power to "Provide for a system of common schools."

But it is manifestly not the purpose of the author of this amendment to leave the Legislature with full power to act unhampered by constitutional restrictions for the reason that it is specifically provided in the proposed amendment that text books shall not be changed for four years, a bit of legislating into the constitution that is not warranted even by the vexations of changing text books more frequently than desired. Our legislatures, if public sentiment demands such limitation, are abundantly able to deal with the subject without loading an already overburdened constitution with such details.

Did the amendment propose to omit Section 7 entire, thus leaving the Legislature with full freedom to act under the general powers of Section 5, the writer of this would favor its adoption, but inasmuch as the proposed amendment strikes out the things that ought to be left in, if we have such a section at all, and puts in the thing that should be left out, he counsels voting the amendment down. A. J. P.

Describing Constitutional Amendments

THE LATE LEGISLATURE adopted 23 amendments to the constitution to be laid before the voters at a special election to be held next October. It was a wise decision that separated these issues from the politics of 1912, when they would have been voted upon if provision had not been made for a special election. Instead of finding the amendments at the end of a long ballot containing presidential electors, county officers, a congressman and members of the legislature, the voter will now find them on a ballot by themselves, and they are before him at a time when he is not confused by a multiplicity of other public matters.

Some consideration should be given by the next Legislature to a better method of describing these amendments on the ballot, so that the voter may have a clearer understanding of what he is about. Under the present law the Secretary of State puts merely the official title of the amendment on the ballot. Sometimes this is a true brief or synopsis of the matter of the instrument, as per example, Senate Amendment No. 5, which is thus described: "Relating to the sessions of the Legislature, providing for a session for a period not exceeding thirty days, then a recess for thirty days, and the reassembling of the Legislature, to act upon the bills introduced during the first thirty days."

But more often these titles are either blind or misleading. For example, No. 50 "Relating to railroads and other transportation companies"; No. 49 "Relating to public utilities"; No. 8 "Relating to the rights of suffrage." This last is the "votes for women" amendment. One might guess it, but it would be only a guess.

The number of propositions laid before the people as amendments to the constitution is not likely to grow less in the future nor will they diminish in importance. Because the people grow steadily more intelligent and more conscientious about public affairs, they will more and more be taken into the work and responsibility of law-making. There is every reason to believe that Amendment No. 22, giving the people the right of direct legislation, will carry, but even if it should not, there will still be amendments to consider in increasing numbers. The public press will do its part toward making the people understand these issues, but it is necessary that the ballot be so marked as to make identification easy. The title need not convey an argument; but it should contain a clear statement of the purpose of the measure and its chief provisions.

Suffrage and the Coxcomb

EVERY QUESTION has two sides, including the question of whether women should be granted the right to vote; and when the members of the Southern California Women's Press Club undertook to inform themselves on that subject, they took a course which is, it must be admitted, not always customary in politics, and asked to hear from both sides. The negative phase of this issue is represented in Los Angeles by an organization known as the Anti-Suffrage Association, and a request for a speaker was sent from the Press Club to this organization.

The speaker who appeared in response to this petition was a man connected with the editorial staff of the Los Angeles Times. The paper that he read afterwards appeared in the Sunday issue of that journal, so that it is now before the public and open to discussion, not merely as the utterance of this individual but presumably as a line of argument put forth by those who are opposing votes for women.

What the women of the Press Club thought of his treatment of the subject may be gathered from their treatment of him. This club, by the way, contains some women that are opposed to suffrage.

At the conclusion of the paper one of the members rose to her feet and moved that the speaker's name and all reference to the paper and even the fact that he had been invited to speak be stricken from the Club's records. This was carried. A day or two later the directors of the club met and sent a communication to the Anti-Suffrage organization protesting against their action in sending the speaker, whose paper, the directors assert, "was an affront to womanhood, to manhood, and to the civilization of the present day."

A perusal of the document as it appears in print makes plain enough the cause of the indignation, disgust and loathing it seems to have aroused among the self-respecting women who were thus trapped into hearing it read. Indeed, had they followed the example set by their sisters of Marblehead in the case of Skipper Ireson, as Whittier tells it:

"Here's Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart,
By the women of Marblehead"—

it would have been only a natural physical rejoinder to the intolerable form of insult his words conveyed.

Women are used to hearing the argument that they should not be allowed to vote because they are intellectually or physically inferior to men, but it was a new and startling experience for this group of capable and intelligent women, most of whom earn their own living by hard work, to be told that woman is dependent for her place in the world solely on the charm she can exercise over man through the sex function; and whatever their views on suffrage they could scarcely do else than resent the sentiment that (we quote his exact words) "the recent agitation in the feminine ranks, and the demand for equal rights, comes, in a measure, from those women whose attractiveness is so run down at the heels that they are unable to command the market quotation."

The paper itself, with its pompous attempts at Nietzsche philosophy and its "smarty" style of rhetoric, is not deserving of any form of answer. It would not receive even this passing comment but for the fact that the Anti-Suffrage organization, whose membership is made up of women, seems to be sponsor for its presentation to the public. If this is an example of the style of campaign to be waged, it will be well hereafter for those who seek Anti-Suffrage speakers to specify that they will not accept any who base their arguments on a contemptuous and insulting estimate of womankind. C. D. W.

Leave It to the Hens

INASMUCH as reciprocity with Canada, judging from press comments, mainly has to do with eggs, why not leave the issue to be decided by the hens north and south of the line? The American hens are sorely taxed to supply our delectable needs and the forty thousand dozen eggs their Canadian sisters barely spare us scarcely relieve the strain. If they were permitted to do their fecund best they could supply Uncle Sam's nephews and nieces only about 1,000,000 dozen more that a three-cent tariff now diverts to England, or barely one egg a year to each American family, not much to cackle over, and yet the egg issue, if we are to accept the protesting agricultural view of it, is about the most important involved.

Georgia is having trouble with "blind tigers." And New York is having trouble with one that is very far from being blind.—Cleveland Leader.

The United States Senate has found that it pays to advertise. A great New York cleaning establishment is about to establish a branch in Washington.—Cleveland Leader.

The Political Poison Squad Those who imagine that the Republican "organization" crowd have laid down their arms, become reconciled and are determined to be good will some day awaken to find how much mistaken they have been. They are sapping and mining, carrying infection from focus to focus and doing all in their power to be ready at the psychological moment of reaction. Their poison squads are throughout the State. Not a man is discharged from employ without making it the occasion for laying the blame at the door of "that bunch" of "wild-eyed" reformers who are playing smash with the business of the State at the State capitol. Scarcely a federal office is filled or refilled unless with one of the old guard. As with the graft prosecution so with the Johnson administration, subtle, persistent and consistent effort will be made to whisper it down. Political relations will be established, on the one hand, with that conservative business interest that dreads nothing else so much as that which is uncertain, and the cohorts of the controllable "push" vote will be mobilized as never before—all to one end, the slipping back into power without seeming to do so. For four years to come Californians, who believe in government by The People and for The People, will do well to sleep with one eye open and that eye should be the eye of the mind, the one that opens upon understanding and refuses to be deceived either by a far-away look or a fair seeming.

Organizing Operatives A renewed activity is also manifest in politically organizing the men who are, directly and indirectly, in railroad employ. This is being done under the guise of an "American Employes and Investors' Association," the purpose of which is politically to solidify the employes in the investor's interests. Recently organizers of this association paid a visit to Sacramento during which one of their number, J. B. Monahan, specifically admonished the membership to find out what their employers wanted before they voted and then vote for it, adjuring them that their interests and those of their employers were one and carefully warning the men against having anything to do with the so-called Progressives or any other brand of reformers. It is a part of the dialectic philosophy of The Watchman always to concede as much as he must in fairness in order that he can, with the better face, claim what he may as of right, and the spirit of fairness leads him to concede that there should be a community of interest and cooperation of effort between investor and employe interested in the same corporation. They should work and vote, as far as they may in good conscience, for such measures and men as are likely to subserve their mutual interests, provided always that their mutual interests are not inimical to the higher interests of community, State and nation, of that common humanity of which all are a part. Look well to that proviso. It is the one that differentiates the patriot from the parasite, the free man from the bond servant, the soldier of the common good from the skulker and renegade. Government by railroad is eternally and malevolently wrong and any society formed to reestablish that form of government in this State is as treasonable as was the Knights of the Golden Circle or the Ku-Klux-Klan.

The Bones of The Fathers The bones of our revered forefathers also are in for an airing to the same end—the discrediting of every forward and uplifting movement in the interests of reaction and the old regime. For the ten thousandth time in human history the traditions of men are to be exalted above the living truth, and many are being put to this service most unwittingly. There is that in the legal mind, for instance, that prompts it to venerate that which is old even though it hath a Limburger smell of antiquity about it. We shall be admonished not to disturb our ancient safeguards, or break with the traditions of our inheritance, by men who should be with us in our struggle to make things better than they are. If no traditions were ever broken with America would be as belated as China, which has had nothing in its way to prevent its keeping step with the rest of the world except that it has allowed itself to be foot-bound and hand-tied by the traditions of the ancients of the celestial empire. The truth is that we, of today, in matters of government, bear a relation to our revered forefathers such as a man on a hill top bears to a man looking up from the bottom of a well. We have had, since our fathers' day, more of experience in such affairs than the whole world had had, up to that time, since the dawn of history. Are we a gencration of dolts and fools that we have not profited by that experience? It is wise and well to hold fast to that which is good, but it is not good to make our constitution a fetish, as our standpat contingency would have us do, in their interest, not ours. Our national constitution was based on property. The new nationalism would make the well-being of the race its corner stone. Which is the better, nobler, more inspiring? Face the rising, not the setting sun.

University Emancipated Those who stand for Right Things will not soon forget the incident of the entry of politics into the University of California, through the door which former Governor Gillett threw wide when he, without notice, mustered all the ex-officio regents of that institution he could and fairly bounced Attorney Snook from his place as legal advisor of the board and made Judge Fletcher A. Cutler counsel. Well, on Tuesday of last week Judge Cutler went out the same door he came in at and unanimously. The Governor attended the session of the Board of Regents for the first time and when, in going over the budget for the next year, the position of counsel for the board was reached, the Governor quietly called to mind the method by which the appointment of Cutler was made, suggested that unless that method were rebuked, by cancelling the appointment at the first favorable opportunity, the offense would seem to have been condoned and an injurious precedent might be established. As for himself, the Governor declared, he had no personal objection to Judge Cutler, doubted not that he had performed his services ably and faithfully, and he certainly had no candidate to suggest as his successor, save that he would commend that some attorney of character and standing be selected in due time who was not associated with partisan politics, to the end that no taint of political pressure might attend that appointment or any other. His appeal was so simply made and so compelling that the motion to drop the name of Judge Cutler was adopted without a dissenting vote. The lesson is one that the University board of regents will long remember. The emancipation of the institution from politics was accomplished in sweetness and light and as effectively as though done by steam roller methods. Those who conceive that Governor Johnson is without tact do not know their man. It is perhaps worthy of note that when the entrance of the Governor of California was announced by Regent Rowell the entire board rose to receive him, an honor they had not paid to any preceding Governor, and it was paid instinctively and without the slightest prearrangement, notwithstanding that half the membership at least is, by tradition and affiliation, not in sympathy with what Governor Johnson stands for. The simple directness and sincerity of the man compel even those who oppose him to respect and feel kindly toward him. It was a good day's work well done and this without reflecting upon the quality of Judge Cutler's services, but only upon the methods by which he got in. That coup kicked back.

Better Than a Wooden Indian The Watchman was amused, and put into an humble and contrite state of mind, by reading in last week's issue Senator Tyrrell's laconic reference to The Watchman's post-election declaration that a "Cigar

HOW IT LOOKS TO CLASSIC BOSTON

The Significance of The Berkeley Election

By J. B. GALLOWAY

The recent election in Berkeley, which resulted in the defeat of Mr. Hodghead and the election of a Socialist to the office of mayor makes necessary some comment in order that proper information may be had as to real causes of a reversal of policy on the part of the college town. It has been heralded far and wide as a Socialist victory. As a matter of fact it was a victory of the forces which are always working against decency and honest government in every city, and of which Berkeley possesses a greater share than is usually supposed.

To dispose of the idea that it was a Socialist victory, it is sufficient to say that the man elected was the candidate of the Socialists for Governor some five months ago. He received some 700 votes in Berkeley at that time. In the recent election he did not have the unanimous support of his party and the local Socialist newspaper supported Mr. Hodghead for the reason that the candidate of the Socialists was surrounded by such influences that it was impossible to give him, the party candidate, its support. As the man elected received 2749 votes, some 2000 votes must be accounted as other than Socialists. So much for that contention.

To gain a clear idea of the situation, which is of far more than local interest, it is necessary to comment on the course of affairs during Mr. Hodghead's administration. The new charter, inaugurating a commission form of government, went into operation at the beginning of the administration some twenty-one months ago. The old inefficient government was displaced by a new one made up of capable men. In the time that has elapsed they have recast the entire list of ordinances of the city, some 1600 in number. They found the financial affairs in a tangle and the treasury with a deficit. This has been cleared away and a surplus created. The streets have been cleaned, street lights more than doubled and the police and fire departments reorganized and enlarged. Careful plans for improvements have been worked out and a comprehensive program for bonds has been submitted for voting, including municipal parks, playgrounds, garbage incinerator, schools, storm sewers and improvements for the police and fire departments. In the matter of a water supply, Mr. Hodghead has, after a most patient and persistent effort, extending over seven months, secured the co-operation of Oakland, Berkeley and Alameda with San Francisco in the protection of the rights of the Bay cities in the Hetch-Hetchy valley. If ever that most necessary system of municipal supply is obtained for the East Bay cities, it will be owing to the efforts of Mr. Hodghead.

Such is the record of less than two years' work by as capable, honest and hard-working body of men as ever governed a municipality in America. Why then, was the man who stood as the leader of the administration, the mayor, Mr. Hodghead, defeated for re-election? The defeat was by less than 300 votes. He was not defeated by Socialists, as they did not have sufficient strength and were not united. Here are some of the reasons:

When the present government was elected two years ago, it was over an organization of all the bad elements in the town. They were a part of the local county court house gang, which, in its turn, is a part of the Southern Pacific machine. Although defeated, this element did not move out of town. One of the first acts of Mr. Hodghead as mayor was to stop a deal by which a local boss was unloading some property on the city, thus saving some $10,000 to the taxpayers and earning the enmity of the boss. He next, with considerable effort, pried loose the hands of a local newspaper from the city treasury to the benefit of that department. "Hell hath no fury like that of a newspaper deprived of its graft." Since that time every act of the city government has been distorted, misconstrued and libelled by the sheet in question, only lack of real ability making its tirades less yellow than the best representatives of this bad type. Then a quarry company with a quarry inside the city limits asked to have its blasting permit extended, the consideration being a gift to the city of a 2½-acre park, the building of a very necessary reservoir by the water company and the supervision of the quality of rock used on roads which the city must later acquire. This displeased a number of men who made such a clamor that the quarry company withdrew its application for permit and the city lost the park and the reservoir. The gentlemen became permanent foes of the administration. Money had been saved and an automobile fire engine, capable of climbing hills, had been purchased. One corner of the town demanded the engine but the mayor insisted on placing the engine where it could serve a larger part of the city. This drove another group into opposition. So it was with fenders on the street cars. The council, after conference with Oakland, into which the cars run, adopted an ordinance similar to that of the adjacent city with the result that all cars now have an approved type of fenders. But some men wanted another type of fender and some wanted four fenders on each car so they tried to call an election and failing in this, went into opposition.

All the time the mayor and council kept on in their work for the city. Amid the abuse of the newspaper and the clamor of some fake improvement clubs, they carried on the government in a quiet orderly way without noise, bluster or self-advertisement. The success of the charter in their hands had been complete and representatives of other cities came to learn and copy. The mayor became the head of the California League of Municipalities.

Then came the time for another election. Only the earnest solicitation of numbers of citizens made by petition caused Mr. Hodghead to stand again for election. In this he was urged by the Socialist newspaper, which admitted the good work done. So complete was the assurance of the constructive ability of Mr. Hodghead that no candidate but the perennial Socialist could he found to run against him. The Socialist won, but it was not by Socialist votes. The visionaries of that cult helped, but their candidate was elected by the theorists, the grafters, the push, the soreheads, the cranks, the disappointed office-seekers and the men who could not have their own way. But more than all other causes combined was the one which stands out above others—over two thousand five hundred men in a total of a little over eight thousand voters failed to go to the polls and vote.

The Socialist candidate being a forceful speaker, is an adept at telling the unthinking what he will do. He will reduce gas and water rates, lower taxes for the poor man and tax the rich man's idle land. He will have municipal telephones, municipal lighting plants, municipal water works and at the same time reduce taxes and give every one work. Everyone will have his fowl in the pot and all the ills of humanity will be cured "if only I am elected to office."

There is much reason for the poor man in this land today turning to whomsoever promises some relief for unequal conditions. But a heavy burden of guilt rests upon the heads of those who, knowing better, and because of some foolish whim or disappointed ambition tried to wreck the government which, with much toil, patience and endurance of slander, Mr. Hodghead and his associates have built up. Equally guilty of criminal neglect are the two thousand five hundred men who did not exhibit enough interest to vote.

Mr. Hodghead has been defeated and the Socialist will take office. His program cannot be carried out, he cannot fulfill his promises and probably at the end of his term he will he turned out with the wrath of his deluded followers upon his head. The grafters, the crook and the enemy of social order have triumphed again, not by electing their kind but by defeating one who in the past had driven them from power.

During the last twenty months Berkeley has had as good government as it is possible to obtain in a modern American city. All of the municipal problems were not solved. The ills that have been a century in accumulating are not to be solved in a day or a year. On the solution of these problems rests the life of the Republic. The keen disappointment comes that, with all the effort put forth, a representative American city is so emotional that it cannot pursue a consistent line of conduct for a greater length of time than two years. It is to be regretted that men whose understanding and light should cause them to follow a different course, will allow personal pique or disappointment over some fancied wrong to so sway their conduct that they will join with all the enemies of society in an assault upon that good municipal government upon which the future of the nation must rest. Equally deplorable is the action of the careless and indifferent citizen to whom the welfare of the city and the nation is as a thing which does not exist.

Mr. Hodghead retires from office with the full confidence of those who know him and his work. A man of ability, much beyond the average, he has given two years of his time to a constructive work the influence of which is now felt and will be felt for years. He has endured with patience the abuse, misrepresentation and calumny which the Americans allow the vile parts of the community to heap upon public men until the good are confused with the bad. In the campaign just closed he was willing to explain the work done but not to adopt the tactics of the mountebank to win votes. He does not nor do his friends offer any apology for anything done. The constructive work accomplished in two years is worth ages of the tearing down which is the stock in trade of those who now triumph. Mr. Hodghead entered into his work with interest, he occupied the office of Mayor with ability and he retires with dignity and unblemished reputation. The harm, the wrong and the humiliation belong to the citizens of Berkeley, not to him to whom release from office is a relief. The cry is often made that good men will not stand for office. Is it difficult to find a reason when such rewards are meted out to them?

Finally, lest it be forgotten, Mr. Hodghead was not defeated by the Socialists or the Socialist candidate. It was a triumph of the grafter, the criminal, the sorehead, the crank, and the push, aided by the careless and the indifferent. In this it was much the same result as obtains in other cities.

Number 11

By The Onlooker

THE SENATE FISH STORY

He looks as George Washington would have looked if he had worn a big, black, barber's mustache and had curly black hair. I'll admit it takes some stretching of the imagination to grasp this description, particularly as most of us weren't personally acquainted with the late G. W., but it isn't a bad description if the rubber trust hasn't squeezed all caoutchoue out of your imagination. (Just sneeze if you want to pronounce that). If George is too many for you, try it on with John Drew.

We refer, of course, to the Honorable Thomas F. Finn, Senator from the Seventeenth District, Sheriff of San Francisco County, chauffeur of the Pay Haitch McCarthy political machine, boss of San Francisco delegation in the Legislature of California, and proprietor of Finn's saloon, East street, waterfront, San Francisco—a gentleman, in brief, of as many component constituent combinations of character as one of the complex and complicating cocktails dispensed over his own bar. This, by the way, is most appropriately a sailor's resort, a sort of inner bar, such as is affectingly described by Tennyson in the lines:

Sunset and evening star
And one clear call for me,
And may there be more sailors at my bar,
To buy my red-eyed skee.

The Alaskan salmon fleet outfits largely at Finn's saloon—that's what makes it so fleet; besides the red-eye is a good Jonah to attract the red salmon, and Finn brings them luck with all the finny denizens of the deep. (Ouch! We'll be good after that, honest!)

Finn's career reminds us of the advertisement which recently appeared in the Fresno Republican:

Important to the Public

Fire Department .....Main 361
Police Department ...Main 297
My Liquor Store .....Main 999

The same subtle relationship seems to have been established in Finn's warp and woof of fate. The picture of our hero as dispenser of lager beer on East street is not complete without the companion portrait of him as shire-reeve at Ingelside.

The gentle reader may have fancied he has detected a tendency to be flippant with the Senator. Far from it, as the heroine of the melodrama said when she shifted her gum and gave Jemsy the Pug the mitten. The Senator was about one-sixth of the Thirty-ninth Legislature of the sovereign state of California, and we have no disposition to be flippant with such a momentous fact. His followers in the Senate and Assembly were not conspicuous for their intellectual attainments, but a head's a head when the votes are counted, even if it isn't otherwise useful for much except to make collar buttons; and Finn's delegation was the headiest single block of votes in the Legislature. If anybody wanted eloquence, they tapped Gates; if they wanted time they tackled Boynton; but if they wanted votes, in wholesale lots and for quick delivery, they went after Finn. Without having any startling quantities of reform in his make-up, Finn probably passed more reform measures at the last session than any other one man. Not that he deserves any credit for it, because we suspect that his virtues in this respect were like the cynic man's definition of gratitude —"A lively expectation of favors to come." We suspect further that this view is likely to lead to a sad and heart-rending picture of desolating misery: Finn sitting on the bank, holding a rod and line for the fish that never come.

We judge that Finn is popular in his own little puddle. He is something or other in the Union Labor Party in San Francisco, besides all the other titles to fame enumerated in our second paragraph. And when he rose two years ago and asked the suffrage of his fellow citizens, they came through handsomely and snowed three opponents forty rods deep in favor of T. Finn for Senator.

For these and many other reasons the sovereign state of California is proud of Senator Finn. She admires the versatility that enables him with equal grace to run a dissipation factory at one place, a detention home for dissipants at another, and, as a light diversion, to run up to Sacramento every two years and legislate for all the people.

The Money Spent to Fight Tuberculosis

From The Survey

The annual survey of its field issued by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis shows that in 1910 nearly $15,000,000 was spent as against $8,000,000 in 1909. The largest item, $11,376,500 for treatment in sanatoriums and hospitals, is almost double that of the year before. Anti-tuberculosis associations spent $760,500; tuberculosis dispensaries, $889,000, and special state and municipal expenses total $1,750,000.

The most significant point in the figures is held to be the increase in the proportion to the whole of the public money spent. It rose from 53.5 per cent last year to 62.6 per cent. The total of public moneys, $9,267,900, is almost double the amount for 1909. The ratio of public to private disbursements in the ten states making the largest expenditures is interesting:

State.	Public.	Private.	Total.
New York.	$3,039,000	$1,206,000	$4,245,000
Pennsylvania ..	1,431,000	673,000	2,104,000
Massachusetts ...	1,118,000	400,000	1,518,000
Colorado..	105,000	731,000	836,000
Ohio	573,000	76,000	649,00¢
Connecticut	338,500	167,500	506,000
New Mex..	250,000	251,000	501,000
Illinois ...	245,000	208,000	453,000
California..	88,000	316,000	404,000
N. Jersey.	255,000	130,700	385,700

New York again leads in both columns. Plans now under way will make changes next year as, for instance, in Illinois, where the new tax for tuberculosis work will greatly increase public disbursements hereafter.

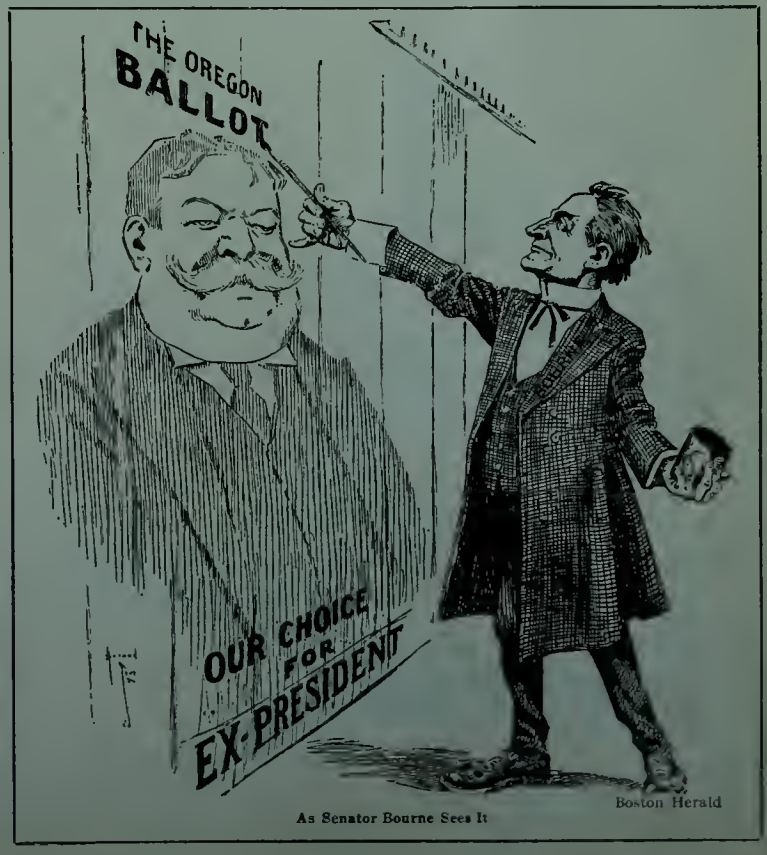
The most rapid gain of any kind is in New York State, where from November 15 to December 15 seven counties took favorable action on providing institutions—an average of two county hospitals every week for that month. This was brought about by the tuberculosis committee of the State Charities Aid Association. The combined appropriations for the seven hospitals are over $200,000. When the association began its work three years ago only three counties out of the fifty-seven in the State made any institutional provision for consumptives. Today there are twenty-two county hospitals and several other counties with small populations are arranging for boarding their consumptives in the institutions of neighboring counties. These institutions have cost to date over one and one-half million dollars. At least five more county hospitals, and increase of other provisions for consumptives, are expected at the January meetings of the county boards of supervisors, and the outlook seems bright for realizing the association's terse program, "No uncared for tuberculosis in 1915."

A BETTER BALLOT

News comes from California that the recently adjourned legislature (one of a kind to make Ohio citizens sigh for it) has enacted a Massachusetts ballot law. Under this system, as most people are aware, the party column does not appear; the names are grouped by offices, and there is only one way to vote, viz., to place a cross in front of the name of each candidate for whom it is desired that the ballot should be counted.

Mr. J. O. Hammitt, Secretary of the Citizens Union of New York City, which has been agitating for the establishment of such a ballot in that state, well sums up the advantages of this type of ballot reform: "The complaint against the present system is that it provides a line of least resistance in favor of straight party voting, and thus by a mechanical device tends to increase straight voting. Whether or not straight voting should be advocated as against split ticket voting is not a question at issue, because surely the ballot itself should not favor one class of voting as against another class.

"It is an historical fact that the provision for voting a straight ticket with a single cross is something which did not appear on the first official ballots, but was added on by the party machines for the purpose of preserving some of the advantages which they possessed under the old vest pocket ballot system. It was put on the ballot in this state with the intention of increasing the number of straight votes. That it has this tendency is beyond dispute, and it is the very reason for the opposition of party machines to the substitution of a Massachusetts ballot. Yet this promotion of straight party voting by means of the form of ballot is, as Gov. Hughes has clearly pointed out, unfair."



It is to her possession of this form of ballot that publicists are inclined to attribute much of Massachusetts superiority in matters of legislation. Since she adopted it in 1888 (due, as President Eliot has pointed out, to the exertions of five men, something that shows clearly that it is not necessary to wait for large support before accomplishing important reforms), eleven other states have followed her example: Arkansas, Florida, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nevada, Oklahoma, Oregon, Virginia, Tennessee and now California.—Cincinnati Citizens Bulletin.

MR. WICKERSHAM ON THE RECALL

Somewhere in nearly all arguments against the recall of public officials one finds the word mob, and, of course, this term is used to distinguish the people from their official representatives. Take, for instance, the latest public utterance of Attorney-General Wickersham. He, being a reactionary, is unalterably opposed to the recall system in any form. Like many others of his belief, he centers his argument on the proposal to apply the recall to the judiciary. This Government is based on majority rule, but the majority that does not agree with Mr. Wickersham is nothing more than a mob.

"What," he asks, "are judges but impartial arbitrators to whom any one of us may be compelled at any moment to turn for protection of life, limb or property? What will become of that protection if our system of government should subject him to the rage of the mob when he asserts the supremacy of the law in the face of unjust clamor?"

There you have it. Implicit faith in the judges created by the people, but no faith in the people.—San Francisco Bulletin.

As Senator Bourne Sees It

Validity of Commission Government in State of Washington: The supreme court of the State of Washington has upheld the validity of the commission form of city government in Spokane, which makes it possible to put that form of government into every city in Washington.

Meeting Tax Deficiency: A new law compels Indianapolis to limit its tax for city purposes to 75 cents on the hundred dollars, and the authorities are meeting the deficiency by saddling on the frontage many expenses that were formerly borne by the general fund, such as, for example, sprinkling the streets and paving the intersections of streets. California cities are many of them confronted by a similar condition, owing to a reduction in the assessable property by the operation of constitutional amendment number one, whereby the property of utility corporations is exempt from local taxation. As most cities in this State, however, have been assessing on the basis of a fifty per cent valuation, the deficiency can be made up by an increase of assessment. This paper now takes satisfaction in recalling that it strenuously warned its readers against voting for amendment number one.

Reporting Accidents to Employes: Minnesota is the first State to require employers to report all accidents to employes, showing number of killed and injured and the cause and nature of the accident. The report also traces all suits for damages resulting from accidents and the outcome of the same, making very valuable data on which to base legislation. The first year's report shows for that State 342 deaths and 19,463 injuries, a surprising total when we consider that Minnesota does not rank high among the States for manufacturing enterprises.

Pittsburg School System: Pittsburg, including Allegheny, has 61 separate and in many ways independent school districts, each with its own little board of education handling its own funds. There are 412 school boards, and an analysis of their personnel recently made by the Voters' League of that city showed that 14 of them were bartenders, 38 held public jobs, 7 had no occupation (of these some were professional gamblers), and 36 were day laborers. The condition of the schools was bad beyond belief.

Locomotives and Smoke: The smoke inspector of Cincinnati declares that 50 per cent of the smoke and dirt from smoke in that city is caused by locomotives. These consume 400,000 tons of fine coal a year and throw out 100 tons of cinders every day through their smokestacks. Burning of oil would diminish the smoke and entirely cut off the cinders, but the inspector says there is no hope for real improvement until all the railroads are outfitted with electricity.

New Kind of Police: We have noted the appointment of women policemen in various cities and in a number of places dogs on the detective force, but Cincinnati has added to the list a boy policeman. A great deal of damage had been done in the parks by the wanton destruction of shrubs and flowers by boys, and it was suggested that a boy policeman be appointed for the work as an experiment, and the suggestion was carried out with success.

Texas Health Statistics: The State of Texas has adopted a general sanitary code and will keep all its records hereafter in accordance with the requirements of the national government. The health figures of the southern states are most of them taken in such an irregular fashion that they are not accepted by the government, nor incorporated in the statements sent out by the census. Texas will hereafter present an exception to this rule.

Better Fire Protection for Tenements: The lower East Side of New York city is to be taken into the high pressure area for fire service and the apparatus in this district is to be increased and brought up to date. This is said to be the most dangerous fire zone in the world by reason of its terrible congestion and the non-fireproof character of most of its buildings.

Eating-house Percentages: Under the new system adopted by the Board of Health of Jacksonville, Florida, each restaurant is marked for cleanliness, and the percentage given is published in the newspapers. Since this system was adopted there has been a steady improvement in the state of things in the restaurants, and the general average of all has advanced over 22 per cent.

A Beautiful City Market: In the past, when a city had to build a structure for mere utility, like a market, for example, it made it as cheap as possible, which usually meant as ugly as possible. Fort Wayne, Indiana, has just been building a city market of reinforced concrete, a beautiful structure of which the city may well be proud. It is a block and a half long with stately arches at each end.

Calgary Is Up-to-Date: The city of Calgary in Canada, owns its street cars, electric lights and water works, the whole business being managed by a commission of three. The water works plant cost $1,400,000, the electric plant $500,000, and the street railway $530,000. All pay expenses and some profit. In the last five years the city has reduced electric lighting charges 45 per cent.

Steel or Concrete Bridges: The State of Kansas has declared in favor of concrete against steel for bridge construction as being safer and more permanent. The rule has been adopted for all public bodies and officials that concrete shall be used for bridges and culverts in all cases where the cost of building is not more than 30 per cent higher than steel.

Oil on Asphalt Pavement: The American Society of Engineering Contractors, considering the effect of drippings from automobiles on asphalt pavement, came to the conclusion that it would probably do more good than harm. There is not enough of it to sink in very deep, and it keeps the surface soft and less liable to cracking and crumbling.

City Parcel Delivery: Bradford, England, has its own tramways, and they carry on an extensive parcel business that is of great service to the people and pays some profit. Last year it carried an average of 14,000 parcels a week.

Storm Water Suits: Spokane has just finished an extensive system of storm water culverts, and is now threatened with suits aggregating about $150,000 by citizens who claim their property will be injured by the disposal of the water.

Test of Dust Layers: The city of Waukesha, Wisconsin, will, through the coming summer make a test of the comparative cost and efficiency of calcium chloride and oil for laying street dust. The figures will be of interest to all cities.

Civic Centers for Toledo: The Business Men's Club of Toledo is advocating a million dollar bond issue for the purchase of land for a civic center, and a referendum vote on the subject will soon be called.

Cincinnati Playgrounds: A million dollar bond issue for playgrounds enables Cincinnati to lay out a complete system and it has just equipped the first of the series in a down-town district.

Profitable City Electric Plant: South Norwalk, Connecticut, has an electric lighting plant valued at $185,000 that pays an annual profit of $25,000. It has recently made improvements, amounting to $30,000 out of profits.

Salt Water for Streets: The outlook for a water supply for the city of Salem, Massachusetts, next summer is so doubtful that it has been decided to sprinkle the streets with salt water.

Exposure of Food Products: Boston now has an ordinance forbidding the exposure of meat and fish or vegetables to the air where they might accumulate dangerous germs.

Yeggmen and Beggars: The police of Lexington, Kentucky, are running out all street beggars. They find them in league with the yeggmen or tramp criminals.

Boulevard Connecting Two Cities: The Legislature of Kansas has provided for the building of a handsome driveway from Leavenworth to Kansas City.

Lead Pipe: The State pure food law of Texas forbids the use of lead pipe for connections to soda fountains.

Gone up in Smoke: Minneapolis recently had a million dollar fire in its business center.

"Please contribute to our fund to send a missionary to the cannibals." "I won't—I'm a vegetarian and don't believe in it. But I'll send them some cereals if you wish."—Toledo Blade.

While [illegible] a red fight for one P. H. McCarthy, head of the Building Trades State Council, and incidentally Mayor of this city and county. For, if there be any man in San Francisco who possesses all the elements of political strength necessary to compass McCarthy's defeat, that man is James Rolph, Jr.

This is not saying that Rolph is a particularly strong man, or that he possesses all the qualifications desirable in a Mayor—although he has a whole lot of them—but Rolph will bring together in one combination more voters than any other San Franciscan who has been mentioned for Mayor or even thought of.

To begin with, Rolph is from "South of the slot." To be sure, the slot isn't there any more, but the traditional line down the middle of Market street where the "slot" used to be, is still there. Broadly speaking, the "higher-ups" reside "north of the slot." Those who labor with their hands and organize labor unions, exist more or less contentedly south of the line. And James Rolph, Jr., lives among the "South of the slotters."

Rolph does more. He not only lives among them, but he is of them. If you do not believe this—Rolph, by the way, in the business world is counted a "higher-up," is president of the Merchants' Exchange, executive of the Hind-Rolph shipping firm, president of one bank, director of several others, and rated a millionaire—if you do not think it consistent that this "higher-up" is a part of the real life "South of the slot," ask anyone in touch with San Francisco to name the most important and influential improvement club in this city. You will be told that such club is to be found "South of the slot," and is the Mission Promotion Association.

And where was the Mission Promotion organized?

Why, in "Jim" Rolph's barn, to be sure.

And its membership?

Every man, women and child South of the slot, apparently.

And its president?

Is James Rolph, Jr.

The Mission Promotion Association, by the way, grew out of the relief work "South of the slot" at the time of the earthquake and fire.

Rolph organized the district. It was the largest relief district in the fire-swept city. And it was the only district that did not have "soup kitchens."

The "soup kitchens," by the way, were the cruelest of the many grafts practiced upon the afflicted people.

To be sure, a "concession" was given for a "soup kitchen" in Rolph's district. The lumber for the building was actually hauled to the grounds.

Rolph and his associates heard about it, and, before the lumber could be unloaded, ordered it away.

The writer met Rolph for the first time, during the housing and feeding activities following the earthquake. The people "South of the slot" had got together to erect buildings for the homeless. Rolph directed the operations.

The lumber was second-hand, gathered from heaven knows where, and decidedly unclean. But it was lumber, and lumber was at a premium in San Francisco those days.

No laborer on the job worked harder that day than did James Rolph, Jr. At noon, he was toil-stained and grimy.

Lunch was served the workers in a neighboring yard by the women of the district. Mrs. Rolph, by the way, was one of those who "waited on table."

As the workers went over the open air "during noon," Rolph's little daughter danced up to him for her usual greeting.

As she neared her father and beheld the grime on face and hands, she hesitated and drew back. Banker Rolph, probably, is ordinarily more presentable at lunch time.

"I think, papa," the child ventured, "you had better wash."

Papa washed.

Rolph went to Europe in 1907, and on his return was tendered a banquet by his "neighbors," the Mission Promotion Association running the affair.

The banquet was held in the "Mission Promotion Hall," "Jim" Rolph's barn.

The writer attended as a newspaper reporter. All circumstances considered, he was in doubt whether to wear dress suit or overalls.

The events of the evening demonstrated that it really did not matter.

Had Rolph dressed for a banquet to the President, he could not have been more scrupulously observant of the conventionalities. It is a safe bet that he had on his gladdest glad rags that night. Sprinkled over the barn were other dress suits, but dress-suit clad, tweeds-clad or jeans-clad, everybody was at home—it was everybody's banquet. And the roughest dressed, most toil-bent man present fairly beamed his satisfaction that the guest of the evening took the banquet as seriously, and gave it as much consideration, as he would have shown a "down-town affair."

Matt I. Sullivan in responding for the guest of the evening told of Rolph's career "South of the slot," where Rolph had been born and raised. Of the days following the fire, Sullivan said:

"Without reward or expectation of reward, save the satisfaction which comes from doing good, Rolph contributed his grounds, his buildings, his means and time to the alleviation of the misery and suffering of thousands of his fellow beings. For many months, to the detriment of his business interests, with a faithful band of followers, he worked with consummate energy and patience to relieve distress. I well remember how the association organized by him provided at that time, daily, for ten thousand unfortunate victims of the earthquake and fire, who, in orderly line, marched past this hall and received their liberal allotments of provisions."

They presented Rolph with a token of appreciation that night. The gift was not inconsistent with the occasion. It was a locket with the picture of Rolph's wife on one side, and of his children on the other.

Such is James Rolph, Jr., as seen "South of the slot," where the majority of McCarthy's votes must come from if McCarthy is to be elected Mayor.

"North of the slot" Rolph is the active partner in the Hind-Rolph shipping firm, one of the Bank of California group of financiers, president of the Mission Bank, president of the Merchants' Exchange, director of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, and something or other in other things too numerous to mention.

"North of the slot" Rolph associates with the "higher-ups," although the writer cannot recall that any of Rolph's immediate business associates were indicted during the days of the graft prosecution. But the sympathies of many of those who are in daily business relations with Rolph were certainly not with the prosecution.

And yet, the powerful Mission Promotion Association, of which Rolph is president, and which met in those days in Rolph's barn, remained actively loyal to Heney and the prosecution all through the graft troubles. But the writer cannot recall having heard Rolph himself either condemn or approve the prosecution.

In this connection, a story told of Rolph during the gubernatorial primary campaign is in point.

Rolph was popularly regarded as being for Johnson. But Rolph refused to take active part in the campaign, the story goes, on the ground that he did not regard it as proper that a director of the Panama-Pacific Exposition should identify himself with the State contest.

Nevertheless, another director of the Exposition, Charles C. Moore, who has since been made president of the Exposition Company, soon after became one of Alden Anderson's campaign managers.

Such incidents have caused accusations of weakness and trimming to be made against Rolph.

One can well understand this.

It must have been decidedly exasperating to the gentlemen under indictment for plain bribe giving, to see the Mission Promotion Association, which Rolph could unquestionably have turned their way, giving aid and comfort to Heney and Spreckels, when less important improvement clubs were howling against "the methods of the prosecution." It no doubt annoyed the Lincoln-Roosevelt League leaders to see Exposition Director Moore shouting for Anderson, while Director Rolph justified his silence on the ground that an Exposition director should not shout.

But in spite of Rolph's "diplomacy," he usually has his way.

For example, the "higher-ups," "North of the slot," were determined that India Basin Harbor should be exploited by individuals and corporations. Rolph was equally determined that the basin should be developed for the benefit of San Francisco and the State. Rolph, in spite of the opposition of his business associates, was largely instrumental in forcing the India Basin bill through three Legislatures. In 1908, through the misrepresentation of men closely associated with Rolph, the project was rejected at the polls. Rolph thereupon organized a state-wide campaign of education, and secured from the people of the State ratification of the India Basin project although about one hundred thousand dollars were spent by the corporations and allied interests to defeat the measure.

Such is the man who has entered the fight against P. H. McCarthy.

McCarthy's followers have organized every precinct; they claim 30,000 voters have "signed up for McCarthy." This, in all San Francisco, leaves for the other fellow, something like 32,000 of those who go to the polls and vote.

If there be a man in San Francisco better calculated than Rolph to get the 32,000 together and hold them together the writer does not know him.

At His Fingers' Ends

"Oh, father! See the funny man!"

"Yes, child, is he not funny?"

"Indeed, he is. And why does he wave his hands and make strange motions?"

"He is a deaf mute, my child."

"How interesting! But why does he snap his fingers?"

"He doubtless is cracking a joke."

GLEANINGS FROM THE PRESS

OF 50 YEARS AGO

Though "the days of '49" were twenty-two years in the past, the Californians of 1861 were still living in the "days of gold." Nearly every paper had items about the diggings, new strikes and other references to the yellow metal. And a peculiar hazard of the pursuit of it is indicated by the following news paragraph. Hardly a day passed but the newspapers contained such a notice as this:

"Killed—A man named James Sylvester was killed by the caving of a bank of dirt, on the 29th of March, last, at a place called Dutch Hill, between Butte Valley and the North Fork of Feather river. The fact has not been stated before."

Clearly enough, too, placer diggings were still the principal source of gold. Quartz mining was not yet greatly in vogue.

Other indications of the importance of gold in the life of the people are found in such advertisements as this, two or three of like nature to be found in every issue of the papers:

Assay Office
WATERS & CO
(Late Blake & Co.)
No. 52 J Street, Sacramento

"Gold and Ores of every description melted and assayed, and returns made in Bars or Coin within six hours. Our assays are guaranteed, and bars discounted at San Francisco rates."

And a part of every bank advertisement was the stereotyped line:

"Gold Dust and Bullion purchased at the highest rates."

Even Southern California came in for its share of notoriety in rumors of treasures of gold. In the Sacramento Union of April 18, 1861, note is made that "they are having a gold excitement, on a real or pretended basis, in Los Angeles, according to recent reports. Holcomb Valley is the scene of the discovery and excitement. Our telegraphic accounts from that quarter are slightly sensational."

Leaving the gold excitement we may remark that San Francisco was a pretty warm place itself in those good old days, if these words were true:

"On Sunday, April 14th, the heat in San Francisco at noonday equaled the maximum of great heat in San Francisco."

Some sidelights on the life of the pioneers are caught from these four items, gathered from papers of the week of April 15th:

"Wanted immediately—Two yoke of No. 1 oxen, at Norris Bridge, the American River. Samuel Norris."

"An Arctic Whaler—the Bark Carib was to have sailed yesterday from San Francisco for the Arctic ocean, on a summer's whaling cruise. She was fitted out at the Bay City."

"Rodeo in Placer—There will be a rodeo for cattle at Cox's Ranch, April 22nd."

"By reference to an advertisement in another column, it will be seen the postage for pony letters has been reduced from five to two dollars per half ounce." "Reduced!" And it's a "dollar," not cents. Whew!

Rarely will you find more history, or more of a picture of the life of a people crowded into small space than you will glean from the following two brief paragraphs:

"M. S. Latham:—Letters have been received in this city from Senator Latham, announcing his determination, unless an extra session were decided upon, to sail for California on the steamer of the 1st of April. If these avowed intentions were acted upon, the Senator is on the steamer now on her voyage from Panama.

"Senator Latham will meet a much warmer welcome from his constituents upon his arrival than he did last year upon his return. During the past short session, California has been especially favored in the way of legislation, the only important measure which failed being the Pacific Railroad bill. A daily mail via Salt Lake from St. Joseph to Placerville in sixteen days, the Pony express secured three times a week in eight days and made a Government institution, a mail on alternate days from San Francisco to Los Angeles, a mail three times a week from Visalia to Quartzburg, and a similar mail secured for all the coast towns in the state north of San Francisco; the Indian war debt assumed by the Federal government, together with fair appropriations for national improvements in the state, have all been obtained from the past short session of Congress."

Check up some of these blessings of '61 against the conveniences of today, and see how times have changed.

OF TODAY

The Cholly-boy got his last week. Think back for fifty years and remember the youth of early days who pioneered the state, grew a beard, swore and drank whiskey and played stud poker and carried a pepper-box revolver strapped to his hip. Then gaze upon the picture created by Governor Johnson when he signed the Juvenile Court law. Willie with the cigaret in his lips, dressed in baggy trousers and looking too swell for any use, is now amenable to this law, and may now be turned over the judge's knee, metaphorically speaking, and soundly spanked. It is now an offence for him to frequent saloons or billiard rooms, or to smoke cigarettes. And if the cop catches him at it, he isn't taken along to police court, like the rowdy ruffian he would like to imagine he is, but is haled to the Juvenile Court, along with ten-year-old newsboys up for shooting craps.

By the way, this isn't a joke. It's law.

"The shouting and the tumult's died, the captains and commanders have departed," to be pretty free with Kipling, and Fresno has torn down the bunting and laid in a supply of throat lozenges, while the Grand Army vets return to their various camps for another year-long bivouac.

Another remnant of youth's "glory and the dream" has faded into the light of common day: Chris Evans has been paroled. Tens of thousands of California boys, eighteen years ago, played "Evans and Sontag" every night after school, and more fights than you can imagine were generated over the question of who should have the privilege of playing the bandits and who should play the humble and inglorious roles of sheriff and posse. Chris Evans' jail break at Fresno, and his second flight and capture, made him the hero of every boy in California, and such he remained so long as he was haloed by the romantically grewsome sentence of "life imprisonment." But now that he is out, much as it no doubt pleases him, he becomes to us boys of yesterday only another prosaic "ex-con."

"San Francisco's bedchamber" has gone progressive! Alameda, the beautiful; Alameda, the churchly; Alameda, the city of homes, has nevertheless, till now, been a political rotten borough. But the other day it executed the political flip-flop and landed right side up with care on the white shores of progress. Mayor Noy this time played marbles with the Lincoln-Roosevelt leaguers, and they seem to have his taw and his best agates in hock for faithful performances in future. But rising over all and beaming on all humanity with the smile that won't come off, we behold the face of Leo. S. Robinson, to whom Mayor Noy ascribes his victory—Leo Robinson, whose cherubic face has taken on a few wrinkles, who has grown glasses and a bold spot in years of buffeting and defeat as a reformer in Alameda; Leo Robinson, who has been kicked, cuffed and collared a thousand times for daring to make faces at the machine; Leo Robinson, actually to come out on top of the heap, with colors flying and a neat little laurel toupee to hide the spot where the hair got tired of growing—really this must be the most discouraging moment in Leo's career. He has trained all his life to play the part of the irrepressible in defeat, and now to have all his training go for nothing by a signal victory—it's tough. He's not used to it, and will have to learn all over again.

New Nationalism and Business

By H. E. MILES

Chairman of the Executive Committe of the National Tariff Commission Association

Mr. Miles is a successful manufacturer, and as such a protectionist. He is apparently opposed to the abuse of the principle in which he believes.

As president of the National Association of Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers, he initiated the investigation of the tariff which led to the present popular understanding of the subject

A canvass of some 14,000 manufacturers indicated that 90 per cent of the manufacturers themselves are, like Mr. Miles, opposed to present tariff methods. This led to the agitation for honest and intelligent protection by the National Assoeiation of Manufacturers under the leadership of Mr. Miles as ehairman of its Tariff Commission.

Other organizations were interested, resulting in the formation of the National Tariff Commission Association, comprised of most of the leading commercial and industrial organizations of the country. Mr. Miles is ehairman of the exeeutive eommittee of this general association.

He was in close touch with Presidents Roosevelt and Taft from the heginning of his work. It was due to this movement that the Tariff Board was formed.

Beginning with the tariff Mr. Miles' efforts have broadened to cover similar national issues, and steps have heen taken in conjunction with representatives of other organizations, to eonstructively apply to our industrial fabric the best methods of such other countries as have surpassed us in national organization and long ago overcome difficulties that now harrass us.

Mr. Miles is the controlling owner of the Racine Sattley Co., makers of vehicles and agricultural implements. He resides in Racine, Wisconsin.

The following article is the gist of a speech delivered by Mr. Miles before the City Club of Los Angeles on Saturday last, the 15th inst., the subject being, "New Nationalism and business—things to be done."—Editor.)

America has been provincial. Each citizen has minded his own particular affairs. He has not minded the national affairs. And yet the national affairs are superlatively the supreme interest, necessarily, of every individual. I can illustrate best by going to the German situation. In 1870 there was no Germany. What is now Germany was a collection of petty States, full of jealousy, unorganized, suspicious. Germany looked up to us as at that time the most progressive of all the nations, and we were as sure then as we are now that we were the most progressive of all nations. Our eommon school system was at that time the wonder of the world.

Germany, having almost no advantages, and very limited natural resources, found that the only way she could come to a foremost position was by organization. Our own trusts have told us how wonderful are the accomplishments that may be gained through organization. Our trusts have shown us the way. But our trusts are organizations only of a few; a few looking out for each particular set, not looking out for the people as a whole.

I have no eriticisms to make. I have been in politics, as an outsider, as a business man looking after business interests. I have been so close to tariff measures and labor and other problems that I never wish to raise the moral issue. I can't define the moral question. If a mother goes away and leaves the baby with the eandy box, it is the mother who is to blame, not the baby. You and I have been utterly eareless of the national interests. The trusts have had to pay to prevent hostile legislation. Small wonder that they have learned that better than to organize against hostile legislation was to control all legislation and to take the affirmative part.

I don't blame them. But the time has come that muck-raking ought to give way to constructive propositions, and I am here in some hope that I can suggest the constructive proposition. I rejoice in the muck-raking that we have had and I don't eare whether it was well tempered. My pocket is full of figures, prepared by the men most competent to speak of all the men in the United States, and the muck-raker never overstated the general proposition.

Tariff Stories

Let me tell you of the cotton schedule by way of illustration.

I have a sample of the lining used in coats worn by men and put into suits that run from ten to thirty dollars per suit. This is mercerized. The rate on that lining used in the ten dollar workingman's suit was raised forty-two per cent.

I have a piece of black satin with me. President Taft inadvisedly made the statement that the only cottons that were raised in the Payne Bill were cottons of the values of silks, cottons that were luxuries. This piece of black satin that wholesales at eleven eents per running yard, was raised forty-eight per cent. Maybe it is a luxury, but it seems to me that the widow who must wear black and who must support her family at the washboard all week long ought to be able to have an eleven-cent cotton skirt for Sunday.

I have a piece of little white goods, such as is worn by girls at the heaches in the summer. This new bill raised that eighty per cent; in order that men of many millions might have more millions and the little girl whose father buys the skirt might have less pennies.

Plate Glass: In the Dingley Bill the man who is most responsible, the head of the plate glass interests of the United States, said to me: "I didn't have any trouble in getting my rate. I went to our representative, and my friend introduced me to a treasury expert and says, 'Fix this up with this gentleman; do the right thing.'" Well, he got a rate that runs from eighty to one hundred per cent. Within ninety days he raised his prices sixty-five per cent. He was called up before the industrial commission named by President Cleveland and he was asked why he raised his prices sixty-five per cent. He made the usual excuse, he had raised his wages. How much? Five per cent. The other sixty per cent went to the stockholders. A little later they gave another raise, until the raise was about one hundred per cent.

You have heard constantly that lots of goods come into the country if the tariff is low. After these men had raised the price a hundred per cent Gen. Lucus of Philadelphia, found that at this price he could import plate glass, which he did. But he got an order from the trust, reading: "Send us a memorandum of all the orders you have placed abroad, together with your engagement to order from us, or we will raise the price on things that you can't import." Lucus is a strong, capable man, self-reliant as anybody else. But he had to bow his head and send his memorandum and his agreement.

I told some of these stories to a representative in Congress and he said. "What is the use of telling me these things? Don't you think I know? We gave Senator So and So a tariff on borax worth to him and his associates $5,000,000 in money. They were no more entitled to it than I am to your watch; but we had to have his vote."

That is the way the tariffs have been made since you and I were boys. Now, gentlemen, who is to blame? I will place it on you, you are the guilty ones. You permitted it.

You gentlemen stand for a tariff eommission. You stand for a government hased upon facts. Ex-Senator Beveridge says that those who do not want a tariff commission to disclose the facts do not want the facts disclosed.

What applies to the tariff applies, of course, to other things. I went before two members of the Ways and Means Committee and said: "Why is the rate on har iron $8 a ton? Why isn't it $12? Why isn't it $4? Why is it $8?" Gen. Dalzell showed his teeth and turned his back on me and walked out of the room. The other man looked at me a moment, and then dropping his feet from the chair in front of his, hent forward and said: "Oh, Hell! Miles, if any constituent of mine wants anything, I get it for him and I get all I can and that's all there is to it."

John Wanamaker, Post Master General, said that the four great reasons against lower express rates were the four great express companies. That is organization and that is what it does for those who are organized.

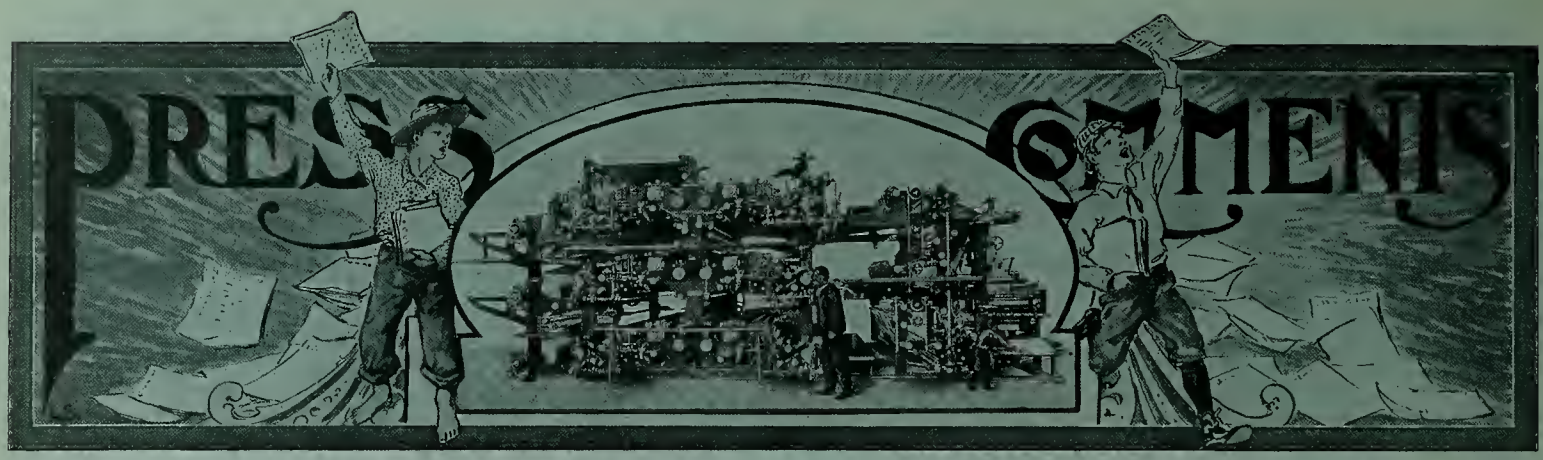
It is not a question of protection. The spell-binders were telling you five or six years ago that the whole question was protection or free trade, and I wonder how many here got past that proposition. We all voted protection and then we went to sleep. There was no question as to how much protection. I raised the issue that we were all protectionists and the only question was proteetion. Shall it be honest or dishonest? Shall it be reasonable and just or unreasonable and unjust? That is still the proposition and you here are standing for a commission that shall find out the facts, trusting that when the facts are spread equally before Congress, hefore the President and before the people, that Congress will legislate a just and fair tariff.

Organization in Germany

To go back to Germany. Every representative of a commercial or manufaeturing industry in Germany upon compulsion of the law is a member of the local organization. The local organizations are, upon eompulsion of the law, members of the State organizations—provincial organizations. The provincial organizations are members of the national or central organization. In that way Germany is organized industrially and commercially just as efficiently as she is organized in a military way. The seas stop her armies, but the whole round world is coming to pay tribute to her manufacturers, because they are so organized.

Central Organization Plan

Secretary of Commerce and Labor Nagel says that if we could only keep Los Angeles and Boston together through a central organization, he would give semi-official recognition to this great central body and would consider co-operation with that body in the development of his department and the service of commercial and industrial America as the supreme accomplishment of his administration. He thinks we should form a central body that will speak with understanding, conservatively and intelligently, of the needs of industrial America.



If Los Angeles wants a harbor, that may be considered and is considered by the vast number of our organizations as a local proposition. If Los Angeles is a member of the central body and briefs its proposition to the central body before any action is taken, and that brief is passed to all the constituent bodies, they find just how much reason there is in this proposition of yours. They may find, instead of a proposition that is local and for your particular interest, that it is a matter of tremendous national consequence; that it has to do with the control of the Pacific; with the development of the west coast of South America; with America's proper position before the world.

I am going to say just a word on reciprocity. That may seem irrelevant, but all of these great national propositions ought to be eleared by one of these great central bodies.

I don't like the word reciprocity. It has a bad flavor. We have worn it out. Germany calls them trade agreements. Germany had thirty-two men work five years in the preparation of her last tariff. Those thirty-two men consulted 2000 experts and in their five years considered exhaustively the entire domestie situation down to the last detail. She put her tariff—usually considered a very high tariff, though only one-fifth as high as ours—higher than she needed and then she went out and made these trade agreements with the countries of the world.

Germany long ago signified that if we would negotiate as she had negotiated with other countries she would reduce the tariff on bacon, as I remember, from 36 to 25 cents, or 35 to 26. Germany put her tariff on American goods high for the purpose of trading. We refused to trade. If we had, our meat wouldn't be bad in Germany. It is now kept out as unhealthy. It wouldn't be unhealthy

Study the Amendments

A special election has been called by the Legislature for October 10th to vote on twenty-one constitutional amendments. Ordinarily the people have nearly two years in which to study and digest the provisions of such amendments and the fact that the time is so limited in the present case makes it all the more important that voters at once begin the careful consideration of them. It is no light matter to change the fundamental law of the State and it should not be lightly treated. Every voter should procure copies of these amendments and peruse them diligently in order to vote on them intelligently.—San Mateo Times.

One Day's Work

Besides numerous minor bills, Governor Johnson signed on Saturday the following bills of major importance:

The employers' liability bill.
The conservation bill.
The direct primary bill.
The State highway bill.

This was just a part of one day's grist. Yet these four bills alone involve enough constructive legislation to have made any previous legislative session memorable, if it had done nothing else. In fact, we do not recall any Legislature since 1879 whose entire output equaled this one day's work.—Fresno Republican.

Woman Suffrage Will Win

Just as sure as election day comes woman suffrage will win. Whether it will be a blessing or not has yet to be proved. It hasn't done any harm in the states that have tried it. How much good it has done is a matter of dispute. But there is no denying the fact that the women of Washington who were recently given the right to vote have exercised that right with considerable unanimity and good results.—Colton Chronicle.

Kent Cuts Loose

Representative Kent, a leading Republican from California, is already out in a statement cutting loose from Mann. Kent will refuse to "obstruct." He says that he was sent there for a lower tariff and to legislate, not for the Republican party, but for the people, and will follow no one who, for mere partisan objects, seeks to check the relief that the people should have. —Cloverdale Reveille.

Railroad "Economy"—What Does It Mean?

The Southern Pacific has taken from its pay roll the names of 300 employes on the plea of economy. As this is the busiest time of the year and the rankest pessimist can see no evidence of a diminishing volume of business, it is not unfair to express the suspicion that this is done for political effect. If the action of this company finds no imitators, railroad employes and the country in general will have cause for thankfulness. There may be a disposition upon the part of certain railroad magnates to give the country an "object lesson" in the hope of deterring the government from pushing any further its plans for the regulation of rates and the general supervision of railroads. Concerted action of this nature on the part of the railroads would be followed by very serious commercial disturbances, the immediate effect of which might possibly be a temporary victory for the corporation, but the ultimate result would not be in their favor, for it would give additional impetus to the idea of government ownership of railroads, a principle which is not now favored by a majority of citizens, but which would gain popularity very rapidly if the people were convinced of a conspiracy among the transportation companies.—Glendale News.

One Cent a Day Would Relieve Starving Chinese

The condition of the people in the famine districts of China, where it is said 3,000,000 are slowly dying of cold and hunger, is enough to arouse the pity of the stoniest heart. The earliest harvest that will give relief cannot be expected before June, and in the meantime thousands of these starving wretches will have died.

Their situation seems all the more pitiable when it is considered that a single cent will buy enough food to sustain each sufferer one day. For a dollar the hunger of 100 persons may be appeased.

A contribution of two cents a day by the 90,000,000 people of the United States, or of one dollar each from 1,800,000 of them, would tide over the foodless Chinese for two months.

Of course, it is impossible to collect sums like this, but what a blessing it would be if it could be done! The Red Cross has done what it could, with its comparatively slender purse, to send shiploads of supplies to China, although these could not go very far when millions feel the cravings of hunger.

All of which argues for more generous giving to the Red Cross by individuals, and the endowment of its work by the Government.—Sacramento Bee.

Here's Encouraging Reports

Since the steel company laid off a few thousand employes, since the high cost of living rebellion dwindled to apathy, since the last reports of 5,000,000 starving peasants in China, and since the formal burial of the 144 shirt-waist-factory girls in New York, no such cheering word has come out of Washington, D. C., as that contained in the gratifying assurances that at last the United States is actively preparing an enormous palace in which adequately and fittingly to entertain royalty. It was the nation's disgrace that heretofore, and even down to this day—(for the buildings are not yet completed)—the nation has had no suitable palace in which royal ambassadors and visitors might be entertained with that degree of pomp and luxuriousness to which their highnesses from infancy have been accustomed.—Los Angeles Graphic.

Story About a Jam Pot

Once upon a time a great, roguish boy, a boy who, by his get-up and selection of playfellows, was known as a pretty tough kid, came out of his mother's pantry with his face all smeared with jam. His father saw him and said: "Willie, you've been stealing and eating jam. I'll lick you."

"No, father," replied Willie, with tears of injured innocence washing canals through the jam on his cheeks, "I haven't seen any jam, smelt any jam, eaten any jam. There may be jam on me but I am innocent of all knowledge of it."

On their way to the woodshed, they met some of Willie's playfellows, whom Willie's father questioned. Some of them said that Willie hadn't had any jam. Some of them said they'd boosted Willie up to the pantry shelf where the jam was. And others said they had seen the jam put into the pot, and it wasn't there now.

But Willie protested that he hadn't known of the jam pot, and he solemnly swore that if he was covered with jam, he didn't know how it got on him. This put his father in some doubt, and so he called on some friends of his to decide. "There's no question," explained he, "but that there was jam in the pot. It's gone. You see that Willie is covered with jam. Is he guilty of knowing anything about that jam?"

Now these people decided that it was not proven that Willie took the jam. Moreover, that if some one else stole the jam and put it on Willie without his knowing it, he was blameless, and indeed, if Willie even knew that it was stolen jam, he was entitled to the jam that was on him.

As they stood there discussing big moral issues like that, a large policeman, named Bob La Follette, came along. "Ha!" he said, "a case of jam-stealing has been reported and there's that Willie Lorimer covered with jam. Come along, Willie!" So he took Willie. And if you watch the U. S. Senate closely, you'll see the conclusion of this little story about a jam pot, for several likely people are going to swear that they saw the jam put into that pot and there certainly is jam on Willie.—San Diego Sun.

State [illegible] have been Frank Leavitt just as well." Which reminds The Watchman of the lone Democratic presidential elector who, some [illegible] years ago, being at the head of the Democratic list, got a few more votes than the candidate at the tail of the opposing delegation. Nothing could convince him that it was not his own personal popularity in a State that had never before heard of him that pulled him through, whereas it was only his position on the ballot and a cigar store Indian would have run as well. It was important to beat Frank Leavitt, one of the most forceful, capable legislators California ever had and with a tremendous hold on a district that, theretofore, had valued the crumbs that fell from the racing table above all considerations of public welfare and private morality. It seemed to The Watchman that no one less strong than the strongest decent man in the district could hope to win against the wrong-headed but effective Leavitt and he felt it almost the duty of former Governor Pardee to throw himself into the breach. When, therefore, a David from the office of Mayor Mott, without extended reputation or legislative experience, went out against the Goliath of the race track, and other special interests, The Watchman threw up his hands. He said little for Tyrrell, it is true, because he knew little that he could say for him, but he said all he knew how to say against the candidacy of Leavitt, and there was no more astonished person in the Bay district than was The Watchman when the returns told of the defeat of Leavitt. He was still convinced that it was not, could not have been, Tyrrell who did it and that a cigar store Indian could have done it as well, and, with apologies to Senator Tyrrell, is of the same opinion still. There is just one man in that district more powerful than Frank Leavitt. That man is County Treasurer Kelly who has held the district in control for a generation. For some reason to himself best known, Kelly went out against Leavitt and when he did Leavitt knew that his jig was up, for Kelly could elect a cigar store Indian to anything in that district. However, Senator Edwin J. Tyrrell has proved himself worth many cigar store Indians in the upper house, upon which The Watchman desires to congratulate him. If it was not his own popularity that elected him the first time it may be the next. He appears to have acquitted himself exceedingly well.

Sorrows of Power Notwithstanding that the Governor of California is a "bully fighter," and is ever ready to "go to it" man fashion for a cause that he believes to be just, he is, at bottom, sympathetic and his sympathics are easily touched. Those of us who pushed the race for nomination upon him know how little of personal ambition there was in his make-up and how indispensable it was to our cause not only to convince him that the path of his own high duty lay in that direction but that our own disinterestedness was of as high an order as his, and that we were as ready to make sacrifices as we were to call upon him to make them. Those who know Hiram Johnson well enough to get a bit of an interior view into his character and those only, may be able to understand with what anguish of spirit it dawned upon him, when once in office, that not a few of his most active supporters had singled out for themselves fine bits of official pabulum far in advance and felt that they ought to have it merely because they wanted it as well as because of their distinguished services to "the cause." He was hurt by this importunity something as Rudolph Spreckels was hurt in the case of "his workingman." He had met him somehow and had been much impressed by his candor, independence and disposition to meet the millionaire without servility or cringing and Mr. Spreckels took great pleasure in his acquaintance, but one day he went home sick at heart. "His Workingman" had "struck him for a house and lot." Of course not all who worked enthusiastically for the election of Mr. Johnson have clamored for office, or any considerable part of them, but there have been more instances than there should have been wherein zeal for reform was manifestly accentuated by hope of office, and some have hurt their own chances by their persistency. Governor Johnson is looking for those who will serve the State, not exploit it.

Not Easy to Hang Men Governor Johnson will be no jail deliverer, but it will not be easy for him to send men to the gallows. Only the sternest demands of justice will nerve him to that. I notice that he has reprieved Louis Augustine, the Indian boy convicted in Lake County of murdering the sheriff. The Governor will hear whatever can be said for the lad before determining his fate, for he is only eighteen years old. Not all lawyers, executives or judges are penologists or have clear ideas as to responsibility for crime. The Watchman is not sure how well the Governor is equipped in that particular and, therefore, is going to venture a few observations on the subject anent young Augustine. The desperate age of a criminal's life is from seventeen to twenty-one or twenty-two years. At that period the propensities are as compelling as ever they will be, but the judgment has not been formed and, with the coming of judgment, even the criminal comes to know that there are crimes that it will not be profitable to commit, chances that it will not do to take, atrocities that cannot be justified even by a criminal standard of conduct. Tide the young criminal over to his years of discretion and he may cease to be a criminal at all and, at all events if he remains in the criminal class he is likely to be a criminal of milder type. This is not true of the congenital degenerate. Nothing can be hoped for from him. No other sort should be hanged unless it be after he shall have matured in crime and become a murderer by deliberate preference rather than by youthful impulse. Into which category young Augustine falls The Watchman does not know.

Anti-Socialist Labor Party The announcement, a week since, that Theodore Roosevelt is to head a national anti-Socialist Labor party, is to be classed with the dreams that do not come true. Colonel Roosevelt is anti-Socialist, and he is in sympathy with those who labor, but not with any labor or other party that accentuates class consciousness or gives color to the spirit of class legislation. With many millions of others he favors things that are socialistic, but not Socialism. And yet Socialism may come. Those who would know when and how should ask the interests generally and especially those interests which undertake public utilities in our cities. They would seem to be fetching it right along.

The Oakland Situation The usefulness of a Socialist party is not unlikely to have a new demonstration after this week in Oakland. As this is being written it would seem that the renomination of Mayor Mott is a certainty and his election all over but the shouting, and yet the Socialist party will, in Oakland as in Berkeley, receive a heavy non-Socialist vote. It will come mainly from those who do not favor Mott and yet can hardly hope to beat him. They protest, by voting the Socialist ticket, much as the small boy, who cannot whip his playfellow, takes out the grudge in making faces at his sister. It is so all over the world. The great Socialist vote of Germany and France is, at bottom, a protest against existing conditions and not a downright espousal of the Socialist cause or an evidence of belief in its philosophies. Not a few will vote the Socialist ticket for no better reason than that some very excellent officials, such as Engineer Turner, for instance, have been a long time in the city hall. Such persons are not Socialists. They are idiots.

Wrong Appointments Still Being Made All through the Roosevelt administration Federal appointments in California were almost invariably made from among the number of those who were hostile to Roosevelt and to his policies, and it is apparent that the old crowd still has the Federal appointive power in this State although heartily discredited within the State, else why should T. G. Daniels, of Alameda, have been reappointed register of the San Francisco land office? Daniels has a pleasing address and, personally, is thoroughly likeable, but he has been a courtier in the House of Herrin ever since Mr. Herrin discovered himself, and was never known to be disobedient to the call of the Southern Pacific. Moreover, his paper, the Alameda Argus, has been on the wrong side of every right issue since the memory of man. Tradition says that he was induced to settle in Alameda that he might make effective opposition to the free and independent efforts of that pioneer of insurgent journalism, old Father Krauth, now many years dead, but not forgotten by those who love good fighters for Right Things. Mr. Daniels' Argus persistently maligned and fought the graft prosecutions. In short he is emphatically on the wrong side of the house to be persona grata at the counsel chamber of the President. His appointment was not fit to be made and efforts should be put forth to unmake it. Doubtless Perkins and Knowland are the responsible parties, but why should the President longer listen to them, unless, indeed, he approves of the standpatters and is himself probably opposed to nearly all the good things that he publicly champions, an untenable and unthinkable presumption?

Alameda Mending The little city of Alameda, a delightful place of residence for those who love tranquility rather than the strenuous, has been politically benighted for many a year. A group of corrupt politicians has made of that city a nucleus by means of which the interests of the Southern Pacific Company and the court house ring have been much furthered to the cost of the common good. This was not because Alamedans are bad people, but rather because they are San Francisco people who suffer a few bad Alamedans to work their political wills without hindrance. During the last four years it has been difficult for the Progressives to awaken any interest in better things in Alameda and their candidates have pretty uniformly gone down to defeat. But there are evidences that Alameda is mending its ways. W. H. Noy, a good man whom the Progressives forced the other side to put up for mayor two years ago, has made good, so good that the Progressives took him up and re-elected him by a handsome majority. Alfred L. Morgenstern, whom the "organization" defeated for the Assembly, at the cost of having to put up a very good man to do it, has just been elected councilman-at-large with more than 800 votes to spare. A better political feeling is generally recognized in Alameda and the hope is entertained that not for much longer will that city surrender its good opinion of itself into the keeping of men who have no ambitions higher than to get their hands into the county treasury and to do the will of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. With political moralities to match climate and location Alameda should be an Elysium for the living if not for the dead.

Shall California Be Municipally Governed? Time was when metropolitan cities cried out to the commonwealths in which they were situated to save them from themselves and, that the states might be able to do it, excess of representation to country districts was conceded in legislatures and conventions. In Connecticut this tendency has gone to the ridiculous extreme of allowing small towns the same representation that large towns have, especially in the State Senate, and everywhere to the extent of allowing the back country a preponderating vote. Time was when San Francisco was the undisputed elephant with one tail to the north and the other to the south, both of which the bay city could wag at will. The condition became so intolerable that conventions refused to permit the late Frank Pixley, et al., to appear as delegate from Modoc county or Billy Foote from Sierra. Proxies had to be limited to county residents. Even then, by combining the "push" votes of San Francisco with those of Los Angeles, Sacramento, Alameda and Santa Clara, the San Francisco political hierarchy could control the state conventions if not the legislatures. Now that conventions no longer nominate attention is directed to control of the Legislature. Under a mathematically exact ratio of representation, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Alameda counties, pooling their issues with either Sacramento or Santa Clara, can control the Legislature by downright majority vote in both houses, thereby making the state municipally governed instead of the municipalities being state governed. Can this be good for either the municipalities or the state? We shall have nearly a year to think this over and it stands us in hand to do some right hard thinking on it. Never mind the logic of it. Look to the probable effect.

Passes for free transportation issued by the Long Island Railroad now contain the provision that holders must surrender their seats to paying passengers on crowded trains. It is a sorrowful loss of prestige since the days when a man traveling on a pass enjoyed superior privileges over passengers for revenue only.—New York World.

Governor Johnson Exposes Wells-Fargo Extortion

In order that the people may intelligently understand the express rate hearings which will be held by the State Railroad Commission in the near future, Governor Johnson has issued a statement, setting forth the conditions which exist in this State in regard to express rates and showing the discrimination made by the Wells-Fargo Company against the merchants of California. He says:

"It is the purpose of the administration to advise the people of each successive step in the impending contest, and by the widest publicity, through the untrammeled press, to endeavor to create a healthy interest in the affairs that concern all the people. Thus, it is hoped, justice may be done; and beyond this, that all the people shall participate in real governmental accomplishment."

This Striking Fact

The figures gathered by the governor's office relative to express rates show this striking fact:

Merchants in New York can send small packages to San Francisco, for instance, practically as cheap as can Los Angeles merchants. And Los Angeles people have to pay as much for a four-pound package from San Francisco as for the same package from New York.

In other words, express rates within the State of California are excessive.

On one pound, New York to San Francisco the rate is 35 cents. It is the same between Los Angeles and San Francisco.

On three pounds the rate is 45 cents in both instances, and on four pounds it is 60 cents. On one-pound and six-pound packages, the rates between Los Angeles and San Francisco are just a shade lower than those from New York, many times the distance.

Commenting on this, a statement from the Governor's office says:

No Reason for Difference

"That shippers in San Francisco and Los Angeles, particularly those in the dry goods business, who are required to transmit a large portion of their outside sales in small packages, must pay for transmission within the state practically the same price that the merchants in New York can, by the same means of transportation, lay down the same article in the state of California. We would not by any means discriminate against New York merchants, but that in California we should discriminate against the California merchant seems intolerable.

"The comparison of the rates charged by Wells Fargo & Co. within the state of California with the rates charged by the same company in other states for like distances, say for approximately 150 miles, over similar territory, with similar conditions, shows the rates outside of California to be per hundred pounds from $1 to $1.25, approximately, while in California the rate is approximately from $1.40 to $2.75. So far as we have been able to discover no reason whatever exists for the difference.

"A comparison of the charges made by other express companies transacting business outside of the state of California with the charges made by Wells Fargo & Co. within this state, for like distances, under similar conditions, shows that the charges of Wells Fargo & Co. in California are very much higher than those of any other company in any other state.

Paying Unjust Tribute

"These charges, if unjust, mean what? Simply that the ordinary individual in the state of California is paying tribute which he ought not to be required to pay, and that because of the exaction of this tribute, the cost of living with us is higher than it should be. By an unjust exaction or extortion, every citizen of the state is touched. If in business, his business is made just so much more expensive to conduct. If only a consumer, it costs him just so much more to live. Every class, therefore, is interested in fixing just rates for the transportation of commodities and necessities, and the railroad commission of the state of California, as it is now constituted, will do equal and exact justice between the express and transportation companies on the one hand and the people on the other. There is no other design with them, nor with anybody connected with the government of the state, to do anything else than accord an absolutely square deal to all, and these investigations are being made for the purpose of ascertaining whether in the past and in the present a square deal is being given both sides—the people as well as the express and transportation companies.

Who Pays the Dividends?

"It may be interesting to note that December 23, 1909, the capital stock of Wells Fargo & Co. was increased from $8,000,000 to $24,000,000; that in 1909 a semi-annual dividend of 5 per cent was declared by Wells Fargo & Co. upon the old capitalization of $8,000,000, and on Dec. 23, 1909, a special dividend from the accumulated profits and investments of the company from the time of its organization to that date was declared of 300 per cent. In June, 1910, a dividend of 5 per cent was declared upon the capital stock outstanding of $23,967,460. The total amount declared in dividends, regular and special, during that year, was $25,598,000.

"To the people of the state of California, without comment, the query is made: Who pays these tremendous and extraordinary dividends?"

DRAMATIC CHIT CHAT

Sarah Bernhardt is in Los Angeles this week showing the curious how well a vigorous old lady can act at the age of nearly seventy years. The curious have been quite willing to pay three dollars each to satisfy their curiosity—nay, several thousand of them were so much more than merely willing that they stood in line on the street, many of them for ten or twelve hours, to buy seats.

Ticket speculators, strange parasites on society, unhampered by the police, managed as usual to get the pick of the seats and subsequently did a thriving business.

The charge of three dollars for admission to Bernhardt's performances shows up another angle of the high cost of living situation. There is a popular notion that theatrical performances come under the head of luxuries, and possibly they do, but they ought not to, for if the theater were discharging its proper function plays would be recognized as a proper means of education and theater-going would be considered as much an adult's duty as going to school is a child's.

In the last few years the price of entertainment has been steadily advancing. There was a time when people felt that theatrical managers were imposing on them because, when a well advertised attraction arrived in town, prices were boosted from one dollar to a dollar and a half for the occasion. Now the dollar and a half charge is the rule and any play that comes with a reputation for being ordinarily amusing or entertaining or instructive is charged for at the two-dollar rate.

There are many prosperous people who do not object to paying two dollars for an evening's entertainment but when they pay the price to see an inferior company equipped with a cheap production presenting a Broadway success it is only natural that they should feel robbed. This often happens because of the growing practice of sending out a second alleged "duplicate" company with an eastern success and following this with a third and a fourth and sometimes even a seventh or eighth. All of the imitation companies, consistng of cheap out-of-work players, carryng badly painted scenery and tawdry costumes, command the same high prices as the original company.

An illustration of the fact that the public resents the unjustly high prices came to light in Los Angeles a few weeks ago when Feruccio Busoni, the celebrated Italian pianist, made his first public appearance in Los Angeles. Because he was a novelty and because they thought they could "get away with it," the management raised the customary two-dollar rate fifty cents. The result was that when Busoni played, on two different evenings, nearly all the high priced seats were empty and the only section of the auditorium that was filled was the balcony.

the day after we signified a willingness to trade.

So the whole world is open to America for a wonderful trading proposition. We don't get those things because our people are not organized. The average man is unrepresented and unorganized. We want to clear these things through that central organization, and I am sure I am right in saying that the administration and the Congress of the United States want this central organization as much as we want it and as much as we need it. When the Congressman gets that sort of a backing, the backing of that sort of an organization, he will be a different sort of a Congressman.

Germany is very marvelous in her insistence upon national efficiency. I believe that our labor problem is going to be solved largely when we give the laboring man his due, as I might state it, his due in the matter of organization and efficiency.

Germany takes care of her laboring man. If a workman is hurt, you know what we do in America. We give him $50 and turn him loose. We haven't known any better. I am an employer and know that no such wrong should be done as to charge the American employer with anything but the best intent. He hasn't been up to the subject or to the proposition. In Germany, through their system of industrial education when a workingman is injured, the employer goes arm in arm with the workingman to a mutual insurance company, to which, by compulsion of law, the employer has been contributing. He says to that central organization, "This man is hurt; his efficiency is lessened. By compulsion of law and by free will, because I like it, I have been contributing all these years to this mutual accident insurance company. I want this man to get the maximum of his desert."

I believe those problems will be worked out in this country by this central organization. I wish to place no superlative emphasis on the value of that organization as such, but that organization is going to show to the American people what must be done unless we are going to drop away behind.

The tariff is going to be lowered greatly. Then more goods will come in and go out. Americans can be as efficient as any other nation in the world but today we are not. We have accidentally developed our resources. Experts tell us that of every bushel of wheat carried abroad 27 cents of it is phosphorus; that of every pound of cotton three cents is phosphorus. We have been capitalizing our soil values until today the so-called worn out farms of Europe yield twice the produce that our relatively virgin soil does. We have been only a huge stevedore bearing down to the ships of the sea the crude and semi-crude products of the farm and so forth, only far enough developed to be fit for ship's cargo.

We have been selling our resources. Germany is selling her brains. We have got to develop our efficiency until we ship abroad a thousand times more of brains and a great deal less of raw material.

We ship abroad cotton at fourteen cents a pound. We buy it back from the more intelligent Swiss at forty dollars a point in fine handkerchiefs. It doesn't take brains to ship raw materials. The manufacturers of the world have to come here and get the raw materials. We must have an entirely different organization, an entirely different national system, before we can open up the markets of foreign nations, until they take the typewriter and the dynamo instead of the bar iron and the chunk of copper.

Other countries that haven't our large resources have gone infinitely beyond us in the development of the common weal, but we have been asleep. Asleep on the Dingley Bill. Asleep when our public franchises were given away. We have been working our own little orange groves or in our own little factories. Now we have gotten waked up but that's only the first step. You can go on muck-raking until the end of time and little will come of it until you follow it with the constructive work. And the organizations of America and her people as a whole are coming to see it.

Strenuous and Resourceful

Strenuous and resourceful, Governor Johnson has turned from inspiring law making to law enforcement. His remarkable and convincing arraignment of Wells-Fargo rates, as being discriminatory against Californians and excessive beyond all legitimate business rules, is an interest gripping move. It indicates a line of work through commissions and State agencies under executive control never before undertaken by a California Executive.—Stockton Record.

THE MAN FOR THE JOB

JAMES ROLPH, JR.

I am not a politician, and my natural inclination is to say, "No," emphatically in response to your committee's request to consent to the submission of my name at the coming primary election to the citizens of this community as a candidate for nomination for the office of Mayor of the city of my birth and home. . . .

I am not indifferent to the opinion of my neighbors. I do feel proud at the thought that my fellow citizens think well of me, and I have not the courage to face the criticism that I cannot heed the call of public duty on account of the pressure of private and personal interests.

I seriously doubt that I merit the good opinion and expectations of your committee, but if the conference, comprising representative men of this community insist that I have a part to play at this important stage of the history of our city I feel it my duty to bow to its judgment, and to do what is in my power for the good of the city. . . . From James Rolph Jr.'s letter of acceptance as candidate for Mayor of San Francisco.

Score for Alexander

WHETHER or not the men brought to this state from Indianapolis are guilty, there is ample justification in the evidence found on the premises and in the confession of one of the group for their arrest and trial. Without prejudging these men, their capture must be recognized as a triumph of the skill and energy and persistence of Burns, the greatest living American detective.

How did Burns come to be placed in charge of the case? He was appointed by Mayor Alexander of Los Angeles with the advice and co-operation of Meyer Lissner and other Good Government leaders. This was done in the face of a furious protest from the owners of the Times, who had for years abused and insulted Burns because of his activity in bringing the San Francisco higher-up grafters to justice. The Times claimed the right, because it was the owner of the property that was destroyed, to say how the city should use its fund for bringing the malefactors to justice. From that day to this, the Times has never ceased to sneer at Burns and condemn the city for appointing him.

It is a very distinct triumph for Mayor Alexander and the Good Government administration. But no acknowledgement of that fact nor of its own mistake will ever appear in the Times. While it hates union workmen a good deal, it hates good government and honest men in office still more.

How to Avoid a Tornado

INSTRUCTIONS from "Old Probabilities" sent out to the people of the Middle West are, in substance, to this effect: "When you see a cloud in the Southwest acting leery, with tail twisting as if about to charge, step to the northwest or southeast and step lively or it will get you, but if you will move with sufficient celerity at right angles to a catawamus southwest and northeast direction you will be as safe as as though in Abraham's bosom, unless the durn thing throws a house or corn crib at you just to get it out of its way." Another preventive measure is to build a cyclone retreat, crawl into it and stay there from April to August. Or, better still, come to California where such things do not happen.

Joy Go With Him

RELIEVED of cares of state, as he has not been before for near two decades, Mr. William F. Herrin finds himself free to go to Europe for a four months' vacation motoring. May joy go with him! California will get on so well without him as to surprise even William F. Herrin himself. Already it has made more real progress in legislation and government in four months than it had made during the two hundred months of his domination. California has no other citizen whom it will so willingly spare or for whose safe return it will look forward with less of anxiety. Good luck go with him and bid him take his time!

Snobbery in Uniform and Out

WITH MUCH JUSTICE officers of our Army and Navy have complained that their uniforms afforded them no entre to exclusive circles but that if they would with the smart set mingle, they had to don civilian clothes and drop their titles. And yet it is from Annapolis that complaint comes that a young woman was humiliated, and her escort tabooed, for daring to introduce her upon the academy dancing floor, all because she was a governess in a private family. As long as there is snobbery under the uniform there is likely to be snobbery outside the uniform. Secretary Meyer never did any handsomer thing than to require apology to be made to Miss Beers for the slight put upon her. Thus purged of the thing they contemn, wearers of the blue will be in better plight to command that respect be shown the uniforms they wear and the service to which they belong.

Somewhat Blameworthy

THE STUPID agents of the Department of Justice at Washington, who haled the Bath Tub trust into inquisition because of the unfounded suspicion that the gentlemen composing it might have formed it for purposes of exploitation, must now retire in confusion inasmuch as the members of the trust, one and all, being duly sworn, deposed and said that their purpose in severally signing the trust agreement was to insure the consumer good goods at conservative prices and other object had they none. Still we must hold these benevolent gentlemen somewhat blameworthy in that they did not, in their agreed prices, manifest a more lively interest in the great unwashed, now aspiring to hold anew the reins of government. This overlook may prove disastrous.

Our Men Over the Border

WITH SOME TRUTH Diaz has complained that American citizens have given aid and comfort to the Mexican insurrectionists over the border. Some of them are dead, some are wounded and some are in prison. Perhaps love of adventure inspired some, but may we not cherish the hope that not a few of those who have bravely dared and done did so because of that inextinguishable love of liberty and equality and hatred of tyranny that has made democracy in the United States possible and without which we should still be living under some pre-revolutionary aristocracy of the North or patriarchal first families of the South? Let us be thankful that, despite our dollar-loving age, there are still Americans who can die for liberty and not alone for their own.

Let Us Keep Our Heads

THE TRAILING of the Times dynamiters, if the event shall prove it to have been done, will go down into history as a masterpiece of detective acumen and skill, but let us not, as a people, put our dependence in sleuths. Unhappy Russia has demonstrated its inability to establish social peace or contentment by espionage. Our civilization, if it is to endure, must have a more stable basis than that.

Above all, during the trying weeks, perhaps months, that are to come, let the men of Los Angeles, yes, of all California, to keep their heads, guard their speech, yet uphold justice with firmness. Let us try, if we may, to come to understand what the trouble is all about.

For centuries men have struggled for liberty to join with their fellows in the making and maintaining of self-government and the struggle is still going on, with terrorism in Russia and Turkey, in Mexico and China; with rioting in France and "demonstrations" in England; in America with insurgings and party disintegration—through all times and climes, among all peoples, raising up fanatics whose tempestuous zeal keeps them ever upon the border land of criminality. In fact, the John Browns and the Mazzinis of history are by some exalted as patriots and by others contemned as criminals. Blood flowed where they walked.

From desiring civil liberty and union with their fellows they that labor have come to desire industrial liberty and union with their fellows for the advancement of their common welfare. As their fathers, throughout generations gone, were confronted with the doctrine of the divine right of kingly authority, or the authority of some constitutional aristocracy or oligarchy, so now the leaders of industrial democracy are withstood by the demand on the part of the employer of his unqualified right to "run his own business in his own way." It is the old, age-long controversy between those whom long established custom has endued with power and those who, by ties of brotherhood, would dethrone that power and take it unto themselves. Throughout all the ages of which history tells us anything, that conflict has begotten fanaticism and that fanaticism crime until men and women have lifted their wringing hands to heaven and, in an agony of despair, have exclaimed, "O Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!"

This city of Los Angeles, and this State of California, among other cities and other states, now has to deal with one of these atrocities of fanaticism, bloody, piteous, horrible. Let us, during the ordeal, comport ourselves like twentieth century Men. Let us not be of the number of those primitive peoples whom twenty centuries of Christianizing influences have still left pagan in instinct and philosophy, holding that there must be an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life, and that exemplary vengeance is the remedy for fanatical atrocity. It is not and never was. The only remedy, the only palliative even, that ever was applied successfully, was justice, even-handed, unimpassioned, lawful justice; justice so obvious that even the condemned, hanging upon the cross, shall turn to his fellow and confess: "We receive but the due reward of our deeds."

Let, therefore, the trials of these accused men proceed by due process of law rather than by newspaper but, if it be possible, without that breaking down of the machinery of justice and demoralization of the community life which brought the graft prosecutions in San Francisco to naught, or next to naught, compared with the requirements of justice. Justice, soberly administered, disarms, while vengeance, meted out in wrath, raises up a hundred criminal fanatics where there was one before and leaves our last state worse than our first. In short, the supreme need of the hour is for us all to keep our heads in rational control of all that we do and say and publish.

And suffer us not to be blind to the crucial fact that democracy in industry is as everlastingly right and feasible, and sure to come, as democracy in government; that it is so grounded in the eternal verities that not even the excesses and criminalities of its own adherents can so crush it that it will not rise again.

The Struggle of Realignment

"THEY are not all free," says the German philosopher-poet, Lessing, "who scoff at chains." The American people desire to be free; they do not as a whole, or in any appreciable fraction, wish to have their affairs controlled by the selfish interests that have of late dominated in state, nation and city. The problem, on the face of it, seems simple enough; to put men into office that will truly represent the people, and hold them to a line of policy that will destroy privilege in our government and exalt human rights. But it is in reality a laborious and difficult undertaking, a thing surrounded by mischance, discouragement and error.

The two greatest obstacles in the way of this desired change are the very two pieces of machinery that must be used in bringing it to pass, to wit, the Republican and Democratic parties. If a vote could be taken on national issues at the present time, it would probably show that the strength of these two organizations is about equal. But while the people are thus divided longitudinally by the line of party, they are again divided latitudinally by a line of much deeper significance, that of real political conviction; and something more than half wishes to go ahead toward the goal of equal opportunity for all, and something less than half hangs back, either from fear or conservatism or from self-interest.

Now here is an anomalous situation, the like of which never before existed in the political history of the country. There was some approach to it in the decade before the Civil War, when the Whig party went to pieces, and the Republican party succeeded to its place. But there is no sign here yet of party disintegration through defeat. The problem is not going to be worked out by the total collapse of either one or the other, or at least present conditions do not point to that outcome. What seems most probable is that each party will fight to a finish within its own ranks on the question of whether it is to be progressive or reactionary, and that in the meantime, and until this is settled, we are to have political chaos.

When we consider what the progressive movement stands for—a rule by the people, equal opportunity, prosperity on the broadest possible base, the overthrow of privilege, and human rights above property rights—it is perfectly clear that this movement must ultimately triumph, and it is more than probable that even now a majority of the members of both parties greatly prefer it to the opposing policy. Theoretically, a majority rules in party government, but in actual practice a determined and capable minority in possession of the works can hold out for a long time against superior numbers. Moreover, when each faction is so thoroughly in earnest in the fight that it would rather risk defeat as a party than surrender its principles, you have exactly the kind of a situation that must grow a good deal worse before it can be bettered.

Because the Republican party was in power and running the government, the lightning-bolt of the newly awakened public sentiment struck it first and laid it open from stem to stern. The same fate is awaiting the Democrats when they enter upon real responsibility. This is not the kind of party division with which we have been familiar in the past, not a quarrel between the adherents of Blaine and those of Conkling, or a disagreement over a gold standard or bimetalism, or over a third term for Grant, or the extension of slavery to the territories. Those simple souls who have it figured out that giving the insurgents a few postoffices and a little more prominence on committees will restore "harmony," and that everything would be all right in the party if a good compromise could be worked out, had better pick up their knitting and teacups and retire to a safe distance, for there is a large-sized row going to be pulled off right in the foreground by a lot of people who have sense enough to be in dead earnest when big issues are at stake.

We do not know whether the ultimate progressive party will go by the name Republican or Democrat, but we do know that it will contain all voters of the progressive stamp, because the men who believe in the people's rule and in human rights above property rights care a great deal more for those principles than they do for any stamp of party regularity. The other party, whatever its name, is bound in the long run to gather in all those whose self-interest makes them cling to institutions of privilege or who are terrified at the radical character of the proposed changes—for there is no denying that they are radical. We are disposed to envy the optimists who think this readjustment is a simple matter to be accomplished within a year or two and with good feeling all around. That would be just as agreeable as it is improbable. What is really going to happen is a long, grim, determined struggle, with many ups and downs on both sides, with times of brave hopes and of deadly discouragements, possibly also with panics and periods of depression—a terrible period of storm and stress or, as the Germans say, "Sturm und Drang." And it is just as well that those who are enlisting for the war should recognize what they are facing.

Senate Amendment 49

THIS PROPOSED AMENDMENT of the Constitution of California relates to Sec. 19, of Article XI, already once revised by a vote of the people on November 4, 1884, rather injuriously as it would seem in the light of experience. The constitution as it was when adopted in 1879 prohibited the making of improvements at the expense of abutting property owners until estimates had been made, the cost apportioned with regard to benefits received, levy made, and the money collected and paid into the city treasury to be used for that purpose,—all before the work was commenced. These provisions were cut out in order to make the way clear for the Vrooman law whereby the work is done first and the cost collected afterwards, if it can be, the contractor taking all the risks of failure to collect and, on an average, charging something like twenty-five per cent more than a reasonable price for the work in order that the risk of non-collection may be amply covered. So we see that there is no divinity to prevent, "We, the People," making our constitution worse instead of better by amendment if we set our heads that way.

However, that danger does not beset us this time inasmuch as Senate Amendment 49 proposes to give municipalities specific constitutional powers that they now have only impliedly under Sec. 11 which provides, "That any county, city, town or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." The growth of free government and the municipal spirit are requiring that municipalities be given all the powers to do business that individuals and private corporations enjoy and this proposed amendment is in furtherance of that general purpose.

The first sentence reads thus: "Any municipal corporation may establish and operate public works for supplying its inhabitants with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service or other means of communication." The enjoyment of these rights by municipalities too small to be accorded the right to form their own charters (3,500 inhabitants) has been doubted and the constitution has not plainly conferred the right upon cities of larger size, although such right has become pretty generally recognized and enjoyed. It is a good thing, though, to state the proposition roundly and fully and beyond all question. The sentence quoted seems to meet that requirement.

The next sentence reads, "Such works may be acquired by original construction or by the purchase of existing works, including their franchises or both." One could wish that a few words had been added specifying that purchase may be made either through open negotiation or by condemnation, although the power of condemnation is believed to come within the purview of legislative action. Still it would not have hurt to say so in the constitution.

The third sentence says: "Persons or corporations may establish and operate works for supplying the inhabitants with such services upon such conditions and under such regulations as the municipality may prescribe under its organic law, on the condition that the municipal government shall have the right to regulate the charges thereof." The words in black type insure that the people themselves, in the framing and adopting of the "organic law" of each city shall have the right, and must themselves exercise it, and not permit the conditions to be arranged by a city council, commission or board of trustees. This should make it inconvenient if not impossible for a public-service corporation to effect a jug-handle franchise with any city, unless that is the kind of a franchise that The People of a city wish to grant. This appears to be a prudent, although slow acting regulation, for the organic law of a city cannot be changed oftener than every two years and, even then, only by consent of the Legislature. There may be some chafing on account of this delay, but when we get in a hurry we make mistakes. Cities, as well as individuals, need to think things over.

Finally, the proposed amendment declares that, "A municipal corporation may furnish such services to inhabitants outside its boundaries; provided that it shall not furnish any service to the inhabitants of any other municipality owning or operating works supplying the same service to such inhabitants, without the consent of such other municipality, expressed by ordinance."

This is a valuable provision and, if the amendment be adopted, we shall see many suburban roads and contiguous "additions" lighted, supplied with water and other public conveniences to the mutual advantage of the city supplying and the community consuming the product municipally produced.

The amendment proposed is progressive and feasible and should be adopted.

Locking Up Capital

ONLY a year or two ago Los Angeles voted over three-quarters of a million dollars for school buildings, and another bond election is now about to be called for a million and a quarter more for the same purpose. No doubt these bonds will carry. The demand for money for the equipment of schools, when made in enterprising and progressive California cities, always meets with a hearty response. When the last vote was taken in Los Angeles, the need was so great, owing to the rapid growth of the city, that the sentiment in favor of the bonds was well-nigh unanimous. The only opposition came from the reactionary Times, and that was because the Superintendent of Schools had refused to kow-tow to that paper's proprietor on a memorable occasion.

But while good citizens stand ready to put their hands into their pockets every time school buildings are demanded, is it not well to consider the application of the new doctrine of efficiency to the amount of capital that is locked up in school sites and buildings? Under present arrangements the schools work only six or seven hours out of the 24, whereas they have a possible range of usefulness extending through 15 hours. There are examples of manufacturing enterprises that have pulled themselves out of bankruptcy into prosperity by running two shifts of men eight hours each rather than one at nine hours. It is supposed to be a distressing thing when a school district is so overcrowded that the school must be run with a double shift of teachers in two sessions, and yet if buildings were planned with that purpose in view, might it not, on the whole, be of advantage to teachers, pupils and taxpayers?

The last word has not been spoken or written on the subject of schoolhouses. We may discover before long that great social and civic and economic and artistic possibilities lie in these structures which only a few years ago were so universally bare and forbidding.

Let Us Higgle

UNDER THE OLD ORDER prices were fixed by the "higgling" of buyer and seller and generally fixed about right. That is, no large margin of profit was left, no great inequalities of wealth resulted and the consumer got his money's worth. Under the modern order prices are fixed at the factory to suit the manufacturer and whoso undersells the price fixed is debarred from dealing in the goods at all, with the result that the consumer is plucked and the producer waxes both opulent and arrogant. The old way was best. May the Supreme Court of the United States stand to its guns and make us higgle.

Shasta Bank

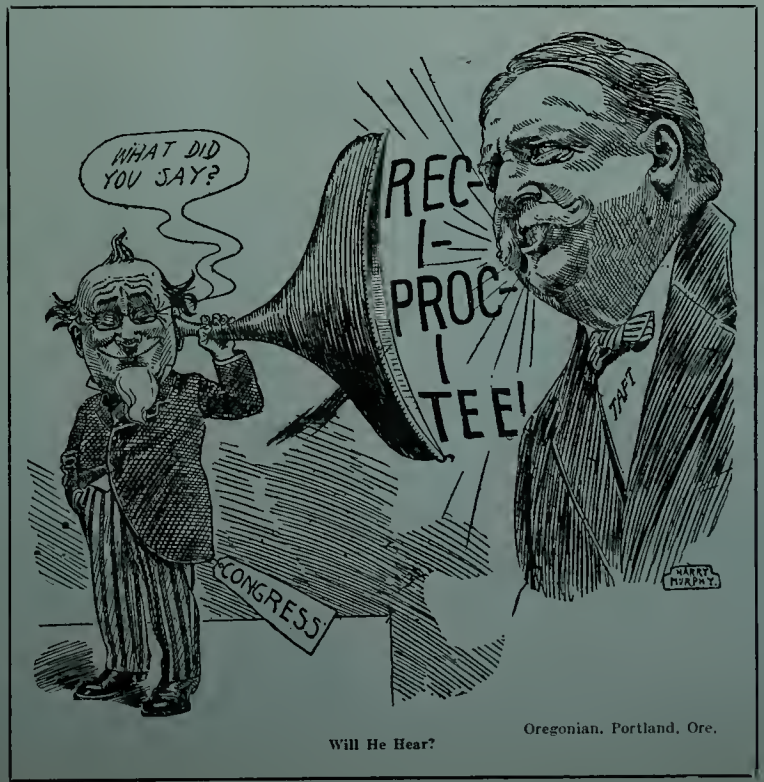
COMPLAINT has been made that if Bank Superintendent Williams had not butted into the Shasta County Bank bubble the bubble might not have burst, damaging so many good reputations and catching so many good people in the pinch. The which, being interpreted, probably means that if Mr. Williams had kept still those who now stand to lose would possibly have wriggled out leaving the "sack" to be held by others not so deft at contriving. The bigger and older the avalanche the worse the crash when it does come down and W. R. Williams did right in giving the institution that "short turn" which will bring it to rights if anything will.

Not to Be Pooh-Poohed

From too many sources comes evidence that Japan sought a coaling station on the Mexican coast to justify the pooh-poohing of the allegation. There was something in it, enough at all events to justify the measures which the President took to forestall it. We do not wish to be ungenerous to Japan, but the establishment of an independent coaling station on the Mexican coast, under the sovereignty of Japan, could not be regarded otherwise than as an unfriendly act toward the United States. All ports of America and Mexico should be open to the ships of Japan for coaling on the same terms enjoyed by ships of our own and other nations, but whatsoever is more than this suggests an ulterior design incompatible with American interests and therefore not to be permitted. The Monroe doctrine must have an Asiatic as well as a European application.

The Scrub Woman

St. Louis Post Dispatch



Voice Crying in the Wilderness George A. Knight is lonesome. There isn't anybody, to speak of, that he can herd with politically. He is perhaps the most extinguished political has-been now extant in all California or, to speak with greater precision, the most noted would-have-been-if-he-could-have-been. Not to be counted on to stand for political Right Things with courage and unselfishness, he has been too uncertain a quantity to justify the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau in sending him to the United States Senate, making him Governor or even a member of Congress. Tempting baits have been trolled just ahead of his nose for a generation, to keep him in line, but if ever he so much as nibbled at one of them the line was jerked clear out of the water and the hook dropped in front of some more dependable personality. Of the honors which do not count he has been surfeited. He has been sent to national conventions, the steam roller has been entrusted to his expert handling in State conventions and that voice of his has been put to service whenever a voice, without much back of it, was needed to fire the hearts of the Republican old guard accustomed to line up with little regard to who was leading the procession, but when it came to actually cutting a political melon that was worth while George A. Knight was not invited to the feast. Small wonder that he squalls now!

The Saving Grace of Indignation But there must have been something downright good, away down low, in George A. Knight all these years else he could not have risen to the requirements of such a splendid indignation as he manifested when it became evident that his compatriot, James N. Gillett, had taken the Herrin program, bait, hook and all after that George Knight had rung the welkin from Shasta to San Diego and return, declaring that "Jim Gillett" was "no man's man," and would be free and untrammeled as Governor. That hurt George Knight. He was wounded to the quick and the wound has stubbornly refused to heal. When he saw George Hatton's name blazoned on James N. Gillett's hotel door he went raving, stark, March-hare mad. It happened at the St. Francis and the doors had to be closed to prevent the spread of consternation to the upper stories, but his animosities spent themselves on Gillett, Hatton, and a few understrappers of Herrin rather than upon the chief himself, and yet he is soured against the Federal brigade also, the personnel of which owes their preferments to the persons whom Mr. Herrin deigned to honor with senatorial office. According to the George Knight view the one thing needful for undoing the Taft cause in California is the out-and-out support of the Federal brigade. Right he is. California may be for Taft, as Knight declares that it is, but California is not for the Federal brigade of office-holders, by grace of Perkins and Flint who, in turn, have held their senatorial stations in feudal fealty to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company and not otherwise. To be favored for anything by this ilk is to be shunned by the populace.

California's Mind Not Yet Made Up George Knight is sure that California is for Taft for Republican nominee for President in 1912. California itself is not so sure. It is thinking Taft over and taking its time for it. It wants to think well of the big fellow. It has felt hurt, rather than angered, by his affiliations with Aldrich, Hale and the rest, but it is going to be more exacting in the future than it was during the first two years of presidential probation. Itself determined to have the initiative, referendum and recall, it will not brook opposition on the part of the President to the admission of Arizona as a State because it has put these instruments of direct legislation into its constitution. Then there is the trouble in Mexico! How the President will handle it is to prove a searching test of his statesmanship, also of his diplomacy. To bring peace to Mexico without the spilling of American blood, and with peace, justice, and with justice, liberty and education—these are tasks that befit a man of big mind, and virile body, yet having the delicacy of touch of the trained nurse and the forbearance of a patient father with a petulant, ailing child. Any belligerent fool could precipitate a conflict with Mexico, but to avoid a conflict without infidelity to humanity, and to achieve Mexican tranquillity without another war with Mexico—if William Howard Taft can bring these achievements to pass there will be more chance of his renomination than now appears. It is unlikely that the mind of California will be fully made up for the better part of a year. It has taken the case of Taft under advisement and will be well advised before it decides.

Bad Company; Not Bad Men Of course The Watchman is not saying that the Federal Brigade in California is made up of bad men, as men. God made them also. But they were willing to accept office as the feudatories of old accepted fiefs—in pledge of rendering service to those who had the giving of offices at their disposal, and such giving came to be centered in the hands of the chief of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. Hardly a member of the Federal Brigade openly championed the cause of Republican insurgency, not a member of that brigade entered the ranks of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, hardly a mother's son of them espoused the candidacy of Hiram Johnson in the primary contest and if any of them voted for him at the election they did better than they are suspected of having done. They were one and all for Anderson at the primaries and Anderson was the Herrin man. Good men, many of them, likeable fellows, not inefficient officials, nevertheless they belong to the old order and the old order has changed, leaving them on the outside of the breastworks much exposed, in their hinder parts, to being buffeted. No wonder that George A. Knight, friend of Taft, does not wish to see his cause "queered" in California worse than it is and, small wonder, too, that, as Collector Stratton intimates, word has come out from Washington desiring the Federal Brigade in California to maintain a masterly inactivity until further orders. The People do mistrust them much.

Will He Hear? Oregonian, Portland, Ore.

Why Does Perkins Still Stand Pat? California never produced a better politician than George C. Perkins. His facility for accommodating himself to environing conditions and circumstances has never been excelled. He has been all things to all men to much practical purpose. Can it be that the significance of the new order in California has not impressed itself upon the Perkins comprehension? Or is he looking for a slump back to the old order? Be it noted that he voted with Aldrich through thick and thin, for the whitewashing of Lorimer, against the election of United States Senators by direct vote—all such votes being out of conformity with prevailing California sentiment. He has been in the Senate eighteen years and has four more years to his credit. As he is now 72 years of age, and will be 76 when his term expires, it does not seem prohable that he will strive to succeed himself for another six years. In fact, the expectation that he would not live out his term was banked on by the Political Bureau, formerly in power in California, as a political asset, something to dangle temptingly before eager mouths to hold their owners in line peradventure. The Watchman has frequently expressed the hope that he might fool 'em, and he succeeded in so doing until the Herrin dynasty itself came to an end. It never loved him. That oleagenous quality that was his by birth and assiduous cultivation always gave the head of the Political Bureau "that uneasy feeling" and yet Perkins was never obdurate or wilfully disobedient. But why has he not cut loose from the old order and squared himself with the sentiment of his State? No one could perform the feat with greater facility than he. Why, then,

(San Francisco Bulletin)

With genuine reluctance James Rolph has agreed to become a candidate for Mayor of San Francisco. As he doesn't like politics and has large business interests that demand his time and attention, his decision, involving, as it does, a personal sacrifice similar to that made by Governor Hiram W. Johnson, is the act of a good citizen. However, as James Rolph the citizen has now become James Rolph the candidate, his acceptance of the honor offered him by the municipal conference of 1911 is merely a point in his favor. The main question has not to do with the sacrifices he is making, but relates solely to his availability as a candidate and his qualifications for the office to which he aspires.

The availability of James Rolph at a time when a union of good citizens is a matter of vital importance is easily established. Two years ago there was a strong demand for "Jim" Rolph for Mayor. At that time, although Rolph is a Republican, thousands of Democrats announced that they would write his name on their ballots if he would only agree to accept if nominated. The Rolph sentiment is even stronger now than it was then. Just how many voters favor his candidacy is not material to the argument. It is certain that none of the candidates on whom progressive San Franciscans might unite has half the following of Rolph, which fact is surely sufficient to prove that there is nothing the matter with his availability.

As for his qualifications, he has many that merit the serious consideration of San Francisco's voters. James Rolph is a clean man of keen intelligence and a high order of ability. He is a typical San Franciscan, and is anxious to make San Francisco worthy of her people's pride. Although often associated with men who regarded only their own private interests, he has always been fair to labor. He believes in organizations of workingmen and does not hesitate to say so. Once a poor boy himself, his sympathies are with the poor, and he shows his sympathies not by oft-repeated words, but by helpful deeds. He believes in common honesty, he knows the needs of his city, and has the ability to handle municipal problems intelligently. Such are the qualifications of James Rolph, and when a man is so equipped he ought to make a good Mayor.

San Francisco is at present suffering from too much promise and too little fulfillment. In the matter of promises California has been far more fortunate than her principal city. Hiram Johnson told the people of the State what he would do if given the power. He was given the power, and he made good. The present Mayor told the people of San Francisco what he would do if given the power. He got the power and failed to make good. The Bulletin believes that James Rolph will make no promises that he will not keep. It also believes that he will make the promises he ought to make. Therefore, The Bulletin is pleased with the decision of James Rolph to run for Mayor, and looks forward hopefully to the time when he will set forth the platform on which he will appeal for support.

A PROGRAM FOR A SOCIAL REFORM

We need in our own land a program of social reform in order that these United States of America may not be permanently backward in comparison with European countries in the march toward the goal of industrial democracy. Germany has been far more wise and foresighted in caring for its workingmen, in providing workingmen's insurance against unemployment, old age, accidents, disease, death, than have we. Belgium and France have, with high statesmanship, taken the lead in a number of more important undertakings of a constructive program of social reform. Denmark has within a generation dealt upon so large and ordered a scale with the problem of co-operative farming that it has achieved veritable miracles of plenty and prosperity for its husbandry. We are sixty years and more behind England in the matter of factory legislation. Before 1850, laws were enacted in England touching child labor which are more merciful than are the statutes of some States in the Union. Alas, that we lag behind! We do not march abreast of European nations, even of those nations which nominally are monarchic and imperial in character, but actually far more democratic than are we.—Stephen S. Wise, in April Pacific Monthly.

By The Onlooker

His name is Hurd, and you can freely bet your last per diem he was, too. No matter who else failed to touch the magic chords of sound, one Hurd was not in the elsie class. He hit 'em, every time; smote 'em an awful smite, that made their dry bones rattle. In fact, that was his long suit in the Senate, making the desiccated ossifications seismose. And what he done to the English language—well, Senator Sanford used to be a school teacher, and he will tell you if you ask him.

Hurd started out as the Senate surprise party—to the new members; the old ones were used to him, as he was there the session before. You could see what a surprising party he was by the look of astonishment on the faces of the new members when he got into action. You see, Hurd's delivery is like Christy Matthewson's used to be before he got so old, a dashing, smashing, crashing style of delivery. Truth is, Hurd making a speech sounds like a Gatling gun with St. Vitus's dance. The new members would look up and their mouths would fly open and their eyes pop out, and then they would look bewildered, and about the time they recovered themselves, Hurd would blow all to pieces in a final explosion, and silence would creep back to count the dead and heal the wounded.

It wasn't only Hurd's delivery that paralyzed 'em, you understand: it was also Hurd's argument. It takes a lightning calculator to follow it, but the general drift of it is this: that the bill in question was designed by a knave or a fool; that it is outrageous; it's infamous; skulduggery! highway robbery!! MURDER!!! [Here insert a pause.] Glass of water, boy! [Another pause, and leonine scowl—in good repair—now comes the peroration, the crux of the argument, the clincher, the opposition-killer, the irrefutable and irrefragible climax of logic. Here it is:] You know it, I know it, and everybody else knows it.

Now will you be good! But that's just the mystery of it to a dazed and admiring scribe—the Senate simply would not be good. In spite of Hurd's telling them perfectly plainly that they knew it, blessed if they didn't invariably turn right around, as if they didn't know anything of the sort, and vote just the opposite of the way he told them to.

Then Hurd had a little bunch of bills of his own that got turned down with marble-hearted regularity by the callous and clammy fellow members. It seems that Hurd had suddenly discovered that there was a sport popularly known as trust-busting, and he proposed to become a true exponent of that species. He probably knows ere this that that sport was fashionable in 1906, but has since fallen into the ping-pong class of exercises. However, he did not know it when the last Legislature opened, so he fired his bills into the legislative hopper and watched 'em hop. First, he proposed to bust the Medical Trust; then he would extract the Dental Trust; and last, but not minus, he would bust the Insane and Criminal Trust. We could truthfully close this record here by saying that what he succeeded in doing was to bust his suspender buttons off, and nothing else; but this epitome, while true, lacks a certain comprehensiveness and historical perspective. Just the same, we will close this record right here.

Senator Hurd, in a burst of confidence [not a bust of trust, however] once explained the circumstances that caused him to adorn the legislative halls. Recalling the speech from memory and after the lapse of some weeks, we cannot hope to do it justice, for it was a Sixth Reader gem of brevity and wit; but it ran something like this:

"The Southern Pacific never had nothin' to do with my bein' here, excepting this: They didn't have no love for me, but they hated the man that run against me worsen poison, and so, bein' betwixt the devil and the deep sea, they supported me."

It is always a relief to know just how such things happen. If Hurd hadn't made it clear, we might always have wondered about that 37th district—might always have harbored that horrible doubt.

"I wish some time, Mr. Speeder," said the doctor, "that you would bear our hospital in mind, and, if it appeals to you, do something for it."

"Great Scott! Squills," retorted Speeder, "why can't you be satisfied? That new chauffeur of mine has contributed at least two patients a day to your old charity. What more do you want?"—Harper's Weekly.

THE DAY AT SAN FRANCISCO

By Franklin Hichborn

Although the San Francisco primary election will not be held until late in September, and the finals in November, the municipal campaign of 1911 has opened with a vim that has the community by the ears.

Within five days after the reluctant consent of James Rolph, Jr., to make the race for Mayor, the contest had narrowed down to a two-men fight, McCarthy on the one side and Rolph on the other.

A. W. Scott, Jr., Byron Mauzy and others who had been "mentioned" for Mayor, had announced themselves for Rolph. Only one "third candidate" remained unaccounted for, Charles Curry. Before these lines reach the eye of the reader, Curry, too, may have gracefully withdrawn. But there is no accounting for Curry. And, really, it does not matter much one way or the other, whether Curry retires to private oblivion or continues in political oblivion. The result of the election won't be influenced much, one way or the other.

"Andy" Gallagher, prominent local labor leader, is possessed of a desire to serve his city as Chief Executive. But Gallagher in the fight or out of it will not materially affect results.

The contest is between Rolph on the one side and McCarthy on the other. On this line San Francisco will fight it out all summer.

McCarthy's supporters, with fine cunning, are, from the start, endeavoring to force class division.

This was well illustrated last Saturday, when San Francisco was covered with marked copies of "The Leader," a weekly publication, which stood firmly by the one-time Mayor Schmitz during the darkest days of that gentleman's notoriously dark career. The Leader still stands for Schmitz, and against the graft prosecution. The Leader's marked article opened with the following paragraph:

"Some time ago, when we commented on the attempt made to steal the name of A. O. H. (Ancient Order of Hibernians) to serve the interests of faction we told our readers the real meaning of the move. We foresaw then that this was merely a part of a great political conspiracy to steal the city as it was stolen by the Graft Prosecution. The anti-labor element and all the corrupt interests of San Francisco have determined to wipe out the Labor Party, and after the Labor Party to wipe out the Unions, preparatory to the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The events of the past week show that they have all got together, and are working hard. The election this year will be a straight fight between employers and employes, between capital and labor, between the rich, with their hangers-on, and the workingmen who believe in personal and political independence."

The Leader then goes on to predict that if the Union Labor Party ticket be defeated this year, that San Francisco will have a Socialist Mayor in 1915.

Paying its respects to Rolph, The Leader says:

"Of Rolph personally we have nothing to say. Those who know him speak highly of him. He is about the best candidate that could be selected. If he were standing on a party ticket, no doubt he would gain many labor votes, but standing as the representative of the Citizens' Alliance and all the corrupt interests of San Francisco the labor man that votes for him is a traitor to himself, his family and his fellow laboring men."

Such is the attitude of one of the most notorious "anti-Graft Prosecution" papers published in San Francisco, a paper that continued to be an extreme Schmitz partisan, even after Schmitz had been thrown out of office, and which now denounces all labor men who may vote for Rolph and therefore against McCarthy, as "traitors" to the cause of labor, a denouncement to which sane members of labor organizations will scarcely subscribe.

The charge is made repeatedly in the public prints, and generally accepted without question as a fact, that the real power behind The Leader is Rev. Peter C. Yorke. Yorke, by the way, is a member of the Board of Regents of the State University.

The purpose of McCarthy's supporters in forcing a class contest is apparent. If the labor union vote can be bullied, bluffed or frightened into supporting the Union Labor party program, the chances for McCarthy's election are very good. If this support cannot be secured for the Union Labor party, McCarthy has practically no chance at all.

One of the principal errors made in "sizing up" the situation in San Francisco comes from confusing the Labor Union organizations with the Union Labor party. To be sure, many prominent Labor Union leaders are leaders of the Union Labor party. But the rank and file of the Unions are not necessarily members of the Union Labor political outfit.

Indeed, some of the strongest opponents which the Union Labor party has are Labor Union leaders, and these opponents are the highest type of leaders. Walter Macarthur, for example, has always stood against the Union Labor party program.

This somewhat complicated situation is perhaps made clearer by example.

The Union Labor party leaders have from the first opposed the Graft Prosecution. The party has therefore been opposed to the prosecution, and has had more or less assistance from those put on their defense by the prosecution.

Thus in 1907, when the United Railroads was smashing the Street Carmen's Union, that corporation was opposing the re-election of Langdon to the District Attorney's office. Mr. Langdon had the Republican and Democratic nominations. So far as lay in that corporation's power, the United Railroads, although engaged at the time in a life and death struggle with the Labor Unions, assisted the cause of the Union Labor party candidate for District Attorney.

In 1909, the Union Labor party candidate for District Attorney was Mr. Fickert. Mr. Fickert also had the Republican nomination, but he had been the original choice of the Union Labor party which had brought him into prominence as a candidate. Mr. Fickert's opponent was Francis J. Heney. It is needless to state on which side the influence and assistance of union-labor-fighting corporations, such as the United Railroads, were thrown.

On the other hand, Labor Union leaders of the type of Walter Macarthur supported Mr. Langdon in 1907 and Mr. Heney in 1909, and both in 1907 and 1909 opposed practically the entire Union Labor party ticket.

As a general thing, the sympathies of the members of labor unions were with the Graft Prosecution. This was shown in 1907 when the greater part of the labor union vote went to Taylor and Langdon, on the straight, out-and-out Graft Prosecution issue. Two years later, the class and other questions were permitted to confuse the issue, with the result that the entire Union Labor party ticket was elected.

The strength of the Union Labor party comes from several sources. To begin with, there is the nucleus of Labor Union leaders and their immediate following, which identifies the party with the labor union movement. Then comes a large number of shop keepers, saloon keepers and small property owners. As a maximum, as nearly as can be ascertained, the Union Labor party strength in San Francisco is not above 17,000. As the San Francisco vote at a general election runs above 60,000, it will be seen that unassisted the Union Labor party would count for little.

But if a situation can be created by which the tenderloin vote, the entire saloon vote, the corrupt corporation vote, and, more important than all, the entire labor vote, can be thrown to the Union Labor party, there is no combination that can be got together in San Francisco that can beat it.

Such a situation the Union Labor party leaders are endeavoring, quite artfully, to create.

The tenderloin vote will not be cast for James Rolph, Jr. That close associate of the tenderloin vote, the saloon vote, is not likely to go to him either, nor will the corrupt corporation vote. If the labor vote can be turned in a solid block against him, Rolph will have no more chance for election than Heney had two years ago.

On a straight issue, Rolph will have, as was shown in these columns last week, strong support from the right-thinking working people of this city. Rolph lives among them, has for years stood their good friend under the most trying conditions. They know him and trust and respect him. The shipping firm of which Rolph is the executive head, has always dealt fairly by labor. These facts are known and appreciated. Nothing but a stampede can prevent a large percentage of the working people of San Francisco supporting him.

But if the class issue can be injected into the campaign the stampede will almost to a certainty come.

What the "Cranks" Did

When the People's party, organized by a few farmers some years ago, advocated the referendum, initiative and recall idea of government they were dubbed visionary cranks and many "wise ones" of the political world considered these ideas fallacious, dangerous and even anarchistic. Even just the other day Senator Bailey resigned his seat in the U. S. Senate because some of his Democratic colleagues voted to uphold what he termed "Populistic fallacies in Arizona's constitution." Of course he withdrew his resignation in the next breath. Some of the leading states have already adopted these "Populistic fallacies" and others are preparing to follow suit. Every progressive Republican and Democrat advocates these measures and it will not be many years before they become nationally adopted. Some credit is due, after all, to the level-headed farmers who paved the way for these reforms. —Fowler Ensign.

His Attitude to the North and the South

Playground Movement Spreading: The agitation for public playgrounds for children, and even for grown-ups, which started with the congested portions of big cities, has spread to the smaller towns and to the outlying, uncongested portions of the big cities. The tax income of the smaller places frequently does not justify, or seem to justify, the necessary outlay but that does not deter the advocates of the playground from accomplishing their purpose. In Portsmouth, Virginia, for example, a piece of ground was borrowed from an orphan asylum organization, and the local civic club and the Boy Scouts went to work to get it in order. The city loaned some help and tools from the street department, and much of the work was done by the boys themselves. It is true that most small towns have vacant lots where boys can play in a desultory manner, but they are not likely to undertake real sporting activities until they have properly prepared grounds. There is very little loafing, and practically no mischief whatever, on the public playground.

Trilby Rail and T Rail: The city of Trenton, New Jersey, has been engaged for some time in a struggle to bring its street car system up to par. One factor that entered into the case was the bad condition of the paving of streets where car tracks were located. A thorough investigation was made by the city engineer on the methods used in other cities as to laying of track in paved streets and type of rail used. This is a matter that has been under consideration and acrimonious debate in Los Angeles for some time, and this report seems to bear out the contention of the Los Angeles city engineer for a solid and deep construction and also for the use of Trilby rails in congested streets, as they are now used in San Francisco. The latter topic was gone into by the American Street and Railway Association at their meeting in Denver in 1909, and its special committee reports, recommending the T rail for general use, but says: "For tracks constructed for heavy service in connection with deep block pavement on streets where the traffic is confined to the railway strip, or is so congested that the railway strip is continually used by vehicles (such conditions as exist only in cities of the larger class), your committee recommends the adoption of the half-grooved or Trilby rail." This, it must be remembered, is in the nature of an admission from the railway side of the controversy, and, as the Trenton report says: "There can be no doubt that from the standpoint of the operating company, the T rail is by far the most economical."

An Unpatriotic City: We do not know very much about Gloucester City, New Jersey, except that it has about 8,000 population and is near to Philadelphia, but when we learn that its city council declares municipal ownership of water works to be a failure, and proposes to sell or lease the business, because the city lacks the intelligence and the honesty to make it pay expenses, we can easily guess what kind of a place it is, and what is the matter with it. The plant has been allowed to run down to a point where the expense of repairs eats up all revenue. The city's books are loaded with unpaid accounts, but nobody has the nerve to shut the water off and bring delinquents to time. How can they when every fifth man has a pull with the administration that enables him to get his water free? The trouble with the town, of course, is bad politics. The population is largely made up of people that "vote the ticket straight." It doesn't matter at all what ticket. And this place, too, has no doubt a great amount of what is technically known as "prosperity," which is wealth for a few manufacturers who probably care very little for the town and perhaps do not even live there, and poverty and squalor for great numbers of their employes.

City Bidding on Contracts: Toronto, Canada, has adopted the practice of having the city engineer put in a bid on every important piece of improvement work that it is proposed to do under contract. If his bid is the lowest, the contractor next above is allowed to do the work, if he chooses, at the city's figure. If he refuses, which rarely happens, then the city does the work. The direct saving through this plan has been $10,000 during the past year; what the indirect saving has been, in holding down contractors to reasonable figures, of course cannot be calculated, but the city is well satisfied with the arrangement. In making his bid, the city engineer is instructed to allow a fair charge for overhead expenses and also for interest on a plant which must be idle a good part of the year, the object being not to crowd the contractors down to a point that will make them unwilling to try for the city's business, but only to secure fair figures from them.

Increasing Income of Street Car Systems: Before the advent of the Pay-as-you-enter cars, the passenger who made it a rule never to proffer a fare until it was asked for escaped paying about one time out of five. Even the average conscientious passenger frequently remembered after he left the car that he had not paid any fare. Under the new system every passenger is certain to pay, and the increase in the income of the company must be considerable. In a short space of time all cars will be of this design. That was a "reform" that came easily, but with fenders to save life, or proper car cleaning for sanitation, the case is usually very different.

Baltimore Sewage Disposal: Baltimore will presently cease to dump its sewage into the ocean. Its sewage disposal plant is nearly completed. It covers five acres with its tanks and 12 acres with its filter beds.

Storage Battery Street Car: Mayor Reyburn of Philadephia and several other city officers were present recently at a test given the Edison storage battery street car. It weighs 13,100 pounds and has seating capacity for 26 and standing room for 20 more. A 100-cell Edison battery is located beneath the seats. It is claimed that the car will run 225 miles on one charge. The test seemed to be very successful.

National Municipal League: The 1912 gathering of the National Municipal League will be held in July instead of November, and will take place in Los Angeles. This is the result of efforts of Meyer Lissner, one of the California members of the Executive Committee, to secure the meeting at the earliest possible date for Los Angeles, in order to assist at the making of a new charter for that city. The next meeting of the League, which will be this coming fall, had been pledged for Richmond, Virginia; but in order to be in time for the charter work the League will put forward its 1912 meeting several months. This will be a notable event and of value to the advance civic movement all over the coast.

Cheap Electric Lighting: The town of Niagara Falls, Ontario, realized a profit of $10,000 from its municipal lighting system, which it turns into the treasury for the benefit of taxes. It makes a rate of 5 cents a kilowatt hour and allows ten per cent off for prompt payment. Moreover, in order to mark every house using the current, it puts an incandescent on the front porch which is burned free of charge all night.

Mayor's Cabinets: Many of the progressive city mayors are establishing cabinets. One of the first to adopt this plan was Kansas City and lately the mayor of St. Paul has taken it up. In the former case the cabinet was composed of city officials, but in the latter of prominent citizens. Either of these plans is a decided improvement over the old system, when the mayor's cabinet consisted of the boss that had elected him.

City Planning Conference: The national conference on City Planning will be held in Philadelphia May 15th, 16th and 17th. A number of well-known specialists will be present, among them Frederick Law Olmsted, F. C. Howe, Ernest Flagg, Lawson Purdy, Lawrence Veiller, Walter C. Fisher and others.

International Municipal Congress: The California League of Municipalities is preparing an exhibit to be shown at the Municipal Exposition which is to be held at Chicago this coming fall. An effort will be made to secure the meeting of this congress and exposition to be held at San Francisco at the World's Fair in 1915.

Spring Clean-Up: A long list has been published of American cities that are preparing to houseclean on an elaborate scale either on some one fixed day or some one week in the spring time. This idea originated about ten years ago, and has been steadily growing in popularity and good results ever since.

Street Railways at Home and Abroad

Lessons We Might Learn From European Cities

By A. F. SOUTHWICK

[Mr. Southwick is a resident of Los Angeles and is a keen student of municipal affairs. He has worked hard in the recent progressive movements of Los Angeles and has done his share in helping to place his city in the forefront of the well-governed cities of this country. In politics, he is a progressive, and describes himself as being "a La Follette Republican and a Folk Democrat."—Editor.]

The Los Angeles City Club was addressed, at its regular weekly luncheon last Saturday, by A. F. Southwick, who has recently returned from an extensive trip through Europe, where he particularly observed the operation of street railways.

Mr. Southwick took for his subject, "Street Railways, at Home and Abroad," and spoke, in full, as follows:

There is no more timely question in Los Angeles today than that of solving our street railway problems. Our city is growing rapidly and it has become imperative that we not only take better care of the traffic we now have but that we make speedy and proper plans for a future Los Angeles that will require the very best methods that can be devised. I do not expect to give expert advice but during the past year I have visited many of the great cities of Europe and have observed the methods they use in solving some of the questions that now confront us. A recital of what I saw there may be of interest and I believe I gathered one or two ideas that have value.

A Central Boulevard

Before telling of the car service abroad, however, I wish to briefly mention two things that everyone returning to our city from Europe must feel Los Angeles should have. One is a down-town boulevard, a fine show street in the center of the city. We have beautiful streets out in the residence districts but we need a business boulevard, so located that everyone who passes through our city must see and admire it. All European cities have such streets. Berlin is proud of her Unter den Linden, Vienna of her Burg-Ring, Munich of her Maximilian Strasse and Paris of her Grand Boulevards. These are all boulevards centrally located. They are in those cities where Broadway and Spring street are in Los Angeles. The Unter den Linden in Berlin, for instance, is the principal thoroughfare of Berlin. It is very wide with a parkway in the center. It is decorated with statutes and fountains and has rows of chairs where the weary may rest. It is a comfortable beautiful street and one that gives a very favorable and lasting impression of Berlin.

The other thing that Europe has and we need is a system of public convenience stations on our main streets. About every city abroad has provided these public toilets. They are located on curbs, in parkways, underground and in alleys. Public health as well as public convenience calls for some such arrangement to provide for the many people who throng our streets.

Cars Beside Curb

A thing that interested me in Naples, which was the first city we visited in Europe, was to see the cars running along the curb instead of in the middle of the street. This can hardly be adopted in Los Angeles at this late day but we enjoyed being able to step into a car from the sidewalk and get off directly onto the walk and not in the path of an auto or other vehicle. Many accidents are surely avoided by this system, which we found more or less in Munich, Rome, Vienna, London and other cities.

It was in Naples, too, that we first got acquainted with the zone system, which is to pay on street railways as we do on steam railways, according to the distance traveled. The average fare in Naples is about two cents, and I should say that two or three cents is the average fare in all European cities.

They have their service divided into first and second class in Naples and they do not permit passengers to stand excepting on a platform separated from the rest of the car. One is not allowed to ride standing in front of another who has paid for his seat. In Rome carfare before eight o'clock a. m. is one cent for almost any distance. This is for the benefit of laboring people who are going to work at that hour. I will not discuss the street transportation in Venice. I am afraid their methods are hardly valuable in our city.

Double-Deck Motor Buss in Paris

Government-Owned Railroads

From Italy we went to Switzerland, and I wish you to forget street railways for a moment while I tell you of their government-owned and operated steam railways. They form a network over the entire country, which is very rough and mountainous. In building these railways they had to contend with the Alps at every turn. At one place on the St. Gothard pass they had to tunnel a total of twenty-five miles and in other places they use the cog-wheel system. Such construction and operation is surely expensive, and yet with government-ownership they sell a ticket or pass permitting you to ride anywhere and everywhere over these lines, including many steamer trips on their lakes for a period of fifteen days for $17.15, first class; $12.09 second class, or $8.97, third class. This gave me a favorable impression of government ownership, as such an amount of travel here in California would cost two or three hundred dollars.

Street Cars Running Close to the Curb, in Vienna

Motor-Busses

The Strand, Pall Mall, Regent and Fleet street in London; Avenue de la Opera and the Grand Boulevards in Paris and the Unter den Linden in Berlin are the prominent central streets of those cities and yet there is not a street-railway on any of them. In these cities they take care of the traffic on such streets by the use of double-deck horse busses and motor busses. These busses being double-deck take up small space for the number of passengers carried and are able to pick their way through a crowded street faster than a street car on tracks. They move a great amount of traffic. They are in use in New York and I believe could be used to advantage in Los Angeles, in our down-town district and perhaps running from Eastlake to Westlake park, etc.

In Berlin they have a fine public-owned and operated subway system on which I rode across the center of the city for two and one-half cents. One of her omnibus lines charges a fare of one and one-fourth cents for any distance.

Paris, which is the most crowded city I have ever visited, takes good care of its traffic. It has a municipally-owned system of subways encircling the city and with many cross lines. They have surface lines on many streets but as I have said, not on their best inside streets: On these they use the omnibus and autobus. Fares range from two to five cents according to the service rendered. In London the cars are regular moving bill boards, covered with advertisements which make it rather difficult to pick from the signs the one that tells where the car is going.

In New York I rode in the subway under the Hudson river to Hoboken for three cents. In Washington they sell six car tickets for twenty-five cents. In Cleveland the regular fare is three cents and in Chicago I paid two and one-half cents fare for my children. The trolleys in Washington are underground, and in Chicago I noticed that they used many grooved rails, also that the car companies were sprinkling their own tracks. They were doing this with large tank cars.

This three-cent or two for five-cent fare in Chicago, is for all children and at all hours, while here in Los Angeles only school children who start for school after eight a. m. are entitled to such a fare. It seems to me that this is an unjust discrimination against the poor children who have to drop out of school to go to work in the shops and stores. I don't see why these working children should pay more for a ride than their more fortunate brothers and sisters who are able to continue in school.

Double-Deck Trolley Cars

Practically every crowded city in Europe uses double-deck instead of single-deck cars and I believe that the use of these double-deck cars on the crowded streets of Los Angeles, with a regulation of the number of passengers permitted to stand, would promptly solve the strap-hanging nuisance with which we are now contending. It has been said by our Utility Commission and by a prominent railway man in a recent interview that the one great trouble in handling our crowds during the rush hours is that the downtown streets are so crowded that they haven't the space on which to place more cars. Now does it not seem reasonable to suggest that at such times our single-

GLEANINGS FROM THE PRESS

OF 50 YEARS AGO

Our sires of '61 were a blood-thirsty crew, and no mistake. When they asked for sport, they wanted it with the bark on. None of the molly-coddle spectacles of the present day for them. At least, the Sacramento Union thought worthy of a prominent place on the first page of its issue of Monday, April 22, 1861, a quarter column account of a day-long and bloody cockfight in Michigan. The prominence of the position given the item and the lack of adverse comment, indicate that both the sport and its attendant gambling were applauded, or at least taken as the veriest matter of course. Here are a few sentences from the report:

"Inter-State 'Chicken' Dispute between Kentucky and Michigan.—The great cock-fight, for a stake of $1,000, between twenty-one cocks from Louisville, Kentucky, and the same number from this city was fought yesterday in the German Theater. The building was crowded during the entire day, and great excitement prevailed. The entertainment (sic) was one which is not often witnessed, and the desire to see it was very great. . . . The crowd was mixed. There were aldermen, professional gentlemen, public functionaries of high and low degree, men of leisure, shirtsleeve fellows, and roughs, with a sprinkling of countrymen and John Bulls. . . . The cocks were brought in, two at a time, and, after preliminary preparations, were placed in the ring and allowed to fight until one gave up from weakness or was killed. . . . The fighting was kept up steadily from ten o'clock in the forenoon until the decision was rendered."

But, perhaps as an antidote to the brutalizing influence of such reports, an advertisement appears in the same issue, describing some of the softening and sweetening influences being imported into California. Van Winkle & Duncan announce that they "have just received, ex ships Malay, Great Republic, Syren, etc., in addition to former stock, 100 tons Refined Bar Iron." How inspiring is the thought of the ameliorating power exerted down the years by those gentle and perfectly refined bars of iron.

Our forbears of that day had their conservative opinions, too. At least one of these reads oddly enough now, though it was published with all possible solemnity of seriousness as a weighty contribution to public wisdom. We refer to

"President Felton on Steel Pens.—At the examination of the Framingham (Mass.) Normal School lately, President Felton spoke in strong terms of the serious effects of steel pens, their tendency to injure or paralyze the nerves of the arm. Sad proof of this influence had come under his own knowledge. His predecessor, Dr. Walker, and at least six of his acquaintances, had received permanent injury from the habitual use of steel pens."

And still the insidious habit fastens its fangs, deep and ever deeper, upon our people. Even our school children now habitually indulge in steel pen debauches, in reckless disregard of the debilitating and pernicious consequences.

The Santa Clara country came a good deal into the news in those days. A crowd of hundreds of squatters had settled on the Chabolla ranch, and refused to obey court orders to vamoose. A condition amounting to revolution arose. The sheriff could not make them go. Finally Governor Downey sent an ambassador to treat with them, and they requested the gentleman to buy his own drinks and go back home, which he did. What happened next we will tell when we find out ourselves. There was some talk of calling out the militia.

Meantime, the inhabitants of that part of the country were promised

"Another Daily.—The San Jose Mercury announces that it will be published as a daily after the first of June."

The following description of the first rolling stock used on the Southern Pacific system is of interest, especially in the matter of comparison of the locomotives with those used today:

"Railroad Matters.—A few days since we spoke of the arrival in this city of locomotives, passenger and freight cars for the California Central Railroad, and that the locomotives would soon be put together and in running order. There are four of them . . . and contain all the latest improvements on wood burning locomotives. . . . The weight of each engine, in running order, is about twenty-six tons."

Anybody who thinks that the snippy feeling of San Francisco for Los Angeles is a recent growth, is respectfully referred to this sample of sassy language penned fifty years ago:

"Prospecting South.—A correspondent at Los Angeles, writing to a friend in this city, April 22d, says:

"I arrived here today on my way home, after prospecting for four weeks and not finding sufficient inducements to stop in this part of the country. But before I leave I am going to examine a coal lead some fifty miles from here—and if it is not as represented, I shall return immediately to San Francisco. My opinion is that this part of the country is very poor, and further east—Potosi and other Colorado regions, are not worth a 'Continental cent.'"

We reckon he "returned immediately to San Francisco."

OF TODAY

If your grocer glowers gloomily and shakes his head when you give the next order for your favorite breakfast fodder, remember that "the long-expected strike of the furniture workers of Grand Rapids, which has been hanging fire for several weeks, and which affects about 10,000 men," has been officially declared for about ten days. Hence the scarcity of Succulent Shavings, the Sweet Heart of the Piano Leg, and other breakfast dishes.

But the food supply of California still contains enough delicacies. By the way, this is Raisin Day, Fresno's annual offering to the sweet things of life, another chance to tease your teeth with crisp sugar granules cased in purple covers—glacé sunbeams, so to speak—a form of patriotism appealing to pampered palates as well as to local pride.

The most stable institution in Oakland continues to be Frank Mott's political popularity. Business rises and falls, forms of government change, but still the stout figure of the Mayor looms ahead the march, and still the great white light that beats upon exalted station is reflected in a blaze of glory from the smooth surface of his dome. He has licked 'em all—Republicans of every shade, Democrats, independents, and now a Socialist. Parties in Oakland have simmered down to for and forninst Mott.

Other mayors seem not to have learned the Mott secret of success. Fawcett, of Tacoma, got the hook last week, and retires from the political stage by request.

When Governor Johnson gave the friends and enemies of the anti-slot machine bill a public hearing, he rather put one over on the friends of the "selling device"—which is the high-toned name now given this whirligig of chance. Funny how horse-racing becomes a method of "improving the breed," when the gambling adjunct is attacked; the nickel-in-the-slot becomes a "selling device." Stud poker, you will remember, used to be an exercise in the study of higher mathematics, in the interests of pure science. Anyhow, the friends of the slot assured the Governor that all who manufactured the device were saints, and all who owned them souls of honor. "There's not a crooked machine in the State," they cried.

And then the Governor did a little crying on his own hook. He reached into his hip pocket, next to the package of English curve-cut, and hauled out a little brochure, or monograph, on How to Skin the Suckers, printed and published by the white-souled manufacturers of slots. This little prose poem contained full directions to the souls of honor mentioned above, telling them how they could plug the "device" so it would "sell" the sucker, the extent to which he was "sold" being at the discretion and good nature of the souls of honor—they could let him win once in awhile, just to be sociable, or they could fix it up so he would have just as much chance as the proverbial snowball in El Centro on August 15th at 3 in the afternoon.

"Borax" Smith seems to have got out of his desert discoveries not only the stuff that cleans the clothes but also the stuff that cleans up big business deals and puts them into the world of reality and out of the land of dreams. The Key Route system, which hitherto has been local to the Bay district, is now generally believed to be ready with the money for extensions into the Sacramento Valley that will make the development of that part of the State as rapid as the reputation of "The Girl from Rector's."

State Supervision of Electric Railways in Wisconsin

From an Article in Electric Railway Transportation, by Hon. B H. Meyer, Member of Interstate Commerce Commission, Formerly Chairman Railroad Commission of Wisconsin

(Editorial Note:—This article gives a good illustration of the thoroughness with which the state public service commissioners apply themselves to the regulation of purely local utilities.)

The mileage of electric railways in Wisconsin is comparatively limited. There are about five hundred and ninety-two miles of line (seven hundred ninety miles of track) of which somewhat less than one-half is located within the limits of municipalities. Construction has been authorized for approximately two hundred and fifty miles more, and several more or less extensive projects are in various stages of development.

The law of 1905, as construed by the Commission, gave the Commission the same jurisdiction over electric railways that it conferred with respect to steam railways. However, since there was some doubt regarding the extent of jurisdiction conferred, the legislature of 1907 amended the original law by making the act apply also to "all street and interurban railway companies." This amendment left no doubt regarding the complete jurisdiction of the Commission. It has never been questioned since.

In addition to the basic railway statute as amended, there are special acts applicable to electric railways relating to the heating of cars, waiting rooms, fenders, power brakes, the issue of securities, authority to construct, etc. These acts are supplemental to the general railroad law and together with the latter comprise a regulatory code which is as broad as the business. While the mileage of electric railways in Wisconsin is relatively small, the legislation applicable to it is comprehensive enough, it seems, for a mileage as extensive as any that can be created within the boundaries of a state. The legislative and administrative problems are the same as they would be if the mileage in the state were the most extensive of any in the Union.

Street Cars in Milwaukee

The first of the more important cases relating to electric railways was brought before the Commission during the fall of 1906, and embraced practically all the phases of the service within the city of Milwaukee and certain suburbs. A separate complaint related to the alleged discrimination in the arrangement of fare zones between Milwaukee and one of its suburbs. While the absolute reasonableness of the rate was challenged in each case, by stipulation the latter question was held in abeyance pending a valuation of the property of the respondent's lines and the necessary statistical investigation by the Commission. While the service cases were decided within the following year, the rate cases are still pending. The valuation has been completed, analyses made, and unusually voluminous proceedings terminated. The attorneys are at present engaged, we are advised, in the preparation of their respective briefs, and the matter will naturally come up again before the Commission for argument as soon as these preparations have been completed.

The service cases related to overcrowding, lack of cleanliness in the cars, improper routing of cars, failure to sell certain classes of tickets on cars, failure to install power brakes and properly guard certain crossings, and similar matters. All of these questions are disposed of in the decisions.

Although many of the matters referred to in these first complaints had apparently been met by the Commission, complaint regarding certain minor matters relating to the service continued to come to the Commission with such persistence that it was decided to institute a comprehensive and thorough investigation of the service situation in Milwaukee by the Commission on its own motion.

The field work in this investigation was begun in October, 1908, and from this date to March, 1909, from two to five men were kept constantly in the field making observations upon service conditions. A final report covering the investigation was made in June, 1909. This report was directed to three chief phases of the problem, viz., (1) the extent of service given by the company, (2) the service required by the traveling public, (3) the necessary re-routings of the various lines in order to avoid present conditions of congestion in the down-town district and to obtain better accommodations for certain classes of traffic.

Suggestions to the Company

Upon completion of the work in June, 1909, the following suggestions were made to the company for the improvement of the service:

(1) The adoption of rerouting schemes which were submitted in detail in the report.

(2) Providing a sufficient number of cars to take care of the traffic on the various lines which were overcrowded at periods shown in the report.

(3) Establishing definite stopping places at street intersections suitable for all conditions of travel.

(4) Making service stops on both sides of important transfer points.

(5) Soliciting the co-operation of the public through the medium of proper signs posted in the car.

(6) Exacting greater courtesy on the part of trainmen.

(7) Endeavoring to train the public to move on and off cars in a more systematic manner.

(8) Better supervision of cars at the various street railway intersections.

(9) Requiring the trainmen to be more alert in saving time at intersections and to act more promptly upon the supervisor's orders.

(10) Insisting that trainmen do not shirk by running their car so that the one ahead or the one behind will receive the passengers.

(11) Using more care in maintaining proper headway or spacing between cars.

Suggestions to the Public

It was suggested that the public could co-operate with the company in improving the service as follows:

(1) By readily complying with the requests of conductors; for example, stepping forward promptly when requested, etc.

(2) By not unnecessarily crowding the vestibules and aisles of the cars.

(3) By exercising more promptness in leaving and boarding cars.

(4) By general co-operation in other details.

Proposals for the future were also made which involved new track upon various streets. The re-routing scheme also involved considerable new track as well as changes in the routing of some of the car lines in the down-town district.

The final report consisted of approximately fifty pages, and there were submitted in supplementary detail, about three hundred pages of field data, diagrams, schemes for rerouting, car demand curves, investigations as made in other cities, studies of transfer data, movement of passengers, etc.

Observations Made

After a few observations had been taken, it was noted that the times of greatest travel were 6:00 to 9:00 a. m., 11:00 a. m. to 2:00 p. m., 5:00 to 8:00 p. m., and from 10:00 to 11:00 p. m. These intervals were then designated periods one, two, three and four. The observations were then confined mainly to the above periods of traffic, it being assumed that any scheme which would handle the periods of maximum travel would prove entirely adequate at any other period of the day. It was soon found that the travel during period four was not of such extent but that it could be easily handled by the routing system then in use, or any other which might be put in force. It was therefore omitted from the further investigations.

The fourteen main lines of the street railway system were then investigated in detail under each of the remaining periods. Inspectors collected data as to the number of passengers riding, the number of cars, the time of arrival of cars, and such similar information as would be of value in dealing with the traffic conditions. For a number of days traffic on one line would be observed in order to find the average number of people riding upon the line, the amount of overcrowding, if any, the destination of the passengers, and other matters of similar nature which would make the inspectors entirely familiar with the conditions.

From a total of nine thousand cars observed, it was noted that quite a number of people riding preferred to stand even when seats were available, and this tendency seemed to follow a fixed law. In fact, observations showed that in 1,499 cars an average of two people stood by preference when only ten to fourteen people were on the car. In 1,483 cars observed, three people stood when there were only fifteen to nineteen passengers. In 1,411 cars observed, four people stood out of twenty to twenty-four riding. Five were observed to stand in 1,137 cases where there were from twenty-five to twenty-nine people on the car. Six stood in 867 cases when the car contained thirty to thirty-four people. An average of seven remained standing in 703 cars observed which contained from thirty to thirty-nine people, and finally, in 392 cases in which there were from forty to forty-two passengers on the car, eight of these stood by preference. Therefore, for a car having a seating capacity of forty-two people (the size of the street car in general use in Milwaukee), a "comfortable load" was taken as fifty passengers, on the assumption that if eight people preferred to stand, even if seats were provided for them, it was therefore unnecessary to provide seats for these eight people. A car which afforded seats for forty-two people could then be called upon to carry a load of fifty people "comfortably" under these conditions.

A number of reasons might be suggested as explaining this preference of a number of passengers to stand rather than to sit down in available seats. The passengers may wish to stand on the rear platform and smoke, they may prefer to stand on the front platform for observation, or they may have been sitting down all day and prefer to stand for that reason, or having only a short distance to ride, they may not care to go to even the slight trouble of searching for one of a number of available seats. In fact, there is a wide variety of reasons why a number of passengers periods of travel upon each of the fourteen lines above mentioned. The average number of people on the cars for these periods was plotted, and where these averages exceed fifty people, it denoted that the cars were more than "comfortably" filled. From these determinations, the extent and duration of the overcrowding readily became known, and the number of extra cars needed was readily determined.

It was discovered that a considerable amount of overcrowding was due to the distorted headway or time-spacing between cars. If the line were operated upon a five-minute headway, the cars were each supposed to be spaced that time interval apart, or, in other words, if one car passed a certain point on this line five minutes were supposed to elapse before another car would pass the same point. This headway was often considerably distorted, owing to the fact that various running speeds were observed; people in boarding or leaving would detain a car longer than was necessary; a drawbridge might be open, or the motorman himself might be careless in controlling the speed of his car so as to maintain a proper headway. The result of this was that two cars might follow each other just a square or so apart, while from eight to ten minutes might elapse before another car came along. The first and third cars, in this event, might become considerably overloaded.

Destination of Passengers

After each line had been studied in considerable detail in the effort to ascertain just what the requirements of the traffic were regarding the proper number and headway of cars, the matter of the destination of passengers was then considered. The entire territory embraced by the various lines was divided into different districts. A study was then made of the character of the traffic, the districts served, etc. In an effort to ascertain the destination of the average passenger to further aid in this consideration, a complete set of transfers for the entire day was obtained, and by going over these in connection with the "car demand curves," the origin and the destination of the average passenger on each line were determined. This was necessary in order to ascertain the re-routing required to thus serve the demands of the public. As an example of some of the data which resulted from these latter observations, it was found that a very considerable percentage of the morning and evening traffic in the western and northwestern part of the city of Milwaukee had a final destination in the southwestern part of the city, or the other side of the Menomonee valley. It was necessary for these passengers to travel through the down-town congested district, across the Menomonee valley at West Water street, and then proceed westward out along the National avenue or some similar line. This necessitated a couple of miles of unnecessary travel with the consequent loss of time, which could have been saved if the traffic were routed across the valley direct at some more western point.

A large number of car lines considered passed the important intersection at Third street and Grand avenue. This point is the most congested part of the city, and with the teaming, pedestrian traffic, likelihood of drawbridges being open, etc., it forms a point where cars were very likely to be delayed a considerable period. To avoid this difficulty, it was proposed to re-route several of the lines in the down-town district so as to make it unnecessary to cross this intersection, but yet bring the cars to within a short distance of this point and thereby relieve the congestion.

Getting On and Off

Another point covered in the investigation was the movement of passengers in alighting from and boarding cars. It was noted that passengers in Milwaukee were slow in alighting from and boarding cars as compared with the average passenger in other cities. Observations were made in St. Louis, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Duluth and Indianapolis. It was determined that during the evening peak in the down-town districts of Milwaukee, it required on the average one and a half seconds per passenger to board a car when ten passengers were getting on. This contrasted with 1.37 seconds in Duluth and St. Louis, where pay-as-you-enter cars are used, 1.25 seconds in Minneapolis, 1.20 seconds in St. Louis and St. Paul, and 1.02 seconds in Indianapolis. When five people boarded a car, the average in Milwaukee was also longer than in any other city. At Indianapolis five people would board a car in an average of 1.25 seconds per passenger, while at Milwaukee 2.12 seconds were required. And even when fifteen passengers were boarding a car, there was considerable difference in the time required by the average passenger between Milwaukee and other cities investigated. As a matter of fact, the best time made at Milwaukee was approximately 1.20 seconds per passenger, no matter how large the crowd, while the other cities attained an average of approximately .8 seconds per passenger when from fifteen to twenty people or more boarded the car.

At the first glance it would appear that this slowness was due entirely to the passengers themselves, but upon investigation it was ascertained that the company was partly to blame, due to its having no definite established stopping places for its cars. For instance, a car might stop exactly on the other side of the crossing, while the car following might stop a car length or so past this point. The people would generally congregate at a certain place, expecting to board the car there, and when the car proceeded thirty or forty feet past this point, it was necessary for them to walk or run to it. This caused a delay, and thus required considerably more time in boarding the cars than would otherwise be the case.

While this is a very brief statement of the Milwaukee investigation, it will probably serve to illustrate the manner in which the Wisconsin Commission endeavors to administer regulatory statutes relating to electric railways.

THE INIQUITOUS "TIP"

March 27, 1911.

The California Outlook,
Los Angeles.

Gentlemen:

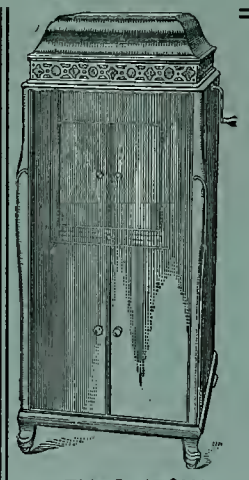
I was pleased to read in your last issue an article from the trenchant pen of your Mr. Willard on the subject of tipping. I do not believe that the average citizen realizes what a drain this iniquitous system is upon our people. I believe, if the actual truth could be known, that it amounts to more than the taxes the average citizen pays upon his property. This is a strong statement, but I believe the facts will bear me out. I do not need to go into details. You know them full well.

Like a good many private citizens, I have neither the time nor the inclination to devote myself to an agitation of such a matter, even though it be of grave importance. It seems to me, however, the privilege and, in such a case, the duty of the press, when convinced that the cause is a righteous one, to inaugurate and continue such agitation. Now that you have made a start along that line, I would like very much to see you follow it up, and, if possible, get other newspapers to do the same, to the end that by the time another Legislature shall meet, we shall have a public sentiment that will cause such an act to be passed.

Of all States in the Union, it seems to me that California would advertise herself most conspicuously, while at the same time doing a righteous aet, by the passage of such a law. We are headquarters for a tremendous number of tourists. If it could be generally known that when a tourist crosses the border into California, there would be no more tipping, it would be something worth while, I am sure. Besides, it would be a relief to our own citizens from what is now an unjust burden which we cannot well avoid.

I am informed that one or two states enacted such a law at recent sessions. Make it a misdemeanor to give or receive tips, compelling owners of hotels, restaurants, barber shops, etc., to display placards reciting the law, and the practice would soon end.

Another strong argument is in the improvement that must follow to the moral character of employees. Accepting tips debauches manhood and makes for servility. When once the new order is established employers will be compelled to pay increased, but still reasonable, wages, and the financial loss to employees will not be great. The Pullman Co. is a notable example of a greed- corporation, grown rich by compelling the public to pay its porters in tips, what they should have had in wages.



Truly yours,
D. B. LYONS.

Real Estate Mortgages

THE safest form of investment is a real estate mortgage on improved business or residence property in cities, provided it be selected with care and judgment. Such loans pay interest at the rate of six, seven or eight per cent, varying somewhat according to the amount loaned.

I make a specialty of securing such loans for my clients. My experience in building and knowledge of real estate values assure reliable appraisements and safe investments. I attend to drawing all papers, securing certificates of title, insurnce policies and the collection of interest without expense to the investor, the borrower paying all charges.

San Francisco's Opportunity

Only three candidates for Mayor of San Francisco now, A. W. Scott, Jr., having withdrawn in favor of James Rolph. How it would simplify matters if Charlie Curry would follow Scott's lead! Then the contest would be between P. H. McCarthy and James Rolph—between "Paris-of-America" conditions and a clean and economical form of municipal government.—Napa Register.

World-Wide Peace Coming Nearer

The proposed "peace compact" causes general rejoicing in England and all Germany welcomes the idea of a smaller army and navy. The man or men who make war impossible will go down in history so far ahead of those who made war that in the future such heroes as Xerxes and others will stand in about the same light as the notorious Nero of Rome. This peace proposition is the real Christian doctrine, and must become popular if one-half the people are civilized.—Willows Journal.

San Francisco's Marvelous Five-Year Record.

It is significant that on the fifth anniversary of the San Francisco disaster, San Francisco civic leaders should be meeting to consider which of several sites should be used for the expenditure of twelve and a half million dollars of city money for exposition purposes, says the Fresno Republican. Five years ago the greater part of the city was in smoking ruins. Now, the city will probably have to spend, unless the Golden Gate park is chosen, many thousands of dollars in buying up and clearing away buildings on any of the proposed sites. This in itself tells a story of growth unparalleled in the history of the world.

When, four years from now, the Panama canal shall have been built; when half the commerce of the world shall have been diverted to a new route across the isthmus and comes sweeping up the coast; when California shall have increased 50 per cent in population again, and the Bay district has expanded into one great city; then men will observe the 18th of April as an historical event as old and as nearly forgotten as the days of the Argonauts, though it be but nine years gone.

Immigrants Being Diverted from This Country

According to an Antwerp cable, the diversion of European immigrants from the United States to Canada is said to be seriously affecting Atlantic steamship lines. One of the largest emigrant steamship lines in the trade has already diverted two of its steamers from the New York service to Canadian ports. The loss of immigrants who can find superior opportunities in Canada to those with which they are familiar in the United States is a serious one for this country. Canada has not yet reached a stage of development where labor conditions are bad. She needs immigrants for developing her natural resources, and that is the kind she is getting. The United States, unfortunately, does not make it plain to the foreigners that the eastern cities are not the the only prosperous places in America. Desirable immigrants are being frightened away from this country because they do not know that the great west can offer them every attraction that they can find in Canada.—Salinas Index.

California Should Have a Bank Guarantee Law

Developments in the failure of the Bank of Shasta County emphasize the necessity of safeguarding the public's money in these institutions as the "guarantee" law now does in Oklahoma and Kansas. Banks are a necessity to the business of the world, but they should be so hedged about by stringent policies of good business sense that such misuse of their privileges and of other people's money is brought to the lowest possibility.—Corning Observer.

Paying the Piper

Once again we want to relate our own experience. At election time, we tried to find out who had paid the men at the polls to pass out tickets, requesting our citizens to vote for amendment No. 1 and we were confronted with the statement that they dare not reveal who had hired them and who was paying for their work. Of course, the money that paid for binding this yoke on the neck of the people came at that time out of the pockets of the men who expected to be benefited, but it was only loaned for the occasion and now the galling part of the whole affair is that the people themselves are paying for the binding of that yoke upon their necks. It is strange that so many people can not discriminate for their own good and that they are unwilling to take disinterested advice when it is offered to them.—Pomona Times.

Vaccination Is No Longer Compulsory

Vaccination is no longer compulsory, but optional, and the lack of a vaccination certificate (or arm) is unnecessary for a child to become a pupil in our public schools. This vaccination problem has been the rock upon which many schools throughout California have been split up and nearly wrecked during the last few years, including our own schools.

The Mail believes the new law to be a very sensible one, and it cannot possibly work hardship upon any child so far as school privileges are concerned; this journal has opposed compulsory vaccination right along, and believes the amendment is a decided advance step.—Los Gatos Mail.

Senator Works' Prediction

It did not take Judge Works long to assert himself. His prediction that unless the Republican party shall heed the demand of the people for the initiative, referendum and recall it will go down to defeat, final destruction and oblivion was a prophetic warning from the West.—Chico Enterprise.

State Needs a New Engineer

The Los Angeles Times sets up a great roar against Governor Johnson because it is reported that he intends to appoint a new state engineer to succeed Nate Ellery. The officers of State institutions for which he has planned buildings regard him as unpractical and incompetent. He makes some extravagant claims of economy and efficiency but they will not bear investigation. For the best good of the State, we certainly hope the report is true that Governor Johnson will name a new man. Ellery is too small size for the job.—Riverside Press.

Regenerating Prisoners by Putting Them to Work

Columbus, Ohio, has learned what to do with her municipal prisoners. She has put them to work, not on the rock-pile, but in the cultivation of the gardens around the work house.

As yet the system is only in the experimental stage. By and by more of the city's culprits will be put to work. Then more will be expected of them.

How much more sensible this is than keeping prisoners confined in cells, particularly such as those of our city prison, or compelling them to break rock never used for anything.

Outdoor employment is the thing for men serving sentences for petty crimes. Open-air and the inspiration of nature are the great rejuvenators of mankind, spiritually as well as physically.

The prison farm is a great success in one Canadian province, where men at liberty on honor make the soil yield, and live almost as free as their brothers. Is there any reason why the system cannot be made a success by cities?—Sacramento Bee.

New Precedent for Freight Traffic

The Interstate Commerce Commission in an Ohio case, has ruled that steam railroads may be compelled to make freight connections with suburban electric trolley lines where it can be shown that otherwise a long and expensive wagon haul would result. This makes a new precedent for freight traffic and is likely to be applied generally.—Redlands Review.

Judges and Horses

California Outlook does not, as a rule, pay anonymous communications the compliment of public notice, but one received from a lawyer commenting on the allegory or fable that recently appeared on the first page entitled "Recalling Horses and Judges," deserves something more than a shot at the waste basket.

It begins thus:

"You fool, do we select officers to guide, judge and direct the intricate and perplexing destiny of the republic, or do we select men for public life simply to place their humble shoulders in a prepared collar to feel a fixed load hitched to them without their judgment, knowledge or consent?"

Is that enough to show the course of the argument? If not, these two short paragraphs may be added:

"We choose a judge because he knows more than we, not as we choose a horse for which all through its life of usefulness we must supply the thought and direction."

"You fool, since God made man have not men chosen from among them those who should be their leaders? They also choose slaves, servants and horses."

Now we do not in the least mind being called a fool. That is all in the day's work. But what really worries and grieves us is the thought that there may be a number of perfectly innocent people who will put their affairs in the hands of a lawyer who is so hopelessly stupid as to think the parable or fable meant that judges are no better nor wiser than horses.

We doubt if there is a nine-year-old boy in the public schools of California who, if shown the fable, would not instantly translate; that if the people were competent to elect judges they are also competent to act on their recall, just as a farmer lad who was compelled to buy horses would be competent also to pass on their merits after they were in use. The illustration would hold equally well if we had used seed-corn instead of horses, and councilmen instead of judges. Only in that case our correspondent would have chided us for comparing a human being to a vegetable, which, it is notorious, bear no resemblance to one another.

And yet we say women are not intelligent enough to vote!

We shall hesitate hereafter to draw any analogy in which a jackass figures, being fearful lest our anoymous correspondent should take umbrage at a personal allusion.

does he still stand pat? Does he think that Espeeism is not dead, but only sleeping? And with one optic open? In the continued standpatism of Perkins there is matter for concern.

Oakland's Primary The Oakland primary has its significant side beyond the mere local interests in that the Socialists polled a surprisingly big vote, many more votes, it is likely, than there are Socialists in Oakland. Of the 20,000 votes cast about one-third were cast for the Socialist ticket with the result that the finals will generally be fought out by the Mottites and the Socialists. The anti-Mott, non-Socialists may hold the balance of power. What will they do with it? Many good people opposed Mott because of what they call the Mott machine which, they claim, has been running the city hall at its own sweet will, and yet these same reformers mainly cast their ballots for candidates openly favored and worked for by the Kelly-Cook Court House ring, a machine of greater danger and far less repute than that which Mayor Mott is charged with having organized. It is not likely that the court house crowd will make common cause with the Socialists unless they can make some working agreement with the Socialists whereby the ring candidates for certain offices shall have Socialist support, but if the Socialists stoop to conquer in that way they will forfeit that repute for political integrity and straightforwardness which is now their chief stock in trade. As explained last week, men are voting the Socialist ticket, not because they are Socialists, but because they would sooner trust the Socialists to be honest than some of the non-Socialist political machines and politicians. We shall not surely know what combinations are made until the vote is counted, but certain it is that Mayor Mott will be the storm center, and if all those who did not vote for him in the primary election voted against him, and will vote against him again, they can beat him unless the voters who did not vote at all at the primary rally in his support. The Watchman looks for this to happen. He is inclined to the opinion that the anti-Mott vote was all out at the primary, but his friends were not all there. Besides, the Socialist record that Berkeley made has not made Oakland envious of its neighbor's notoriety.

Something Dubious Sacramentans have formed an association with the view of getting a portion of the State road fund with which to construct a State boulevard down the river to Rio Vista and across the country to Suisun. It is just a bit dubious whether the purpose is to make the levee the road or the road the levee, a good thing either way, but rather more adroit the latter than the former. When the people of the Sacramento valley take hold of river rectification with a broad-minded statesmanship the State should meet them one-third of the way anyhow, but any purpose to make State highway building a factor in reclaiming overflowed lands should be scrutinized with great care before action is taken.

Per contra, the movement toward securing a portion of the State highway fund, or a special appropriation, to help Sierra and Plumas counties secure an all-the-year-round road out to the rest of the world has the presumptions all in its favor by reason of illustrating the peculiar field wherein State aid to public roads is warranted by the need and, further, by the inability of the shut-in people to get a road out in any other way. It is a pity that a sounder public sentiment regarding road making had not developed before that $18,000,000 proposition was submitted.

Berkeley Obdurate Berkeley was afforded an opportunity at its general election, held last Saturday, to recant its Socialistic tendencies if it desired to but it failed signally. In fact it did it again and seemed to joy in doing it. The Socialists all went to the polls, went early and voted hard, while the unco good washed their hands of the whole business of government and stayed away from the polls. The result is that the Socialists will control both the council and the school board and nothing stands in the way of their working out their own sweet wills except the constitution of the United States, which exacts the fulfillment of contracts and due process of law; the constitution of the State of California, which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without due compensation being made; the laws of the State, which are individualistic and not socialistic in their intents and purposes. As stated by The Watchman after the Berkeley primary, so he now reaffirms, that Berkeley has not in fact become Socialist but only Socialistic. At the general election last November, the Socialists cast, what was then looked upon as a phenomenal vote, about 700. At the election on Saturday, Mrs. Carlisle, candidate for member of the school board, got four times as many votes and the out-and-out Socialist candidates for commissioners received more than three times as many votes as could be mustered in November last. The crux of the whole conflict is the belief, widely entertained, that the public service corporations serving Berkeley are charging exorbitant rates for inadequate service. Hence the people of Berkeley, not knowing what else to do, have pretty generally placed their thumbs at the ends of respective noses and twirled their fingers in the faces of the conservative folk generally and in the faces of the promoters of the public service corporations in particular. Not much will come of the change for the reason that, for instance, when water is brought, municipally, to Berkeley it will have to be brought in cooperation with all the Bay cities. Berkeley's street car system is only part of the East Bay system and cannot be separated from it, and even for lights it were better to go to the mountains for power than to attempt to generate it on the ground with coal or oil. However, having had a good "cuss up one side and down the other," Berkeley is pretty sure to experience a season of ecstatic sense of relief. Not much else will result unless Oakland goes Socialist too, which does not seem very likely, although it might also happen.

Getting in Bad on the Tariff The Democrats, now hazarding strange fortunes in Washington, may also greatly facilitate the renomination of President Taft. Canadian reciprocity is essentially a manufacturer's measure, but it is a good measure neverthelss. It will tend to lower the cost of living (it will not do it much but its tendency will be in that direction) and it will open new and much needed markets for New England's wares. It is a good measure for the reason that it makes for the solidarity of the English speaking peoples on this continent, but it is not for this, the paramount reason for supporting it, that anyone is supporting reciprocity with Canada in Congress or out. It is a manufacturer's measure and yet the Democratic liberals in Congress are championing it, but they are doing so through arguments largely leveled at the protective theory of tariffs. No matter how they vote or what they do, or how they construct their political platforms and pronunciamentos, if Democratic leaders denounce the protective theory of tariffs in debate, through the press and on the rostrum, they will kill themselves off in 1912, as they have done times without number, and make President Taft a sound protectionist, the champion of the protected interests. The country wants lower tariff, but not a tariff for revenue only. It wants fair trade but not free.

Joe Cannon's Reason Why Old Joe Cannon arrayed himself against Canadian reciprocity for the reason that it will tend to reduce the prices of American farm products and, consequently, the value of American farming lands. He is right about it. The new lands of the Canadian northwest will, for a while, produce lavishly and, if our markets are opened freely to those products, there can be no doubt that certain American staples will be, if not reduced in price, at least prevented going higher. The same will be true of American lands which produce such products, whereat all should rejoice, even the speculator. Every good citizen and humanitarian will value the well-being of the race above a chance at the unearned increment. Of all economic problems there is not another so important, so threatening, as the advance in farms and farm products in this country. After ten thousand years of westward migration the tide is being turned back here where we live and, in the turning back, is enormously enhancing the value of every arable acre, not only on this continent but in all Europe as well. The time is at hand when a youth, who has attained his majority with no other capital than brain and brawn, will toil half a life time before he will possess himself of forty acres in fee of good American soil. Farm products and values in the United States have doubled in ten years. To have them double again will mean that the multitude of farmers will be landless forever. Joe Cannon's "Reasons Why," truthful within themselves, are exactly such as should prompt him to vote for, not against Canadian reciprocity, as postponing the landless day, thus affording our sons and daughters opportunity to get land before it is everlastingly too late.

THE GOOD ROADS PROBLEM

Editor California Outlook:

Dear Sir:—Your paragraph last week, concerning the expenditure of that $18,000,000 road fund touches the really sore place in this whole road problem.

With all the talk of good roads, good roads conventions, and perennial newspaper agitation of the subject, who has suggested a way to get the roads under the supervision of someone who really understands road-construction? As the matter stands all the road-money is now spent under the direction of the County Supervisors. They are not elected because they have proved themselves to be masters in the science of road-building. Far from it. It is all politics, and in turn the Supervisors parcel out the work under them upon the same basis. Occasionally a man gets on the job who has a bit of natural skill in road-making. He gets the right mixtures of soil and the right slope of surface. And he makes the whole scheme a delight to the eye, and a pleasure to the traveler. Another will spend the same amount of effort—and money—and leave the road a sight for disgust and despair.

As a consequence of this condition it is a safe estimate to say that we are getting about half the results that we should from the money now being invested in road construction.

How is this condition to be remedied?

There is but one way. Reorganize the whole system of road supervision. Require each County Board of Supervisors—or joint County Boards where desirable—to select from an eligible list furnished by a State Board of Highway Commissioners, a highway engineer, who shall spend his entire time in actual supervision of the roadways in that district. All money would be expended and all local appointments made upon his recommendation.

He would be the man held accountable for the condition of the roads in his particular district.

But I have run ahead of my tale. The vital part I have left to the last.

In our State University and possibly in our polytechnic schools should be established a Department of Highway Engineering, where the whole problem, surveying, grading, roadbed making, surface mixing, etc., would be studied and demonstrated in every detail. It might be difficult to find men competent to undertake the supervision of these departments. It might be even necessary to go to the Old World to secure them. But gotten they should be.

From the young men graduated from these departments, would be made up, through examination, the list of eligibles as furnished to the County Boards of Supervisors by the State Highway Commission.

In this way as in no other the work of road-making, vitally important as it is to the progress of civilization, would be given a new standing in the commonwealth, and an important public service established in which every young man might feel proud to engage.

Very truly yours,
RAY P. BRUBAKER.

deck cars be replaced by double-deck cars that take no more track space and carry about twice as many passengers?

I have seen cars constructed for this very purpose in use in many cities. They are no experiment. Depend upon it, however, that objections will be urged by the companies and their friends, to this or to any other plan that costs more money than to haul the people standing up. There is some clear profit in a standing load and why not get it as long as the people will stand for it? However, I have it from recent and good authority that the city can, if necessary, force public-service corporations to give the service the public is supposed to be entitled to. I wish these things might be brought about without force but experience tells us that militant methods and militant methods only will bring results of value to the people.

Conditions in Los Angeles

Our own street railways can well afford to deal fairly with the people for they are favored in many ways. Most cities have eliminated grade crossings. We have not. Many cities have expensive elevated tracks. We have none. Many cities for a five-cent fare and others for a three-cent fare have spent vast sums for subways. Our fares are the highest but we have no subways. Some cities have their trolleys under ground. Ours are on poles. Some cities have groove rails. We are using rails that can be bought for less money. In Europe cars with no cushions are called second class and charge less fare. Our city line is without cushions. The railways in eastern cities pay large sums of money to keep snow and ice cleared from their tracks and they lose much power from their wires being coated with ice. We do not have this to contend with. Some cities, like Chicago, require the railway companies to sprinkle their own tracks. In Los Angeles we do that for them. Our companies pay only three-fourths of a cent for a k. w. hour of electric power. The franchise tax is so arranged as to be favorable to the companies. Since the passage of amendment No. 1 their taxes are reported to be light, at the expense of the public. We have been told by good authority that it is proper to consider the increase in value of a company's real estate holdings near its right of way in determining the amount of its earnings. A moment's thought will remind you that our companies have profited very largely from this source.

What about their dealings with the public? Some cities have universal transfers. We do not. Not even transfers from a beach line, for instance, to its own city lines. Cars made to accommodate forty passengers are day after day, not on special occasions, but on just ordinary days, hauling twice their capacity. This means about the same as a ten-cent fare for the company. There are some things due our people from the street railways and we should have them without further delay.

We Want the Endorsement of the Common People

Nothing in the world of cartoon today is attracting more attention than the "common people" characters created by Herbert Johnson, of the Philadelphia North American, some examples of which we reproduce on this page. These cartoons attract attention because they contain a great truth. They depict the fact that the "common people" are at last coming into their own

THE common people are breaking the shackles which have so long bound them because they are beginning to know what are their rights. More and more are they asserting themselves in the selection of the men who shall represent them in the government of city, State and country.

THE CALIFORNIA OUTLOOK is striving to preach the truth as it conceives it. This paper is not published for profit; its mission is to help the people in their fight for the largest possible measure of self-government.

Why Is the Supreme Court So Slow?

WHY IS the Supreme Court of the United States so slow in bringing in a decision in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases? Have they managed to divide nine justices by two and have the quotient come out so evenly as to make a majority decision impossible? Or have they contrived a three-phase division that lands our high-browed casuists nowhere in particular? Not that the decision will settle anything, for it will not unless it settles it right, but there is a growing public impatience to learn what the best guess of that court is on the monopoly issue.

Harmony and the Exposition

ONE OF THE GOOD THINGS predicted for the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco is the restoration of harmony after the internecine strife stirred up by the graft prosecutions. Harmony is good unless it is used to cover up a multitude of sins that ought to lie exposed stark and naked in the market-place, that men may not forget the sinfulness of sin. There are many damaged reputations in San Francisco that would like well enough to seek cover under anything less weighty than a mountain. It will be a good thing for San Francisco to reunite all factions in a common interest, provided that the besmirched do not brazenly force their respective personalities into publicity. It will always be sanitary for the tainted to stay in the shade.

Whiskers vs. Bald Heads

EVEN THE TARIFF DISCUSSION in Washington must go away back and sit still until debaters of national repute have determined whether or not whiskers are a greater detraction from manly beauty than bald heads. While, in a sense, the wearer of windy whiskers has his own calamity within his own hands, there is nothing that a bald-headed man can do to save himself if the convolutions of his brain persist in wearing the clinches off his hair on the inside—where he can't get at 'em. But now come high officials of His Majesty's navy and advocate the general wearing of whiskers out of commiseration for the bewhiskered state of their sovereign king, whereas the subject of no sovereign has been so abject in his devotion as to suggest shaved heads in sympathy with a bald headed monarch, an argument by implication for the unparalleled calamities of the bald. The issue is momentous. The outcome of the discussion will be awaited with breath baited with cloves.

That Thing of the Past

"REBATING is a thing of the past," unctuously declared many a railroad magnate after that President Roosevelt had keel-hauled them over the coals for their crimes. They were wont, in the profundity of their contrition, to concede that muck-raking had rendered an important service to commerce in penalizing the offense of rebating, and to the railroads, too. Now comes the United States grand jury at Cleveland, Ohio, and indicts half a dozen big roads and implicates the United States Steel Corporation, for rebating. It would seem that the pious frauds, thinking that Roosevelt was gone and that Taft wasn't looking, resumed their rebating iniquities where they left them off. If so let no mercy be shown. Make the next twenty-nine-million-dollar penalty stick. Nothing but fear of confiscation will prevent successful rascals from plying their rascalities. It is only when sin ceases to be profitable that it becomes ugly in their eyes. Give it to 'em, Mr. Wickersham.

Another Per Cent. or Two

THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION is on record as fixing the monopoly line at whatever is above sixty per cent. of the production of any commodity and pointing with pardonable pride to its own forbearance in controlling only 55 per cent. of the American product of steel and iron. However, if the report of the purchase of the Risdon Iron Works of San Francisco be not a canard then this great corporation has dared to approach the monopoly line by a per cent. or two in the taking over of this plant with the purpose of making it quite the biggest thing of its kind on the Pacific Coast. The per cent. theory of monopoly is questionable. The question at bar is: Who fixes the prices and controls the output and how does he do it? If these things be done they are monopolistic even if the men who do it do not produce twenty-five per cent. of the total product.

Held Up

POOR LORIMER was held up. In the light of recent developments there can be no question about it. He could not be elected to the United States Senate without "coming through," either in person or by proxy, and, in accordance with our modern code of "performers" ethics, there was but one thing to do. Much they regretted the necessity without a doubt, but his lumbering and packing friends made up the necessary "slush" fund, deposited it where it would do the most good and went their respective ways washing their hands of the filthy pool of politics. Alas for them! Not all the perfumes of Araby can make those hands smell sweet, for the national conscience has decreed that whoso cannot get what he wants without bribery must get on as best he may without it. There is no other way to save the nation from an all-pervading pollution.

Los Angeles and Labor Unions

THE STATEMENT made by several labor leaders that the dynamite suspects would not enjoy a fair trial in Los Angeles because of the prejudice that exists in that city against labor unions is a serious reflection on the honor and fairness of the Los Angeles people, and one that they will vigorously resent and repel. There is no warrant in the facts for any such statement nor for any theory that looks in that direction. Neither as a city, officially, nor as a collection of individuals, in any undue proportion, is Los Angeles opposed to the labor union; and even if it were, its people would find no trouble in being perfectly fair toward men who were to be tried for a serious crime to which terrible penalties are attached.

It is easy to account for the existence of such a belief. This is not the first time an American city has been misunderstood and misrepresented through the intemperate and noisy utterance of a newspaper. That Los Angeles supports a paper that has for many years fought the unions as such, proves nothing in itself. All cities have their newspaper "queer fish." This paper has grown strong on the business side, because for ten or fifteen years it has been allowed its own way in the morning field, one of its rivals being financially weak and the other insincere and ridiculous; but it has not for some time enjoyed the slightest particle of influence with its readers. There have been repeated tests on this, with invariably the same result. An interesting example has just occurred. Fifteen charter amendments were up to be voted upon. Nobody was particularly interested in them, and no campaign was made in their behalf. The Times frantically appealed to its readers to vote against them all—not for any particular reason, but just because it hated some men on the charter committee. The Socialists and labor union people campaigned against two of the amendments, and one of these was defeated while the other ran close. The rest carried, most of them by overwhelming majorities. Now there are some people who invariably vote against all charter amendments, so some negative vote is to be expected on all. This time, with the Times putting up a fight, it was less than half its usual size! But this is only one of a hundred examples that might be cited.

This is something not easy for people who have never visited Los Angeles nor talked with the progressive citizens of that place to understand, viz: that although the Times is able to collect an extraordinary tribute in money from the Los Angeles business men, which has made its owners enormously rich, the paper itself is totally without influence among the people at large.

There is in Los Angeles a very general sentiment in favor of the open shop for which the Times impertinently claims credit. But that paper has never advocated the open shop. It has always been for the closed non-union or anti-union shop. "Allow no union men anywhere on the premises" is the advice it invariably offers employers.

It should be added, merely to get the record straight, that within the past ten days or two weeks, the Times has notably changed its tune on many of these subjects. After having for many years done all in its power to stir up class antagonisms, after hounding the unions with every kind of coarse epithet and distortion of fact, after daring them to do their worst, until at last the worst was done and a score of Times employes went to their death, that paper now wheels about and assures its readers that it has no objection to unions, and desires to see the American workman improve his condition. This from a concern that has never lost a chance to sneer at all remedial legislation, and in whose columns will be found denunciation of every strike that has taken place in twenty years, no matter what the cause, is most edifying. But the reason is not far to seek; for the one passion that can compete with avarice in the ignoble soul is terror. A great fortune has been made by abusing those who toil—but the game must be laid aside for the nonce.

There is no bitterness in the hearts of the people of Los Angeles against the workers that band together in unions to help themselves and their fellows to better conditions. No bitterness, indeed, but rather the strongest sentiment of cooperation and encouragement. Ideals of law and order prevail in that community, just as they do in all progressive American communities, and they are enforced against labor unionists as they are against all others, no more and no less. Until there is a trial the question of the guilt or innocence of the suspects will be held open and without prejudice in the minds of Los Angeles people, but on the showing that is made every intelligent man must admit that there is enough apparent evidence against these men to justify their arrest and trial. To admit that is not at all to prejudge them; and the labor union leaders that ascribe to prejudice what is merely sane citizenship deserve to lose influence and standing not only with the general public but with their unions as well.

Adaptation to Condition

THE LAW OF ADAPTATION to conditioning environment is inexorable. The thing that does not conform to it perishes from the earth and this will prove just as true of a judiciary as of a field mouse, a lobster or three-toed horse.

In commenting upon the recent decision of the New York Court of Appeals, on the Workingman's Compensation Act, the London Times, in effect, says: "To read this decision is to go back to a world which has, for us here in England, as good as passed away; to a time when the early Victorian economists dominated public action, social legislation and the decisions of the courts. The older idea of individual freedom of contract, in the relations of capital and labor, now has its special home, some would say its last refuge, in America. The various decisions of American courts upon the ever-growing mass of labor legislation are not reconcilable and, to the layman, they appear to be capricious. The lawyer must own that many of them rest upon refined and obscure reasoning. The legislatures must often be quite uncertain whether or not their work will be torn up by the roots by the American courts."

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican, in commenting upon this quotation, says: "It is inevitable that such a state of affairs should exist, for our written constitution was made, and the great pioneer judgments of the courts were rendered, at a time when individualism was supreme in political philosophy and economic theory."

But why must our courts lag fifty years behind the changed fact? It was tardiness no more serious than that which froze the Siberian elephants in ice, to have their carcasses thawed out and eaten by sledge dogs thousands of years later. A fatality not less tragic may await a judiciary whose tardy mental processes, and subserviency to the traditions of men, keep it plodding along half a century behind contemporaneous fact, to say nothing of the leaders of thought and the makers of progress. There can be but one outcome of such a policy as dominated the New York Court of Appeals in the Workingmen's Compensation Case. It is a just law and a necessary. The court that condemned it as much as admitted its justice and necessity, yet nullified it by a strained and traditional train of reasoning that might have been tolerable half a century ago but is so no longer. Unless courts keep pace with contemporary needs they will find themselves in America as in England, deprived of power to declare any statute unconstitutional and void, and the judiciary will become distinctly subordinate to the legislative authority instead of coordinate as we, in America, have attempted to make it.

It is believed by the best legal advisers of the friends of the nullified New York law that if the case could be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States it would be reversed, but it cannot. The New York court was the court, but not the tribunal, of last resort. New Jersey has enacted a similar law, avoiding the New York objection by making it, like the California law, optional with employer or employed whether to come under its provisions or not, yet so loaded down with restrictions, as the California statute is not, as virtually to compel its acceptance lest a worse thing happen under the general law of employers' liability. That will be accomplished by indirection which cannot be accomplished directly merely to save a traditional form of interpretation, which also should be legally unallowable as being in contravention of straightforwardness and downright common sense.

But the world must move, social systems must meet social needs and human laws must somehow conform to human facts, and they will even if, to accomplish such ends, the judiciary be made as subordinate to the legislative department of government as the army, the navy or the police now are. It is not true that the employing corporation and the individual worker meet upon terms of equality in which to contract; that is only true when the employing corporation is confronted by a union of laborers embracing all the help needed, solid as the union of American states, invincible as a phalanx—for which confronting the employing corporation has small stomach.

The law of adaptation to condition is inexorable. Tardy courts may hinder, but they cannot prevent the conformation of the laws of men to the needs of men, although by their unenterprising tardiness, they may sacrifice to legislature and executive an increasing share of that independent prerogative of which our courts ever have been so proud.

The Ultimate Producer

WHEN THE HIGHWAYMAN holds a pistol to the head of the belated citizen, he does not say "Your money or your life." That is for the melodrama. What he says in real life is: "Come now, produce."

It is a good word, produce—not as graphic perhaps as "cough up," but less vulgar.

We have heard a lot about the ultimate consumer, but it is really the ultimate producer that we are interested in. And it is not merely in the tariff that he figures as a most important factor, but in all forms of taxation—all other forms of taxation, tariff being only one form.

Taxation is a kind of highwaymanship. It presents a pistol to your head and tells you to "produce." To be sure, the purpose is most laudable, but for that matter so may be the purpose of the highwayman. What do we know, anyhow, about the final ambitions and hopes of the strong-arm gentleman who carries off our watch and loose change? When he gets enough he may intend to go into the oil business, and when he has enough wells and refineries and pipe lines, he may plan to bestow millions on universities.

But, to carry the simile a bit further, while ordinary taxation is a highwayman, the tariff is a sneak thief who creeps in, silent and unnoticed, and takes all your most cherished possessions—as you find out later. It even steals the blankets off the bed of the sleeping sick man and he wakes up shivering and coughing. It draws the nutriment out of the food of the working woman, so that she crumples up easily when disease strikes her. It has fern-seed in its shoes and walks invisible, and it floats through the walls of your home as lightly as a wireless message. All this may be for our good, just like the other kinds of taxation—we are not discussing that part of it—but the really hard part to understand is that we cannot escape it by any process of hiding nor by denying that it exists.

The American people are in for a long, head-aching course of study on the subject of taxation—all kinds of taxation from the tariff down to the poll-tax. It is a tremendous subject, and looks dry and tiresome from the outside. Like the high-school boy sitting down to a long algebra lesson that bristles with exponents and radical signs and equation marks, we just do hate to begin. But there is no way to dodge it. Twenty years hence, if a great historian should be asked to say in one short sentence what the American people had been busy about during those two decades, he would answer: "Rearranging taxation to give free opportunity to all men." It does not sound for much, but it means changing the national constitution and the constitution of every State in the Union, a complete face-about for all our courts, the obliteration of thousands of ancient and incrusted decisions, customs, laws, opinions and beliefs; it means experiments and failures, the ripping up of political parties, the rewriting of the so-called "science" of economics, the reorganization of business with attendant panics and depressions—yes, and in the long run, not in those decades, perhaps, but in those that are to follow, it means lifting up a lot of people that we are now trampling into the mire beneath us; it means an end to cruel poverty and to demoralizing over-wealth; it means the reorganization of society on the basis of common welfare, not of individual greed. This is not socialism that we are talking about, not a dream of what might be, if—but just the application of plain horse-sense to the matter of taxation, and abiding by the result.

But there is a world of work to do before we can get to that, and first of all, the people must study these questions, so as to be ready to act upon them when they get the chance, when the government shall come into their hands. For a long time we have held to the belief that these complicated financial matters should be left to the financiers to settle. They have done so, and here we are—with everything rapidly getting no better. Now it is the turn of Mr. C. People who lives at the corner of Referendum Avenue and Initiative Street. Let him try his hand. He is a bit slow at understanding things, even the things that are for his own good. He is not much given to theories and complications. He sticks to the foundations and takes direct, easy ways. But he is a tremendous winner in the long run.

Eh, sirs, but it is a wearisome job to think of, these problems of who pays the tax, and who gets the benefit, and who is the ultimate producer, and what is the ultimate result, and what would be the result of this change and that change. No wonder the people shy off and hang back and suggest that we go to the moving picture show or even to church, instead. But all these lessons and many others must be learned, not only by us who are bubbling over with the spirit of making things better, but also by those who are either too rich or too poor to care one way or the other; not only by ordinary people with good intellects but also by those who are way up socially, who eat five meals a day and whose craniums are filled with suet. Yes, and they must be understood equally by the employer who regards a strike-breaker as the embodiment of industrial freedom, and the labor unionist who thinks the only important point about city government is to get a union label on the public printing.

Hard work; but it cannot be escaped!

A Municipal Platform

The city executive committee of the Good Government Organization in Los Angeles has drawn up one platform of general and another of specific principles relating to the city government and its operations during the next few years. These will be acted upon at some future meeting of the committee, and in the meantime they are laid before the public with a view to getting the general opinion on their soundness and expediency.

This method of procedure is to be recommended. The attitude taken by the Governor and the late Legislature toward the Republican platform and the carrying out of its pledges in detail illustrates the new public conception of the function of the party platform—not mere buncomb to be ignored or wriggled out of, but an honest statement of principles and program to be lived up to by the party when in power. Such a platform is not to be adopted lightly and hastily by some small body of the party membership. It is a serious matter that may very wisely be put forth first in tentative fashion, as this one seems to be, and adopted after the rank and file of the party membership has had a chance to be heard on the subject.

As the Good Government Organization carried the last three elections in Los Angeles, viz., the recall in April 1909, the general city election in December 1909 and a special election for councilmen in June 1910, and carried them all by strong and increasing majorities, and as, furthermore, it has made a generally admitted success of the administration of city affairs, the utterance of this body and its declaration of principles upon which a future administration will be based, if it is again put in power, will be of serious interest to the voters of Los Angeles, and may have some bearing on municipal politics in other cities of the State.

The general principles, three in number, are: Non-partisanship in the selection of public officials, conservation to the people of all publicly owned property and privileges, and ultimate municipal ownership of all public utilities.

The specific or local application of these principles is given in a statement of ten important points which include the distribution of electric power and light by the city, the construction of the harbor railway, consolidation of city and county, establishment of public forum, public inquiry into industrial conditions, and framing of a new charter under the commission plan.

Senate Constitutional Amendment Number 6

(This series of articles on the proposed constitutional amendments is intended mainly to open the discussion. The writer of them had not the advantage of hearing them discussed in committee and before the Legislature and the views he holds regarding them are confessedly inexpert, but these amendments demand attention and the writer will handle them as best he may according to his lights. Discussion of them is cordially invited.)

THIS AMENDMENT PROPOSES that the legislatures shall hereafter meet as they have met, on the first Monday after the first day of January in odd numbered years, unless called in extraordinary session by proclamation of the Governor. So far it follows the beaten track.

But the first period of the session is to be of not exceeding thirty days duration. It may be less. During this opening period it is anticipated that all the legislation brought to the capitol building in the pockets of interested persons will be introduced and assigned to appropriate committees, discussed as much as may be in committee, amended if thought desirable or, at any rate, submitted to at least a preliminary examination.

During this period, of course, the two houses will perfect their organizations and put the machinery for legislating into working order, whereupon the members will pack the printed bills in their satchels and go home to think them over. A recess of at least thirty days may be taken. It may be longer. The Legislature may, in its regard for its own comfort, continue the recess until Sacramento's mean winter temperature becomes less mean and more decent, which usually happens between the ides of March and the first of April. In practice the recess would doubtless be forty-five to sixty days.

"On the reassembling of the Legislature no bill shall be introduced in either house without the consent of three-fourths of the members thereof." This will be pretty certain to enforce the introduction at the preliminary session of all bills in contemplation, all bills the need for which comes to light before the intermission. Still another inducement to introduce bills at the opening session is afforded by the provision that, "Nor shall more than two bills be introduced by any one member (even with a three-fourths consent) after such reassembling." Note that the language used is "three-fourths of the members thereof," not a mere three-fourths of the members present at some nick of time for a sharp practice coup. It is therefore safe to assume that all bills intended, prior to the assembling of the Legislature on the first Monday after the first day of January, to be introduced at all, will be introduced before the proposed recess. It would be unsafe to take chances on a later introduction and a hurrying the measure through without discussion. Only such measures will be introduced after the recess as shall thereafter have proved their need.

Finally, "the members of the Legislature shall be entitled to receive mileage at the rate fixed by law for their attendance on said session after said recess." The walking may not be good.

Now for a few reasons why: A legislature is presumed to be a deliberative body, but, practically, it is not. The racket is so great and the pressure so intense that no working member can hear himself think from the beginning of the session to the end of it. Everything is in a whirl and keps on whirling until car wheels whirl the members home after all is over. Then, for the first time, they think over what they have done. Some men, it is true, do their best work under pressure, but not all and certainly not the safest and best men. One of the crying needs of legislation is time in which to think things over. This the recess affords.

The superlative need, however, for sound legislation is knowledge of the subject upon which men are called to legislate. Few legislators have such knowledge beyond a very narrow range of subjects, and the proposed recess will give them time and opportunity to acquire such knowledge at least in crucial instances. They can read up, consult expert sources of information and return to their legislative duties, measurably well fitted to perform them and so not be forced, as they now are in most cases, to act upon first impressions, or be guided by how some other member votes, rather than upon ascertained knowledge. Great good, in this particular, may be hoped for from what has jocosely been referred to as Camminetti's bi-furcated legislative plan.

Finally, this recess of thirty to sixty days will afford the press and people of the State opportunity to turn the lime light of publicity upon all measures proposed. If there be bugs they will be found; if there be measures designed to meet the desires of special, rather than public, interests they will be discovered; if there be measures calculated to further public interests rather than special the forces of reform can be mobilized and a successful contest waged for their adoption.

No one can certainly foreknow just how the divided legislative session idea will work out in practice, but the chances seem to be in its favor and it is not easy to see how any harm can result. It will exact somewhat more of time and labor from the legislators, but that is paid for reasonably well and the exaction should not be seriously considered. The added expense will be slight. Legislation in this country has not been the success hoped for. With opportunity to give more time and quiet thought to the enactment of laws there will be less excuse for failure to legislate wisely and well. Under conditions that have obtained it has been impossible for even our best men to do as good work as has been needed to be done. May not California lead the Union in giving legislation a better chance? No institution is to be looked upon as a finished product that falls short of making best results at least possible.

The Inter-State Commerce Commissioners, however, point to the fact that the trains are still running.—Baltimore Sun.

An encore and a recall used to mean the same thing, but it is different now in office-holding circles.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Limit of Toleration The Watchman was amused at the reference his colleague made a fortnight since to the Times' man's assertion that the sex function fixed the limit of toleration of the male for the female of the human species, or words to that effect, and it set a train of recollection running. One is rather well justified in saying that opinion on that issue, if there be such an issue, is likely to depend on the company he keeps. The Watchman speaks from experience. For three state campaigns The Watchman wrote stuff for the Republican State Committee, 1896, 1898 and 1900. Those were stirring times, especially the campaign of 1896. Of course the Old Guard manned the works and the headquarters swarmed with politicians to the manner born, sons of Adam and children of nature all of them, just as they were fashioned from strictly human clay. Well, The Watchman never happened to catch a group of them together, just "gassing," when the subject for conversation was not either the sex relation, prize fighting or horse racing. Bob Fitzsimmons often graced the headquarters with his presence and when he did he was the center of a more than kindly interest. The emphasis was placed on the issues, as to relative importance, in the order named. They were hearty, jolly good fellows, one and all, who dined well and, after dinner, were seldom able to restore a pen to its rack on the desk in less than three stabs, everything kept moving so. They worked hard, early and late (chiefly late) to save the state to the gold standard (in which none of them had believed) and to the Republican party, which they all loved. And yet, judging from the burden of discourse, the Man from Mars would have been justified in assuming that the chief concern of Man was the sex relation and not government and not finance. After this came prize fighting and horse racing, then politics. The Watchman then and there came to the sorrowful conclusion that government must, in its operation, inevitably gravitate to second class men, second class in refinement, habits of thought, in knowledge of affairs and only first class in knowing how to get out the vote.

Different Last Year The Watchman was mistaken. The recent political revolution in California demonstrated that politics gravitates to second class men only when first class men shirk their duty. In two years of association with the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, and with the forces that achieved the victory in November last, The Watchman cannot recall a single instance in which he came upon any group of men busy swapping off-color yarns over a bar, across a table or anywhere else. Prize fighting was not a theme for conversation and if horse racing was mentioned at all it was only to emphasize the necessity for wringing the necks of the Emeryville crooks and touts in order that the unwary may be preserved out of their toils. It was a wholly different atmosphere. The men who came together from time to time in conference had but the one purpose, to redeem the party and redeem the state. Neither their mouths nor their thoughts were foul. The campaign of 1896, it will be remembered, was a suffrage campaign and often the Republican headquarters were thronged with women. That they were always politely received and courteously treated goes without saying. Any rudeness toward them would have been severely reprimanded, but the atmosphere of estimate of womanhood was not exalted. The restraint of the presence of women was irksome and breathing was easier when they were gone. There is a certain nerve strain attendant upon seeing to it that only refined language proceeds from a mouth where mortification has set in. It will be different with the suffrage campaign of next year. The limit of toleration accorded the female sex by the men about the Republican headquarters will far transcend the sex relation. It will recognize woman as a living soul, a companion, helpmate, counselor, as soldier of peace able to do battle for the common good. Woman, throughout her history, has been burden bearer, physical consort, companion and friend, and she is all these yet, owing to the company she is in. Knowing any man's view of woman we instinctively know where to place that man in the scale of human progress. He will not be better than the company he keeps.

Honor As Due While the atmosphere pervading Republican headquarters during the three campaigns above referred to, 1896, 1898 and 1900, was not morally sanitary, let it not be supposed that there was no virtue in it. There were many who gave of their time and their means, without hope of personal gain, for what they conceived to be the good of state and nation. There was not a little of real patriotism down at bottom, real courage, too, and moral courage at that. The Watchman calls to mind an instance where fault was found with him because he did not claim all that could be claimed with a show of right, the insistence being that the other fellows were not careful about the accuracy of their statements of fact which absolved us from being overscrupulous in regard to the truth. The Watchman defended his position and appealed to the state chairman, the late Major McLaughlin, to determine the issue. Without a moment's hesitation Major McLaughlin sustained the contention of The Watchman that not a thing should go out calculated to deceive any voter as to any fact, holding that the facts of our position were strong enough and, if they were not, then the other fellows ought to have the verdict. Not a piece of literature was prepared or sent out that was not believed to be valid in reasoning and true to facts. The leaders of the campaign were, themselves, innocent of a knowledge of public issues, but they fought a splendid campaign in the year 1896. Their carelessness of conversation made them seem less of men than they really were and yet, as types, they were distinctly inferior to the men of today. They needed a scrubbing inside and out.

Platform Pledges Taken Seriously If platform pledges are to be taken seriously we shall have to exercise a care about what goes into political platforms and what stays out. It is not impossible that the President may be responsible for the renewed emphasis that is being put upon political platforms. It will be remembered that, during the early months of his presidency, Mr. Taft made the platform of his party his sailing chart, much too seriously as it appeared to The Watchman, for there were good causes not in the platform upon which he was elected that The Watchman wanted to see him espouse, but he stuck to his platform as Shylock to his bond and unless policies were nominated therein they were of small concern to him. He even tried to make bad men good by virtue of platform pledges, with what success the Payne-Aldrich tariff measure was a lamentable exemplification. But the emphasis the President put upon platforms has stayed put. Governor Bass read the riot act to his legislature up in New Hampshire because it departed from the platform with the result that, in all but one or two particulars,

The Story of the Smart Fox and the Silly Goose

Once there was a big Goose. Oh! he was the most sure-enough Goose-Goose in all the country, because when the cunning, smart Fox held conversation with him, this Goose sold his vote to the sneaky one for nothing, or $10, which was the same thing, inasmuch as the $10 didn't anywhere begin to pay the Goose for the honor and respect he lost forever among all the barnyard flock. All the little children felt very sorry for the poor murdered Goose, and thought that, of course, the flock would punish the brutal, grabbing, unspeakable Fox. But the leaders of the flock, called judges, said no; that all sin and guilt was in the silly Goose alone. And so the smart Fox got away with it, even to Columbus, Ohio, and to Danville, Ill., as did the rich and sassy Fox called Paddy Calhoun.—Denver Express.

The Recall of the Judiciary

By RALPH W. CROSMAN

Athwart the perplexed pathway of the people's political progress, a pathway ever parted by new politica issues, forever burn the letters of one guiding rule, projected by the light of a thousand years' strife for self-government. And that rule is this: Whatever political proposal tends to alienate the sovereign power of the people, or to perpetuate in alien hands that degree of sovereignty already alienated, is vicious in theory and practice, and points to the downward path of political slavery; and whatever political proposal tends to conserve he sovereign power of the people, or to retrieve sovereignty already alienated, is salutary, and points to the upward path of political freedom. Judged by this standard, the proposal to constitutionalize the people's power o recall judges, is clearly a "step in the right direction."

The people of California will soon be called upon to accept or reject a constitutional amendment that gives themselves the power to recall from office administrative and judicial officials. Nobody seems to object to the proposal that the people exercise their inherent power to recall administrative officials who fail to perform their proper function; but many sincere and learned men think it would be an unwise and unsound practice for the people to recall judicial officials who fail to perform their function, or, if you choose, if the people think they thus fail.

Now before this question can be intelligently discussed, there are some fundamentals that must be called to mind. And it is only by holding these principles in mind that we can determine whether the exercise of the power of judiciary recall would be vicious or salutary, whether it would tend to promote the progress of the people along the political pathway they wish to pursue, or whether it would tend to retard that progress.

In the first place it is taken for granted that we are a self-governing people—automatous, organic and self-conscious—shaping our own destiny as a whole. At least that is the basis upon which we are organized, and these are the lines along which we must reason if we would not stultify ourselves individually and nationally. Though we proclaim vociferously enough, on occasion, that we are a great, self-governing people, we seem to forget that fact when we come to the practice of our political affairs. But we can never reach the truth of the question of judiciary recall, or any other political question, unless we at all times remember that the people are the only sovereign power.

Now if it means anything to say that the people are sovereign, it means that the power to perform every function of the political body comes from the people. It means that neither the legislature, nor the executive, nor the judiciary, nor any other department, body, commission, or individual, has any power whatever that is not derived from the people.

And this grant of power must necessarily be temporary and conditional, otherwise the people would not be self-governing. For in a self-governing people it is self-evident that whatever may be done politically is done by the people, and whatever may be left undone is left undone by the people. The people and the government are one. The people and all the departments of government—legislative, judicial, executive—are one. The people and the government succeed or fail together. The government is nothing more than the people performing their own political functions.

How, then, in the face of these self-evident facts, can it be argued that a self-governing people ought not to make all of their agents directly and quickly responsive to the people's will?

What an Independent Judiciary Means

Now the stock argument of those who oppose the people's intention to constitutionalize their power to recall judges, is that the judiciary ought, to use their exact words, to be "fearless and independent," and not subjected to the passions, prejudices, and whims of the people—generally referred to as "the mob."

Well, who would argue that an official should not be "fearless"? But whether he should be "independent," depends altogether upon what is meant. Of what or whom should he be independent? Is it meant that he should be independent of the influence of special interests? Very good. Is it meant that he should be independent of the popular interests, as so many judges are? That position cannot be successfully maintained. It cannot be successfully maintained that the judge should be independent of the popular will, and left free to lead the people whither they do not desire to go, even though he be technically within the law as he interprets it. For perhaps the judge himself virtually made the law behind which he seeks to shield himself from the will of the people.

But the point, probably, which the opponents of the amendment wish to make, is, that the work of the judiciary, which is to void, interpret, and apply the law, ought to be carried on in a purely scientific, impersonal, disinterested, unimpassioned way. It is probably meant that the judge ought to attend strictly to judging, and if the people do not like the result, let them change the law. It is probably meant that the judge has to deal with the law as it is made by the legislature, so long as it seems to him constitutional, and that if the results are not satisfactory, the legislature and not the judiciary, ought to be blamed.

But when it is thus argued that the judiciary should be left free and independent of the power of popular recall, it is apparently forgotten that the judge has the last word as a legislator. It is apparently forgotten that the judge is practically a lawmaker when he exercises his power to declare void laws made by the people.

And can a self-governing people thus abrogate its sovereign power of legislation, and remain a self-governing people? Certainly not. It is a contradiction in terms. The moment a self-governing people ceases to exercise directive control over all legislation, that moment that people ceases to be self-governing.

The Judge as a Lawmaker

It is also apparently forgotten by the opponents of the amendment, that the judge is virtually a lawmaker in countless decisions that shape and determine the political, industrial, and economic destiny of the people. And since the legislative function seems to be necessarily involved in the judicial function, in our present complicated political and industrial constitution, how can we refuse to exercise control over the judge and remain a self-governing people?

That the power of legislation is the highest function of government, is inherent in reason. And yet, many of our sincere and learned political leaders would advise a self-governing people to allow a department of government over which they have no direct control, to exercise this legislative function.

Indeed, so great a legislative power is the judiciary, so potent is it in shaping and molding our political, industrial, and economic destiny that the people actually renounce the principle and practice of self-government, when they neglect to exercise directive control over the judiciary.

The Dartmouth College Decision

That statement ought not to seem an exaggeration when we recall the fact that the present critical situation resulting from overgrown industrial combinations, is largely the result of a single judicial decision. The decision referred to is that of the United States Supreme Court, rendered in the Dartmouth College case, in 1819. Under cover of the provision of the Constitution forbidding impairment of contracts, this decision promulgated the doctrine that franchises and charters of corporations are contracts and cannot be repealed. And under the cover of this decision and others based upon it, swollen and malignant corporate bodies have been enabled to grow to such proportions as to threaten the very life of the body politic.

It took a quarter of a century to begin a reversal of the doctrine enunciated in the Dartmouth College case, that state legislatures could alienate forever the sovereign power of the people, and the poison of that decision has not yet been eliminated from our political and industrial system, despite the corrective action of state legislatures in reserving the power to repeal corporation charters and franchises.

Can it be supposed that the people would voluntarily proceed along a pathway marked out for them by such iniquitous decisions? Would the people willingly walk into the political, industrial, and economic slough in which they now find themselves, largely as a result of judicial guidance? It is inconceivable. They are led along by the powerful but subtle judicial "opinion," operating wholly outside the area of popular government.

And yet we are permitting today the same process of judicial legislation hostile to the people's will, to go on unchecked, each enactment being the potent parent of other decisions that in turn go on multiplying in ever-widening areas of oppressive power. For we are told that we ought not to exercise any control over the judiciary except by impeachment proceedings that cannot be made to "proceed," or by hard-to-secure, round-about legislation that the judge either throws out as unconstitutional or perverts in his interpretation and application.

People Determined on Self-Government

The common argument that the ignorance or passion of the people would throw the law into chaos or work hardship to upright judges, seems rather an unnecessary assumption. It is taken for granted by everybody that the people may know little or nothing about the facts of particular cases. They do not aspire to do the work of the judge. They have an abhorrence of interfering with their servants in the performance of their duties—a feeling that is based in a kind and tolerant, yes, much too tolerant, thought.

But the people, though they know nothing of the details of technical law, can perceive principle and they are perceiving it more and more every day. They have definite political ideals and they are fast learning how to achieve them. They see that their welfare and destiny is controlled by principles and policies; and they see that they can only remain a self-governing people by controlling, under God, those principles and policies. They see that, at present, these principles and policies are largely determined by the courts, and they reason that they can therefore remain a self-governing people only by controlling the courts.

Many of those who object to the judiciary recall seem at times to do so on the ground that the judge's work is laid out for him along fixed, scientific principles and that any action on the part of the people relative to his department, would necessarily be in the nature of unwarranted interference. But if the judge's work were thus laid out for him, objection should not be made to the judiciary recall for the same reason that objection is not made to the recall of administrative officers.

Then again opposition seems to be made to the amendment on the ground that the judge's work is not fixed for him, but is discretionary. And in truth it is because his work is discretionary, it is because he can go almost any way he desires and still be within the law as he interprets it, that the people insist on the power of recall. For the people know of no man or body of men, to whose unlimited and uncontrolled discretion they are willing to submit their present and future welfare, whether that judge do what he thinks is within the law or not.

Objections to the power of judiciary recall do indeed seem to be based on shifting ground.

A favorite argument of the opponents of the amendment is that upright judges would be afraid of the recall and would not serve; and that some fearful judges might give decisions in accordance with popular clamor rather than legal principles. Now aside from the fact that it is a wholly unwarranted assumption to say that judges would be thus fearful, let us see where the argument would lead us. Here the people have a political proposal, supposedly good in all other respects, but which they must not use because some of their servants in the undertaking might be fearful of the consequences of conscientious service. Upon what more debasing motive could the people act than that offered by this argument? To what an ignoble end would we as a nation come, were the people thus to abandon themselves to government by fear!

It might be argued that the universal tendency toward differentiation of function, that runs all through organic life from the lowest forms to the great governmental organisms, forbids the people to try to perform for themselves the functions of legislation and judicature. It might be argued that, in the light of the great lesson of organic differentiation, the people cannot take these highly specialized governmental functions upon themselves without reverting to the sluggishness and inefficiency of primitive types.

But such a view of the present proposition would be incomplete. It is not proposed that the people take over to themselves the judicial function. It is only proposed that they retain the essence of directive control. And in exercising immediate directive control over the various functions of the body politic, the people thus become an organism of the highest order, having learned the last great lesson in the long struggle to attain the science and art of self-government.

And this lesson is the lesson of political co-ordination. The central nervous system of the normal individual organism, for example, at all times maintains its control over the functions of all the organs of the body. To cut one of the major organs or systems off from control by the central nervous system, would result in death.

Now the people constitute their own body politic and their own central nervous system; and by that central will of the people, all governmental bodies, departments, commissions etc., performing governmental functions, must be governed, if the people would maintain an organic, self-governing, self-perpetuating life.

Not to subject the judiciary to this direct control of the people is an attempt to make the judiciary the central nervous system of the political body. Whereas, in truth, the people themselves, with their myriad means of intercommunion, are their own central nervous system.

And to argue that the judiciary, under the present loose-jointed representative system, is sufficiently under the control of the people, seems absurd. It is seriously advised, for example, that undesirable judges be removed by impeachment proceedings And when it is pointed out that only once in a generation can impeachment proceedings, as at present provided for, be made to "proceed," one eminent gentleman who opposes the judiciary recall says, "Then make impeachment effective."

And that is just exactly what the people propose to do in the amendment under consideration. They are about to take this man's advice and make impeachment effective. They are about to constitute themselves a high court of impeachment. And the court is going to be so organized that it will function at once when the stimulus of the popular will is applied.

Those who advise the people to use the present impeachment power, also explain that occasional judicial lapses and digressions can be corrected by legislation. And that, again, is just exactly what the people are about to do by means of the proposed amendment. They are about to take the advice of these gentlemen and remedy defective judicature by the most effective form of legislation known, and that is by removing the judges who jockey the plainly expressed will of the people.

If the judges can be virtual lawmakers by evasive interpretation, the people can be actual lawmakers by frankly unmaking the judges who fail to do the people's will.

In other words, the use of the power of the judiciary recall will take the last word in legislation out of the hands of the judge, and place it in the hands of the people.

AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

Sixty-second Annual Session to Be Held at Los Angeles.

The American Medical Association will hold its 62nd annual session in Los Angeles during the week commencing June 26th, 1911. This is the fourth time in its existence that this association of physicians and surgeons has held its meeting west of the Rocky Mountains, two of the previous meetings having been held in San Francisco and the third in Portland. This American Medical Association is the strongest national medical association in the world and has a membership of over 33,000 American physicians and surgeons. This will probably be the biggest and most significant convention to be held in Los Angeles in 1911.

NEW RESPONSIBILITY

All the older statistics of the votes of the people on State constitutional amendments, by what amounted to a referendum, indicated a discouraging apathy on the part of the people. Only a few voted on measures, as compared to the number who voted for men, and among these there was a tendency to resent being bothered, and to vote against measures indiscriminately, just as an expression of that resentment. The lesson of the figures seemed to be, as applied to so much of the referendum as had then been tried, that the people either could not or would not use it intelligently.

Most recent figures reverse this precedent, especially as applied to the direct referendum rather than to the makeshift form of constitutional amendments. People do vote more numerously on measures than they used to do, and more intelligently. When the vote is unintelligent or indiscriminate, its tendency is rather toward uncritical acceptance than wholesale rejection. And in some very complex and difficult cases the people have voted with remarkable intelligence.

It is a change for the better, in the people. But the states which are adopting direct legislation should remember that they are imposing the duty on themselves of maintaining this change. Government by the people is a great privilege, but it is also a great responsibility. The closer the government is to the people, the greater the responsibility. Government is being brought close to the people everywhere, and they are rising to the responsibility. It is going to be brought closer to the people by the next election in California. This is merely a reminder that, in taking this added responsibility to themselves, the people should realize its full measure and highly resolve that they will not be false to it.—Fresno Republican.

It Must Be Reopened

By Franklin Hichborn

Before this article reaches the reader, the Directors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company may have decided upon a site for the Panama-Pacific Exposition. At any rate, everybody who has the good of the exposition at heart trusts that the decision will be made during the coming week, for San Francisco has good reason to regret the hungry scramble for the exposition site that has had the community by the ears for months.

From the fierce partisanship engendered, one could almost lead himself to believe that some of the warmest of the site boosters see in the exposition opportunity for advancement of this or that section or interest, rather than unselfish development of State and whole community, which we have been schooled to know is the real purpose of the enterprise, after the patriotic and sentimental considerations based on the opening of the canal.

The site squabble is of comparative recent development. At the time of the extraordinary session of the Legislature last September—called for the purpose of authorizing $10,000,000 of public funds for the exposition, $5,000,000 to be raised by a direct State tax and $5,000,000 by San Francisco bond issue—everybody supposed that the exposition would be held in Golden Gate Park.

Indeed, Governor Gillett, in his proclamation calling the extraordinary session, set forth that one of the purposes of the session was to authorize the city and county of San Francisco to amend its charter to permit the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company "to use and occupy that portion of Golden Gate Park westerly from Twentieth Avenue, as extended, for said exposition purposes, and placing such portion of said park under the control of said corporation as shall be necessary for such exposition purposes."

There can be no question of the fact that when the extra session of the Legislature was called, the People of California had been led to believe that the exposition was to be held in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco.

But there sat in the Legislature at least one man who had his grave douhts on that important point, Senator A. Caminetti of Amador.

When the exposition amendment was under consideration, Caminetti asked that definite provision be made that the exposition be held in Golden Gate Park.

The request was not granted. This brought forth a charge from Caminetti which more than one man has recalled during the site squabble, which all well wishers of the exposition hope is drawing to its close.

"It is your intention," Caminetti insisted, "to have the exposition located on Spring Valley lands. That is why you make no definite statement that it is to be held in Golden Gate Park. You are pulling the wool over the eyes of the people."

And, curiously enough, a coincidence to say the least, the whole community, within three months after Caminetti's charge, was agitated over the question of having the exposition held on the Spring Valley—otherwise known as Merced—lands, which belong to the Spring Valley Water Company.

These holdings of Spring Valley lie directly back of Twin Peaks. The hill known as Twin Peaks is that which one sees as he looks up Market street from the ferries.

The lands would be admirably adapted for municipal development were they in easy reach of the business portion of San Francisco. At present, however, they are practically inaccessible for municipal purposes. This difficulty could be overcome by boring a tunnel under Twin Peaks. This would practically extend Market street to the Spring Valley lands.

If the lands were to be selected for the exposition site the tunnel would unquestionably be bored, and the Spring Valley property brought into immediate touch with the business quarter of San Francisco. This tunnel even without the exposition, would add millions to the practical value of the property. To establish the exposition on the property would, within five years, make these now inaccessible acres one of the most desirable residential portions of San Francisco.

The situation in its relation to the exposition is somewhat complicated by the fact that certain capitalists who have prominent positions on the Directorate of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company, are reputed to be interested in a large way in the Spring Valley Water Company.

That the Spring Valley lands would be quite as desirable as the Golden Gate Park for exposition purposes, provided the tunnel under Twin Peaks be bored, is generally admitted. But there has been a deal of "expert testimony" that the Spring Valley lands are more desirable for exposition purposes than is the Park.

For example: The Federal Fine Arts Commission has telegraphed out from Chicago a long recommendation that the Spring Valley lands should be accepted for the exposition. It develops, however, that the Commission has made no official inspection of the several sites under consideration, and, so far as has been published, only one member of the commission has visited them. This commissioner, the president of the commission, D. H. Burnham, was, acecording to the published accounts, out here several months ago, as the guest of William H. Crocker, one of the directors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company.

President Burnham, according to the daily prints, was conducted over the several sites by Mr. Crocker. After this inspection, President Burnham is reported to have expressed a preference for the Spring Valley properties.

The Fine Arts Commission refused an invitation to come to San Francisco to inspect the sites. Nevertheless, all available data regarding the several sites, it is claimed, has been furnished the Commission. On this data, and the inspection by President Burnham, the Commission reports in favor of the Spring Valley property.

The report, by the way, was addressed to William H. Crocker, Vice-President, Panama-Pacific International Exposition Company.

But strange to relate, by the time the report of the Fine Arts Commission had been received, although it came by telegraph, the Spring Valley lands had been "withdrawn" as a prospective site for the exposition.

Those Panama-Pacific directors who have the details of the selection of a site in hand, were reported as having given up all thought of the Spring Valley property, and had narrowed the problem of selection down to two or three sites, including the proposed site at Harbor View which has a magnificent bay frontage to commend it, and the Golden Gate Park site.

But it seems that the withdrawal of the Spring Valley lands had a string on it. According to a letter purporting to come from Vice-President S. F. Eastman of the Spring Valley Water Company, the contents of which have been given wide publicity, if the exposition directors decide that the Spring Valley lands are the most desirable tract upon which to hold the exposition, the Spring Valley lands will be available for the purpose.

So it is up to the Directors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition after all.

But a thing which is just at present quite as much up to the people of San Francisco as even the Panama-Pacific Exposition, is the Spring Valley Water Company.

There is no public service corporation in San Francisco that has been a greater handicap upon the city's progress than this same Spring Valley Water Company. The Spring Valley Company did keep its skirts clear of the scandals of the recent graft prosecution, for which it has been given much credit by certain "reformers" whose tendency is to fall backwards. But Spring Valley's record in San Francisco is a bad record, and from the writer's viewpoint has not been improved in the least during the recent years that it has refrained from the awkward and more dangerous methods of the plain corruption of supervisors and public officials.

Just at present, the aim of the Spring Valley Company is to handicap San Francisco in this city's efforts to bring pure water from the Sierras. The city has voted a king's ransom for the Hetch Hetchy project, but the indications are that the ransom is not enough to free San Francisco from the tangle in which Spring Valley has involved the community. There is a growing public opinion here in favor of increasing the ransom fund, if necessary up to the last dollar of San Francisco's credit, to pay the Spring Valley its hold-up money, provided the Spring Valley Company disband and leave San Francisco to proceed in peace with municipal development.

Less than five years ago, at quoted market rates, the entire stock and bonds of the Spring Valley Company were valued at less than $21,000,000. When, for example, the defenders of the defendants in the graft cases wished to injure Rudolph Spreckels, they printed a statement in the Oakland Tribune to the effect that the First National Bank, in which Spreckels is interested, was loaded up with Spring Valley securities. The First National Bank was not loaded up with Spring Valley securities, and so damaging to the bank, as a bank, was the charge at the time deemed, that suit was instituted against the Tribune for damages.

Nevertheless, when the question of bonding the city to bring water from Hetch Hetchy was submitted to the voters of San Francisco, a seeond proposition to inelude the purchase of the Spring Valley Water Company was also submitted. The price fixed by Spring Valley for its holdings was not $21,000,000, nor yet $25,000,000, but $35,000,000.

Many San Franciscans who held the $35,000,000 price to be several million dollars in excess of what the Spring Valley properties were worth, nevertheless favored the paying of the hold-up money. Such citizens eontended that San Francisco would be money in pocket by paying anything to get rid for all time of the Spring Valley handicap. The probabilities are the ransom would have been paid had not Mayor P. H. McCarthy thrown the weight of his influence against the payment.

McCarthy was then at the height of his influence. San Francisco voted the money to develop the Heteh Hetchy water supply, but refused the extra money for Spring Valley.

The judgment of those who held that San Francisco would have done well to pay Spring Valley its demands and get rid of the corporation has been justified. San Francisco has continued to feel the effective opposition of the Spring Valley Company to the Hetch Hetchy project. Further negotiations have now been opened for the purpose of the Spring Valley Company's interests. This time it is reported that Spring Valley wants $40,000,000, and that San Francisco to get rid of Spring Valley, will pay $37,500,000, $2,500,000 more than the city, less than two years ago, refused to pay.

If the fancied interests of the popular Panama-Pacific Exposition can be involved in the proposed purchase, it will, of course, assist the Spring Valley people in convincing the worn-out public of the advisability of paying any price to acquire the oompany's holdings It will be a convincing argument indeed to say: If we pay the money we not only get rid of Spring Valley, but we get the Merced lands for the Exposition.

If this argument does tip the balance in favor of paying Spring Valley its price, those financiers who will benefit enormously by the deal, can well afford to draw their checks in favor of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company for even a larger amount than the people of San Francisco and California have subscribed for the exposition. The exposition will have been worth it to them.

Incidentally, should the deal be consummated, such beneficiaries as have place in the management of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company would not hurt public confidence in the exposition in the least if they tender their resignations.

SENATORIAL SKITS

SHANAHAN OF SHASTA

At just that amiable moment when Senator Larkins is mildly inquiring what the crooks in the Senate propose to do next, and Senator Wolfe is politely calling Senator Larkins a rusticated and ambidextrous prestidigitator with the elements of veracity, or words to that effect—in brief, at the placid instant known as the heat of debate, a new figure rises in the thick of battle, not to add that it continues to rise and then rises some more. When this figure has at length decided not to raise the beamed ceiling of the Senate chamber, you fix your eyes upon the head surmounting it, and say to yourself, "Where have I seen that face before?"

Without pausing while you go through the painful process of not being able to remember where you saw it before—principally because you never did see it before—we will at once resolve your doubts and answer the question: In front of the family cigar store, with a wooden tomahawk in its hand. Also without pausing to explain how a cigar store Indian's face carries a tomahawk in its hand, we will proceed at once to add that the resemblance is completed by the mahogany-finish complexion borne by the new figure aforesaid. We will furthermore put the finishing touch to our portrait by adding the name of the figure, so that you may now say that you have seen the Honorable Thomas Wentworth Higginson Shanahan about to make a few remarks on the subject before the house.

If you do not wish to be reminded of the fact that Thomas Jefferson patented all proper political practices early in 1800, or if you desire not to have your memory refreshed to the fact that the Democratic party would have settled everything, right, about the time of the Mexican War (war, we said, not military measles) if it had been left alone—we say, if you don't want to hear a little political gallery playing, this is your cue to leave. But if you do leave, you will also miss some of the soundest horse-sense spilled anywhere in the debate. Furthermore, if you will follow the course of Senator Shanahan's pet measures through the mystic mazes of their waltz through committees and Senate, you will gradually perceive that a cigar-store-Indian cast of countenance is not necessarily incompatible with astute political perceptions It has advantages similar to those derived from the possession of its related species, the poker face.

Some of the veterans of the Senate were deceived by the placid imperturbability of Shanahan's features when he first arrived, and undertook to play skittles with him. About the time they recovered from their trance, the Legislative Handbook came out, and the veterans discovered therefrom that Shanahan was something of a veterinarian himself, having got tired of legislating about the time the present crop of Senatorial vets were giving up the use of the rubber teething-ring. Along back about twenty-four years ago, they found, Shanahan was a perfect habit with the Legislature, and he had forgotten about as many political and legislative games as the average member learns in his whole experience.

Other facts leaked out. This was the same Shanahan who, years ago, single-handed and ridiculed, took the show-me Southern Pacific into its own Supreme Court of California and made that bench of railroad jurists make the railroad pay up back taxes to the tune of thousands of dollars.

At this last session, Shanahan wanted school books. He wanted them free—free for all the children. He wanted to know all about school books. He wanted to know why it looked, at least, to parental eyes as if the text books changed so fast they couldn't read the titles nor dig up coin enough to buy them. Whenever things lulled for a few minutes anywhere about the Capitol, Shanahan rose with a ringing cry for light on school books. To be sure, he never got so much that he needed smoked glasses to protect his eyes, but he started a lot of people to looking out for more, and probably, in the course of time, the hated Republicans will jump his claim and take out great gobs of golden political bullion from his vein, and the state will get the benefit.

The Senator has a good deal of practice, between sessions, to keep that ringing cry in good condition. Up in Redding, where he lives, the farmers have an idea that the fumes from the local smelter put the crimps in their crops, and they have hired Senator Shanahan's ringing cry, at so much per annum, for several annums past, to keep up a continual clangor of protest. Between the fumes of the smelter and the fuming of Shanahan, Redding has been a pretty lively place for a man with delicate olfactories.

All frivolity aside, however, Senator Shanahan is six feet and then some of broad-shouldered, grim-jawed, courageous fighter. And he's usually right, too—with the people.

it got back within the reservation lines. Governor Wilson of New Jersey, taking his stand upon the platform of his party, swung the battle axe with telling effect, accomplishing great good. Here in California Governor Johnson accented the platform on which he was elected at full face value and it is the glory of his administration that all its pledges were redeemed. If political platforms are to be redeemed from use as fly bait we shall have to be very careful how we make them. Governor Shofroth, of Colorado, has just brought the legislature of that state up with a short turn and demanded with emphasis that platform pledges be redeemed or consequences taken

The Significance of Cobb's Appointment Some time since Francis J. Heney and Chester H. Rowell slipped off to Washington. The Watchman had a hunch about then that something might be doing and evidently he was not far wrong. The selection of C. W. Cobb, law partner of Mr. Heney, to be Assistant United States Attorney General, assigned to the Department of the Interior, very likely resulted from that visit. This is only a step farther in the right direction, scarcely comparable to the stride the President took when he placed Secretary Fisher in the place of former Secretary Ballinger. That step was revolutionary. It can have meant nothing less than a breaking with the "interests" on the part of the President and his casting his lot for political weal or political woe, with the progressive element, for the position of Secretary of the Department of the Interior was both crucial and strategic to both the conservationists and the exploiters. The selection of Mr. Cobb was doubtless the work of Secretary Fisher, advised by the gentlemen above named and by Congressman Kent, an intimate friend and a former co-worker with Fisher in the redemption of Chicago. Of course the President may be merely striving to placate both the standpat and the insurgent elements by doing nice things to both, turn and turn about, but those two horses won't travel together. They will straddle the first puddle they come to and, when they do, the President, if he is trying to ride both, will hear something drop, ker-plunk, right in the middle of the puddle. Anyhow, the substitution of Cobb for Lawlor will be a great gain and makes a breach in California's Federal Brigade.

Making Appeal To the People The announcement is made that the President is about to make direct appeal to all the people for support of his policies. It is what he should have done from the start instead of appealing to Aldrich, Hale and Cannon merely because they were titular leaders of his party, or, perhaps it were better to say that they were de facto leaders instead of de jure. Few have questioned the good intentions of the President, but he has seemed to wabble unconscionably, sometimes, in his orbit and when a large luminary wabbles things blurr. And it is about time for a president to make appeal to The Peoole when, on what he regards as a paramount issue, only sixty-seven members of his party in the House of Representatives stand with him while seventy-eight vote "no," as they did on Canadian reciprocity. There isn't much else for him to do except quit his job at the first opportunity. William Howard Taft seems to be learning how to be president, rather tardily to be sure, considering the preparatory advantages he enjoyed under a superior who did know how, but he is manifestly learning. However, his probationary period is nearly over. The finals will come next winter and if he does not watch out he'll be plucked. He may find himself a man without a party, but if he walks straight he will not be a man without a country and country is better than party.

Reciprocity will benefit only the consumer, wails a producer. Not to be unreasonably prejudiced, we drop the remark, however, that it's about time the consumer had a little benefit coming his way.—Detroit Free Press.

Restrictions of Liquor Traffic: The new charter of Seattle contains the following provisions with respect to the liquor traffic: Saloons are shut out of the residence district; there can be only two licenses in one block, and no new licenses on corners; hotels of 100 rooms or over may have bars, but they must not open on the street. A state law forbids any saloon within two miles of the State University, which is located within the limits of Seattle. Los Angeles has a limit of 200 saloons with ten additional for annexed territory. No saloon can be located in residence districts, and not in any place without the consent of two-thirds of the property owners on both sides of the street. Restaurants that sell liquor are under severe restrictions. Saloons must be open to public view. Practically all the best business streets of the city are free from saloons, and new locations are almost impossible to obtain.

Chief Croker's Remedy: Addressing the Public Welfare Committee of the Civic Federation on the subject of the Triangle Waist Co. fire, Chief Croker said that the greatest difficulty lay in the division of authority and responsibility among so many departments. He said that it was the duty of the factory inspectors, and tenement inspectors, and building inspectors, and fire inspectors to look out for such matters, and as a result nobody did the work. He urged that the whole question of inspection against fire risk be left with the fire department, and that they be given the necessary legislation to make good.

Thanks to the Express Companies: You may send a 4-pound package of merchandise by mail from San Francisco to Berlin, Germany, for 48 cents, but the same package from San Francisco to Los Angeles costs 64 cents. You can send a 5-pound package to Germany for 60 cents but you cannot send one to Los Angeles by mail at all, for the U. S. Government is forbidden by the express companies to take more than 4 pounds. The people do not like this, nor does the Government, but it cannot be helped as long as we have a stand-pat Senate owned by the express companies.

Against Woman's Suffrage: Representative Lee O'Niel Browne, who distributed the Lorimer bribe money in the Illinois Legislature and who managed to escape prison through a hung jury—and the jurymen are now under indictment for taking bribes—has announced his undying opposition to woman's suffrage. "I wish it clearly understood," he said in an impassioned speech the other day in the Illinois Legislature, "that I am unalterably opposed to any plan for giving women the ballot." All right. Let it be understood. Let it be emblazoned, for that matter.

Triangle Waist Concern: The company in whose quarters occurred the deadly fire where 143 girls were burned has opened up business in another location. Before they were ready to begin work, the proprietors were arrested for putting a row of machines so close to the doorway as to impede exit. Before the fire this company was running a non-union shop; but when they came to open in a new place they sent to the Shirtwaist Union secretary and asked her to organize their employees. The request was ignored.

Street Car Post Boxes: If the plan about to be undertaken in Washington proves successful, mail boxes may be put on street cars all over the country. A new form of box has been devised, with a large, funnel-shaped mouth, into which letters may easily be dropped, yet so constructed that rain cannot enter. Letters gathered on lines that do not pass a post office are taken off at junction points without delaying the cars. A limited experiment at Wilmington, Delaware, seemed to demonstrate the feasibility of the plan.

Street Rubbish Briquets: The consular report from Amsterdam says that the authorities of that city are considering the establishment of a factory to make briquets of street sweepings and rubbish. The product to be worked up amounts to 140,000 tons a year. The factory will cost $200,000, and will require $100,000 a year for operating expense. It is believed it will yield a profit of over $20,000 a year.

Time to Stop: Cincinnati has a Municipal Research Bureau which is maintained by the five principal commercial and civic organizations of the city. It has completed an investigation of several departments, with startling results and many reforms. When it got to the city auditor's office, however, he declined to have his accounts gone over by the experts, but said he would give them such facts as he thought best. He also remarked that it was time somebody put a stop to this kind of business.

Reasons for Street Trees: The tree planting committee of the Civic League, of St. Louis, gives the following reasons why trees in city streets are needed: 1. They add to beauty and comfort. 2. They purify the air. 3. Increase the value of property. 4. Cool the air in summer and radiate warmth in winter. 5. Protect pavement from the heat of the sun. 6. Aid in counteracting the unnatural conditions of city life.

Park Comfort Station: At Carr Park, which is in the congested district of St. Louis, there is an imposing entrance gate, which serves as the superstructure of a comfort station and bath house. There are ten shower baths, five on each side. These are in constant use in warm weather and have considerable use throughout the year.

Water Famine in Lake City: Muskegon, Michigan, on the shores of Lake Michigan, is suffering from a water famine, as a result of the intake pipe clogging with sand. The city has borrowed a couple of extra fire engines to be ready for an emergency, but no work can be done on the intake until the lake gets calmer.

National Municipal Gatherings: During the month of May the National Conference on City Planning meets at Philadelphia, 15th to 17th; National Fire Protection Association meets at New York, 23rd to 25th, and National Good Roads Association meets at Birmingham, Alabama, 23rd to 26th.

Expedition for Municipal Study: The Boston Chamber of Commerce is getting up an expedition of 100 people to make a tour of Europe next summer to study methods of municipal administration. They are inviting the mayors of the principal cities and other city officers. The cost of the trip will be about $600.

Great Civic Awakening: Toledo has a Civic Federation of 2500 members which has been holding meetings all over the city to organize for a great clean-up and for a forward civic movement. May 1st was decreed as house-cleaning and yard-cleaning day, and many hundred mercantile carts were borrowed to carry off rubbish.

Women Carry Election in New York: Under the new law women tax-payers vote in town elections in New York State. Recently an important bond election was carried by the campaigning and votes of the women. Bonds amounting to over $75,000 were voted for water development and fire protection.

Dynamite Does Little Harm: An attempt was recently made to blow up the tower of the new municipal building in course of construction at Springfield, Massachusetts, but the bomb was clumsily placed and little damage resulted. The city offers a reward of $500.

Bath House and Laundry: Seattle is erecting a bath house and laundry at Alki Point. There will be accommodations for about 500 males and 200 females. The city owns about 3500 feet of beach at this point, which is within 20 minutes' ride of the center of the city.

Flushing Streets with Hose: Instead of flushing wagons discharging water under pressure, many cities are now using fire hose bound with steel connected with the fire hydrants and dragged about on trucks. Two men and a horse can do six blocks an hour.

Children's Tree-Planting: Washington school children will plant 60,000 trees, mostly of the catalpa variety, on Arbor Day this year. The catalpa is coming into great favor throughout the East as a shade tree chiefly by reason of its rapid growth.

Civic Center Plans: A list prepared by those interested in city development shows that there are now sixty-six cities in this country that are at work on civic center plans.

Expensive Crawfish: About 100,000 gallons of water are going to waste daily from the reservoir of Frederick, Maryland, because crawfish have bored through the earthwork. It will cost over $20,000 to repair the damage.

Street Cars Rejected: At the end of a long fight with the people, the Toronto Street Car Company abandoned its effort to put in pay-as-you-enter cars.

Police Dogs: Houston, Texas, has added eleven trained dogs to its police department. They have been proved very effective in tracing burglars.

New Employers' Liability Law

By State Senator L. H. Roseberry

The Los Angeles City Club was entertained last Saturday with an address delivered by Hon. L. H. Roseberry of Santa Barbara, State Senator, who took for his subject, "The Employers' Liability Bill Passed by the Last Legislature."

Mr. Roseberry, who is the author of the bill, gave his audience a comprehensive and lucid explanation of its most important provisions.

Senator Roseberry spoke, in part, as follows:

The enactment of the New Employers' Liability Law to me was one of the most important things that was accomplished at this last session of the Legislature, because it involves in a measure the entire reconstruction of our economic system as applied by legal process. It is vitally new. It is pressing today constantly upon us. The newness of it probably is one of the things that is most startling to the employer. He hasn't been able to adjust himself quite yet to the theory that he might be held entirely responsible for accidents that may result without his blame. But the new act is not based upon the theory of blame, but upon the theory that it is a charge of production and the shock should be diffused among the consumers, the same as the charge for transportation.

The American Institute of Civil States, in a report delivered a few years ago, stated that over 536,000 men yearly were killed or maimed in our industries in this country. These statistics have gone rapidly upward, and now some of the most exaggerated estimates, if I might term them such, place the number at nearly 2,000,000 people yearly maimed and killed; between 40 and 50 thousand of whom are killed outright. This, of course, is due to the increasingly complicated conditions of our modern industries.

In the olden days with men working separately and slowly by hand, the liabilities to industrial accidents were few and slight indeed, so this pressing question did not become so vital as it does under our modern complex industrial conditions. It is startling to find that there has been no adjustment of the burden of the accident, not the least. Today the workingman is bearing it all, financially and physically, as he did in the beginning of time. In fact, there has been almost an abrogation of some of his rights by these legal fictions. The fellow servant rule and the assumption of risk rule are both legal fictions, springing out of an early case in English history. The third, contributory acts, is probably another and has somewhat more merit at its basis. But these other two engraftings on the law have no foundation in morals or in law, as a matter of fact.

I might state merely a few statistics to show you how the burden of an accident is borne today by the average workingman.

The Department of Labor of the State of New York, in ascertaining, from 902 cases, where the burden of these accidents rested, found that 404 of the 902 received positively nothing for their injuries, whether they were caused by their own negligence or that of some one else. Three hundred four of these cases received compensation in amount less than one-half of their loss of wages. Seventy-one cases permanently disabled received nothing; 22 cases received $100 or less; 14 cases received $101 to $500; 5 cases received $500 to $2000; and one case received more than $2000. For permanent disablements, mind you!

The shock of such a thing is apt to be great on the mind of a just person in considering that the accidents are borne in this unequal manner. It results in the most abject poverty at times, because the source of income is shut off absolutely. It results in the families becoming part of the submerged tenth, the degraded part of our population, at times, because of the lack of sustenance. It means an intense bitterness in the employe towards his employer. It means a clashing of interest, a great consumption of time in the course of an attempt to adjust these on the theory of blame; and it means a great and continued deprivation by the injured party, without any relief except through public or private charity. The employer need not stand by and say the entire shock of this accident is to be shifted upon his shoulders alone, for he may insure in a sufficient amount to compensate for every accident that happens in the course of his industry.

Workings of the Present Laws

There are two great essential differences between the present laws to distribute this burden. One is called the Employers' Liability Law, and the other is called the Workingman's Compensation Acts. They are vitally different at their base. They operate differently and they are bound to be received differently by employers and employes alike.

Employers' Liability law merely means that the workingman shall receive his compensation by an action at law, on the theory of blame on the part of his employer. It is a liability that the employer must incur by virtue of his legal and moral responsibility; something that he must bear personally.

A compensation law, on the other hand, is framed upon the theory that, regardless of blame, it is a cost of production that must be carried over to the consumer, and, therefore, you do not seek to find who is responsible, legally or morally, for the blame, but, as a matter of course, when a man is injured, he becomes entitled to compensation and payment for his injury, the same as he is entitled to a payment for his labor. It is his wage that goes on during his disability, the same as while it was a production factor, to be carried on the books as such, in the same manner as an employer, a wise employer, carries his depreciation of the machinery on his books, and figures that he must duplicate his machinery once to every 10 to 20 years. Under this new, automatic compensation scheme he carries his liability or cost on accidents on his books and shifts it to the consumer. If the law is measured properly by a maximum and minimum rate, it becomes a clearly defined cost of production, just as certain as is his insurance,—his fire insurance; just as certain as is his depreciation in machinery is the depreciation in arms and lives of his laborers. It can be reckoned with just as much exactitude and is today carried by the insurance companies as a clearly defined commercial risk, upon which they can charge an insurance, coming down to a few cents.

How the New Law Will Work Out

I understand that the new California law has met with considerable criticism on the part of employers, who have failed to understand its exact scope and therefore I welcome this opportunity of explaining it hastily and meagerly to the best of my ability. I might suggest at the outset that the law is a composite of the two schemes outlined in the beginning of my remarks. It has the employers' liability feature and, on the other hand, it has an elective compensation feature, the purpose being, as far as possible, rather to persuade by a form of coercion, if you will, the employers to go under the compensation side of the bill to settle their accidents in such a form that they can carry the burden on to the consumer. With that end in view the law is severable in its parts. The first part of the law abrogates this vicious doctrine of assumed risk and also the doctrine of fellow servant. It modifies the doctrine of contributory negligence into the former federal rule, the federal rule which was enacted in 1906, and makes it the comparative negligence rule. So the law now stands, under its first half in this form: That the jury weighs between the litigants before it who is most to blame for the accident, and the man found most blameable sustains the shock. If it can be shown that the employer was more responsible for the accident, by virtue of his omission or his negligence, he must stand the burden of the accident. If the employer can prove that the employee was more negligent then the employe must bear the shock of the accident. That is the doctrine of comparative negligence—balance of fault.

Doctrine of Compensation

The second half of the bill proceeds upon the doctrine of compensation and that eventually must become the final way in which industrial accidents must be settled.

The doctrine of employers' liability is harsh. It is bad. It is theoretically wrong. It forces the case into court, resulting in delays, expense, litigation, and finally makes the employer stand the loss, whether he is personally responsible or to blame.

But the automatic compensation feature carries it over his shoulders onto the consumer and makes it a charge of production, the most scientific and most legal, if I may say it, and the most equitable way of adjusting these accident disputes.

The bill provides, as I have said, for an elective scheme. In other words, in order to come under the second half of the bill, the compensation feature, the employer must take affirmative action. He files a notice with the industrial accident board created by the law, if he desires to settle all his accident disputes for one year under the automatic compensation feature. This election binds him for the period of one year to settle his disputes in that forum. If he does not revoke his election at the end of the year it continues for another year but is subject at all times to his right to revoke that form of settlement.

On the side of the employee the employee is presumed to come under the automatic compensation feature, unless he notifies his employer that he does not elect to settle his case under the automatic compensation feature of the bill.

Both of these elections must be made prior to the accident, so that in no case after they have determined their probable liability can they hide under the second feature of the bill.

Adjustments

The bill takes in all forms of employers. It takes in public employers, the state, the county, the municipality, school, irrigation districts, all public corporations, as well as all private employers, alike. It also takes in all classes of employes, including aliens and minors. Then it proceeds to a method of adjustment upon a defined scheme. Upon the happening of an accident, the employe immediately is entitled to medical assistance. At the end of 90 days this obligation on the part of the employer ceases. The maximum amount he can be forced to expend on this temporary assistance is $100. If he fails to provide this, the employe can incur the expense and charge it to the employer.

If the accident is one of one week's duration, no benefits arise at all, the temporary medical assistance being accounted sufficient to compensate him until he recovers his earning power. But if the injury extends beyond one week and runs indefinitely, then it is settled upon this scheme: If it is a permanent disability, absolutely and utterly incapacitating the employe from working at all, he receives a compensation in form of weekly benefits, in an amount equal to 65% of the weekly wage that he was earning at the time he was injured.

If the accident does not absolutely incapacitate him but only partially disables him, then he receives 65% of the weekly amount, less any wage that he earns, to be measured in this form: If a man is earning $20 per week prior to his injury and after the injury he is able to earn $10 per week, that is what is called partial disability and his compensation then would be 65% of the loss in wages, or 65% of $10 per week. That is the measure of his recovery.

In the case of a person who is totally disabled and requires the assistance of a nurse, so that he is absolutely down on his back and requires constant daily attendance, he receives 100% of his weekly wages that he was earning at the time of his injury. But in no case does this benefit extend beyond a period of three years for any single accident; and in no case can it accumulate more than $5,000 nor under $1,000 in case of permanent disability. In case of temporary disability of course the benefit ceases upon the termination of the disability, the restoration to earning capacity, as it were.

Under such a system as this, with the limits of liability so quickly and easily measured, insurance companies can form and pass their rates of insurance at a lower per cent than they can under the present wasteful and extravagant method. And the employer can carry it as a cost of production, measuring it exactly, with a certainty of exactitude, on his book in the form of wages. Under the mortality tables, he can ascertain in advance what is the probable amount that he must pay in accidents for a given year and for a given number of men. In other words, the very certainty of law itself makes it a risk that he can carry without insurance and carry on to the consumer with the same exactitude he can with any other item of cost of production.

It is defined that, in case that the employe dies as a result of the accident, the benefits accrue to his actual dependents. In case he leaves no one dependent upon him his heirs do not succeed to anything of this benefit, but he is allowed an expense of $100 for a funeral benefit.

Industrial Accident Board

The employer at all times has the right to have the injured employe examined hy medical men selected by the employer himself. The employe always can have representatives present at the examination, and the Industrial Accident Board likewise can have a representative present at the examination to determine whether or not the physical incapacity still exists.

The Industrial Aceident Board is created, consisting of three commissioners appointed by the Governor for the term of four years each, to serve at a salary of $3600 per year.

The Board hasn't the attributes of a judicial court, or a tribunal, because then it would infringe upon the constitutional limitations as to the power of courts and thereby be declared unconstitutional. So the Board has, in a sense, limited powers. It has the authority to make findings of fact upon the causation and the effect of the accident. It has power and authority to render an award upon those findings of fact, the award to be based upon the provisions of the bill in the form of an indemnity. Either party may take a certified copy of the award and file it in a court of law and thereupon have a judgment entered without notice to the other party, the judgment having the same force and effect as if it were a proper adjudication of the court itself. This protects the employe in his benefit. By filing the award in a court and having judgment entered thereon, it becomes a lien upon the real property of the employer and he cannot be able to escape from the obligation to pay this weekly benefit which the Board awards to the employe.

In case either party desires to have the award reviewed, he must file notice of the fact with the board within 30 days after the award, and then the Board will review its findings and modify or affirm. There is then existing an appeal from the final award of the Board to the Superior Court of the County in which the accident occurred; but the Superior Court cannot review the findings of the arbitration board except upon the ground that the board exceeded its powers. Those are jurisdictional facts. Second, that the award was procured by fraud. Third, that the findings of fact do not support the award. It is necessary to have the right of review for such causes rest in a court of law. Otherwise the bill would be objectionable from the standpoint that it took a man's property without due process of law. The Superior Court will set aside, modify or remand the case; in either of which cases there is an existing right of appeal to the Supreme Court in the same manner and form that now rests in appeals in all other cases in the Superior Court.

No contract can be made between the employer and the employe to abrogate the provisions of the Act. Therefore, no advantage can be taken in advance of the rights of the employe.

After the award is once made, there can be a settlement between the injured party and the employer on such terms as they desire; that being necessary so as not to impair the right of contract.

There is an appropriation of $50,000 to carry out the provisions of the Act. The Act does not take effect until the first day of September, 1911.

That includes generally the provisions of the law. There are other details that carry out its general scheme and scope.

RECALL OF JUDGES IN OHIO

Would that Ohio had something like the recall of judges just at this time, when so many on the bench are being tried or tested and found wanting; wanting in fidelity to the people, rather than to party boss or owner. If this swearing of judges off the bench goes on hardly a judge will be left in some of the districts and the benches will have to go to tbe woodshed.

But, speaking of the partiality of Ohio judges for party and political boss, it is not more than two years ago that a legislator arose in his seat at the State house and said, with burning indignation, that there was not a prominent judge in Ohio who was not owned by the boss of Hamilton county. And years ago I was told by one familiar with the Auditors' ring of those days that no one could get a non-elective, or an elective office in the State of Ohio without sending his contribution to the city of Cincinnati.—Ohio State Journal.

Charles A. Elder, Builder of Homes

Thirty-seven years ago, there lived in Topeka, Kansas, a certain errand boy. He was a hustler. He drew an enormous salary of $1.50 a week, and he earned every cent of it.

He stuck to it. His salary and position grew. In the late 80's he left Topeka for Champaign, Illinois, and entered the University of Illinois. At the time he entered the University, he was assistant manager of the building company for which he had served in the capacity of errand boy.

Today, this same errand boy is a bank president and head of the largest financial institution in the southwest. His company has built over 1800 homes in and near Los Angeles, and has more than $60,000,000.00 worth of work before it.

Such is the remarkable rise of Chas. A. Elder. Concerning his early life, it can be said that he was a worker. He worked night and day. When he went to the University of Illinois, the same spirit of keeping everlastingly at it followed him.

Now, Elder the student, was a musician—a clarinetist, if there is such a word. He organized a band, now known as the University of Illinois Military Band, the largest student band in the country and the most expensively equipped. Elder was laughed at. He was pictured in a cartoon in the weekly college journal as a bandmaster leading his band through a door. The door was labeled "Bankruptcy," not a very encouraging inscription.

The band paid—wonder of wonders! Furthermore, Elder annexed the athletic end of the institution and staged a carnival in which the band provided the music and the chief attraction, while the athletes furnished the excitement. There was the band, a track meet, a foot ball game, a base ball game and—Elder. And it paid.

This was the time of the World's Fair in Chicago. No one had the money to go. Elder devised a scheme whereby not only he, but his entire student band could make the trip, see the exposition free and secure all of their accommodations while in Chicago. His plan was broached to a dozen people. They said it was fine but they shook their heads. Elder went ahead anyway.

At his own expense, he chartered a train on the Big Four Railroad, and with the band and the ever present athletes, he invaded Danville, the home of Ex-Speaker Cannon.

Danville was skeptical, but before night half the city, including Uncle Joe, had paid Elder 50 cents to see his show.

And the band went to Chicago on what was left.

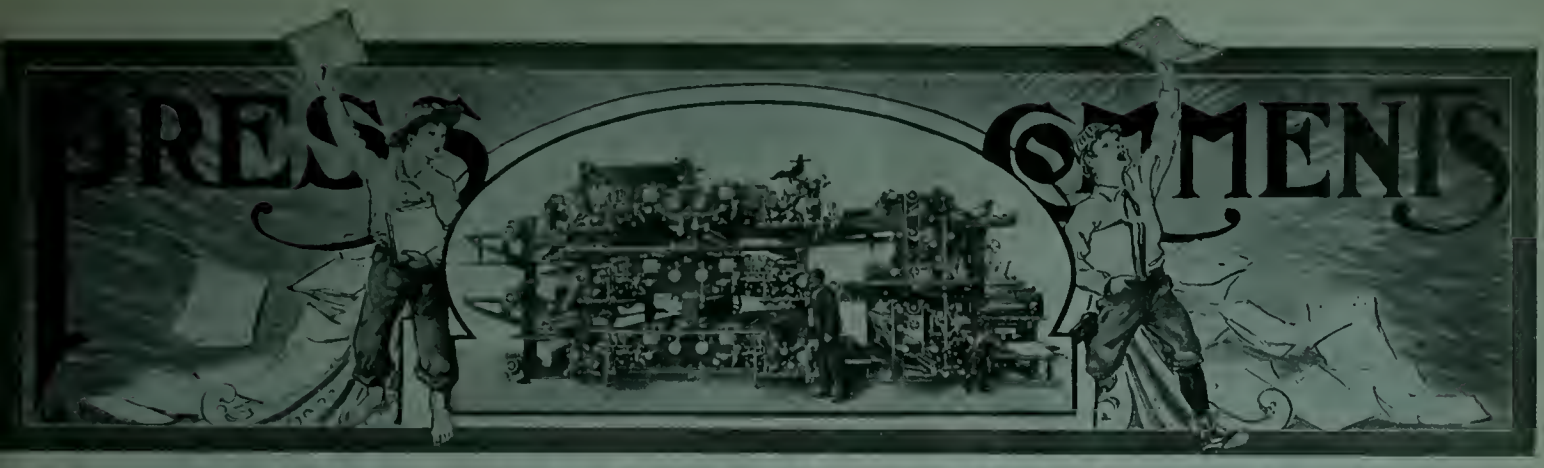
The exposition management welcomed it with open arms. The band paraded, played, saw the sights, and between times polished their instruments—always with Elder ready to finance some side trip for them.

When Elder left the University of Illinois, he studied architecture in France for a year. Upon his return, he worked on the designs of the state capitol at Topeka.

Elder was then a sick man. He was sent west, supposedly on a hopeless search for health. And he stayed and found health and prosperity.

The most interesting part about this man is his past, so it has been given here. He is a member of the University, Gamut, and City Clubs. He is identified prominently with the Good Government Movement in Los Angeles and Southern California. He is a Modern Woodman and a member of Sigma Chi. He is president and general manager of the Los Angeles Investment Company, this being his pet institution. He is also president of the Globe Savings Bank and a director in the City and County Bank.

Elder's early genius as a financier has not failed him. Years ago when the Globe Savings Bank was organized, an officer of a large local bank said, on looking over the new bank's officers, "Who in —— is this Elder?"



Today, he knows.

The seismographs in California have registered another shock. It is evident that the February magazines have reached there.—Cleveland Leader.

Gambling Ever Present

With the going out of the slot machine in San Francisco some time ago tobacconists adopted "26" as a substitute game of chance. Now that the law against the slot machine is statewide "26" will probably be the vogue as a stimulator of trade. It is played with dice, with the odds about 4 to 1 against the player. It seems to be the odds against the player in all gambling games that fascinates the player. Else why does he indulge?—Napa Register.

Government-Operated Mine

A government-operated coal mine not for profit sounds like Socialist talk, but it is to be a reality, with the object of getting scientific data of the working conditions most likely to prevent explosions and fires. The experimental mine is to be at Bruceton, Pa., near Pittsburg. Dr. Joseph A. Holmes, head of the Bureau of Mines, who has just returned from a personal investigation of the mine disasters at Throop, Pa., and Banner, Ala., reports his conviction that the only way to security is to make mines absolutely fireproof, and recommends a system of electric firing while the men are out of the mines. Wetting of the mines is urged to prevent dust explosions. There is every reason to believe that great good will come from the result of the government's experimental operation of this mine. —Redlands Review.

Progressive Senator Kenyon

Judge Kenyon, the new Senator from Iowa, was one of the administration trust busters. He was assistant attorney general and helped to prosecute unlawful trade combinations. A Republican, he is said to be progressive, but not radical. If Senator Kenyon will use the same endeavor to bust the tariff trust as he did to check the abuses of monopolies that grew out of it, he will have a place on the pedestal of public esteem.—Santa Rosa Press Democrat.

Suffrage in New Zealand

Prime Minister Sir Joseph Ward of New Zealand says that country has had woman suffrage for seventeen years, and that it has proven a benefactor to the country. New Zealand is, without a doubt, one of the most advanced countries in the world, and her example could be followed with profit by this country in more ways than that of woman suffrage.—Weekly Calistogian.

Make San Quentin Useful

It has been suggested that the convicts at San Quentin be taught to make school desks, there being no workmen in that line in the state. It would be a most excellent deviation from the grain bag treadmill and would save the school districts of this state many thousands of dollars annually. Let the desk business be started at once, and a shoe factory. Make the institution self-sustaining in some way—nobody will ever be deprived of a dollar because of it.—Willows Journal.

Anderson Neglected His Duty

Former Bank Commissioner Anderson, late candidate for the Republican nomination for Governor, has been drawn into the unsavory mess surrounding the failure of the Bank of Shasta County at Redding. As the affairs of the defunct bank are probed and its methods of doing business are brought fully to light, it is becoming a matter of State-wide inquiry why Anderson, as bank commissioner, permitted the bank to continue in business and receive the money of the public, when, if he knew anything at all about its condition, he must have known that it was hopelessly insolvent. And if he did not know this, then he was derelict in his duties.—Chico Record.

Defensive and Offensive

A desperate and despicable attempt is being made by the reactionary press of California to force the reform element in the Republican party into a defensive attitude. To this end resort is had to cowardly innuendo and base and unfounded allegations.

This scheme will not work. The American people deliberately and determinedly have set themselves to the task of recstablishing popular government, and while it may amuse the reactionaries to lie like knaves, when the next campaign opens it will be found that the reformers again are fighting offensively and that the battle is waged against the bulwarks of the industrial despots who have been ruling the country, but who feel their power deserting them.

California has done magnificently in the last year. It has set the pace for the whole nation in this reform work. It will continue on the lines now marked out, and all the base slander of the reactionary press will serve only to stimulate the people to fight for further achievements.—Imperial Standard.

James Rolph Jr., Candidate

In the selection of James Rolph, Jr. as a candidate for the office of Mayor of San Francisco lies an encouraging indication that the better citizenship of San Francisco has determined to work for a real improvement in municipal government. Whether the untoward political fate that has so long been the bane of San Francisco's progress will operate to the defeat of Mr. Rolph, or whether an awakened and alert populace will assert its better judgment and give him the victory, it would as yet be too early even to predict; but in any event it is well that the effort is made.—Humboldt Times.

Friend of Labor

The Sacramento Federated Trades Council has endorsed the administration of Governor Johnson. All labor organizations should do likewise for surely the Governor has been most considerate and liberal towards labor. —St. Helena Star.

An Economical Legislature

According to the expense account, as figured up by State Controller Nye, the last legislature cost the state $335,150.58. This is quite a sum of money, but we believe the taxpayers have come nearer to receiving a fair equivalent for their money than at any previous session which the memory of the oldest voter can recall.—Vacaville Reporter.

Oil Lands Withdrawn From Entry

The United States government has withdrawn from public entry over one and a half million acres of oil land in California. This action has been taken in the interest of the general public and against the speculators and get-rich-quick exploiters. The new conservation policy of the U. S. government has a tendency to retard the too rapid development of the mineral and other resources of the country. The conservation policy will check reckless speculation and greed, and establish the development of our mineral wealth on a stable foundation. The many will be permanently benefited instead of the few.—Hemet News.

Real Estate Mortgages

THE safest form of investment is a real estate mortgage on improved business or residence property in cities, provided it be selected with care and judgment. Such loans pay interest at the rate of six, seven or eight per cent, varying somewhat according to the amount loaned.

I make a specialty of securing such loans for my clients. My experience in building and knowledge of real estate values assure reliable appraisements and safe investments. I attend to drawing all papers, securing certificates of title, insurnce policies and the collection of interest without expense to the investor, the borrower paying all charges.

I will accept the care of large or small amounts and promptly invest the same in safe mortgages, forwarding to you the papers as soon as they are complete. Money can be sent to me by mail with instructions as to the term of the loan, or brought to me in person at my office, in which event it would be advisable to arrange an appointment by mail or telephone.

GLEANINGS FROM THE PRESS

OF FIFTY YEARS AGO

We never knew before that they got this side of the Rockies, but it seems that folks who went strolling in the Sierras took their chances of coming face to face with grinning

"Grizzlies.—The Mariposa Gazette says that grizzlies are plenty about the heads of Chowchilla and Fresno rivers. Galen Clark killed a large one lately, at the Yo Semite crossing of the South Fork of the Merced."

Galen Clark escaped his, and lived to be ninety-odd, in his beloved "Yo Semite."

Bret Harte drew inspiration from such items as this:

"Arrival of Chinese.—The Bald Eagle, which arrived lately from Hongkong, brought some 400 Chinese."

To say nothing of what Dennis Kearney did.

The Santa Clara Settlers' trouble was still raging:

"The Governor's Special Messenger to the Santa Clara settlers returned on Saturday, not having been able to effect any arrangement for a settlement of their grievances upon an amicable basis. . . . The Settlers, it would appear, demanded a recognition of their League as an organization of equal authority with, if not superior, to the laws of the county or State. Their reply to the Governor also indicated a determination to trust to it for the maintenance of their rights, and for their protection if an attempt to execute the laws were made. So rebellion appears to have fully developed itself within the borders of the State. It is not known what policy will be pursued by the Government."

Herewith, in the following item, fades some of the glittering glamor from our ideal of the Hank Monks of California:

"Pickpocket.—Baker, a stage driver in Mariposa county, had his pockets picked of twelve dollars by one of his passengers the other day."

Think of it! Petty larceny instead of highway robbery! And for a stage driver to come limping into the newspapers with such a sorry tale!

We turn from the sickening thought to consider this reminiscence of romance:

"Disgraceful.—Dr. Robert W. Stark, of Sutter county, was tarred and feathered by a mob on the night of April 26th. The reason for the outrage arose, it is supposed, from some domestic matters."

They must have turned the family mottoes to the wall when the doctor preferred such a desperate exit from his home to staying in it.

This was before the Armour-plated Beef Trust:

"Priee of Cattle.—Fifteen cows and thirteen calves sold the other day in Sonoma county for $150. This was considered a good price."

The excitements of frontier life were still to be found on the fringes of the settled country. The following is a picture vivid enough yet:

"Indian Depredations.—We are informed by Maynard, of Hay Fork, that the citizens who went from that valley to Ketinshou to punish the Indians and look after stock which had been driven off by them, have returned. Out of some four hundred head of cattle and hogs, only about fifty were found. They report that Fuldwider was killed by Indians, without doubt. It is supposed that he went down from his cabin to Mad River, near by, for a drink, and was shot by Indians, and then thrown into the stream, as his hat was found on the bank with a bullet hole in the lower part of the crown, very bloody, and near it a piece of bread, partly eaten. Many of the citizens of Hay Fork are heavy losers, some having lost all their stock."—Weaverville Journal, April 27th.

Four lines, lost in a bulk of other matter, are the insignificant heralds of budding greatness:

"Foreign Items.—A new 'Swedish nightingale' has been found in Gothland by a great lady, and sent at her cost to Paris to learn to sing. Her name is Christine Nilsen."

The "great lady" never had cause to regret it.

Other budding genius got more space in the same issue. It is described as follows:

"Central Pacific Railroad of California.—The stockholders of this company met yesterday in this city, and took the first steps towards a permanent organization. The length of the road from Sacramento to the State line is given at one hundred and fifteen miles. For that distance a thousand dollars per mile has been subscribed and ten per cent paid in as the law requires. Articles of association were adopted, a Board of Directors and one of Commissioners elected. The Directors are L. A. Booth, James Bailey, C. P. Huntington, T. D. Judah, Leland Stanford, Charles Crocker, Mark Hopkins, Sacramento; D. W. Strong, Dutch Flat; Charles Marsh, Nevada. The following gentlemen were elected Commissioners: B. F. Moore, Dutch Flat; Edward Brickell, Illinoistown; E. G. Waite, Nevada; Mr. McLaughlin, Grass Valley; Samuel Cross, Sacramento."

The above item, by the way, appeared in the Sacramento Union of Wednesday, May 1, 1861.

OF TODAY

As if we had not already more burdens than we can bear, the Adams Express Company has announced that it will shortly be in our midst, prepared to do us and any other business it finds, in competition with the Wells-Fargo people. In the first place, "competition" is a good word; we all have seen how such concerns "compete." In the second place, it's a gay and giddy thing to contemplate a company competing for the business of doing nothing in particular for an exorbitant charge. Nobody has ever yet discovered what an express company does to earn the high rates it charges for its services. We could cheerfully deny ourselves the joy of the Adams presence, and would gladly encourage the hiatus in place of the room of the Globe and Wells-Fargo to boot.

But cheer up! Cherries are ripe! The first box of California cherries shipped out of the state sold in Philadelphia last week for $5 a pound, wholesale price. We had contemplated eating a few tons ourselves this season, but we pause upon the threshold of a doubt, and try to remember where those convenient trees were that we used to climb in the dark o' the moon.

Are you a minister of religion? Secretary of a railroad man's religious association? Inmate of a hospital? Engaged in eleemosynary work, or kalsomining? If not, or not otherwise similarly and usefully employed in the moral or material uplift—forget it. The railroad may yearn to give it to you, but the Railroad Commission says nothing doing. Henceforth all trading stamp bargains in transportation get the ax unless the law and the Commission specifically pass them. It's a sad thought, but soon we shall see many of our leading citizens using a tie pass, only, in transit, where once they adorned the most ornamental coaches.

The Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers have been bad boys now for many years, and have often been warned to mend their ways, especially to correct their bad habit of picking up more waters in the mountains than they can conveniently carry to the bay. The S. J. and Sacramento River Improvement Association (all of that) met at Rio Vista last Saturday and adopted further resolutions reproving the streams. Later, the association will commence to spend $800,000 provided in equal chunks by the State and the National governments, upon the higher education of the delinquents. At that time we will speak more respectfully of the association.

Possibly in time the postal authorities who fix the location for postal savings banks will discover the larger cities.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

"Sunny Jim" Sherman has perked up sufficient courage to snap at Roosevelt. The rumor of the Colonel's death must have carried far.—Louisville Post.

Good Government Platform

Declaration of Principles Drafted by County Central Committee, Good Government Organization of Los Angeles

At the annual meeting of the Good Government Organization of Los Angeles City and County, held May 1st, a platform embodying a specific declaration of what the organization stands for, was drafted.

The resolution declaring the principles of the organization will be finally acted on at a meeting of the city central committee and the members of the city section of the executive committee to be held in about ten days. The text of the resolution is as follows:

General Principles

The Good Government organization of Los Angeles, through its central committee, hereby declares its allegiance to the following general principles:

1. Rigid adherence to the policy of nonpartisanship in the administration of municipal affairs, and, as a means to this end, the nomination, election and appointment to municipal office of men selected solely on account of their fitness for positions of public trust and pledged to work for the advancement of the general principles herein enunciated.

2. Vigorous opposition to the relinquishment by the people, through their agents or representatives, of any of the property holdings of the people which may be required for the comfort, convenience or profit of this or a future generation.

3. Ultimate municipal ownership and operation of all public utilities in the city of Los Angeles.

The Good Government organization at this time declares more specifically in favor of the following:

1. Perpetual municipal ownership, control and distribution of the water of and the power to be derived, in any form, from the water of the Owens river aqueduct or from any other source; such power never to be sold, leased or granted for any period whatever, to any person, association or corporation, for the purpose, stipulated or otherwise, of redistribution to the inhabitants of the city or any portion thereof, or to any persons, corporations or associations outside of the city of Los Angeles. This shall not be interpreted as opposition to the sale of water or power by the city to other cities, or to persons, or to corporations.

2. The granting of no franchise to a privately owned public utility corporation for a period greater than 21 years; every franchise to contain a clause under which the city may revoke such franchise at the expiration of five years and purchase the property operated thereunder before the expiration of the term for which such franchise is granted, by paying to the corporation owning such property a sum sufficient to cover its actual ascertained physical value at the time of purchase by the city.

That upon the expiration of existing franchises the policy of the last preceding and the present council in regard to the franchise on San Pedro street be followed, by granting extentensions of permits to operate from month to month or from year to year, but that no new franchises be granted in such cases.

3. In so far as may be found practicable, the prohibition of further mutilation of the surfaces of streets after their pavement or repavement, by compelling public service corporations receiving from the city the right to use such streets, to lay rails, pipes or other conduits, and lot owners to make connections with conduits, etc., before the work of paving is begun. The same restriction should be applied to work to be done by the board of public works or other department of the city. All permits for the laying of rails or conduits to be for a limited period.

That a closer correlation be made between the interests of the city and the public service corporations, believing that these companies should in all cases be obliged to serve the interests of the people rather than their own in case of a direct conflict.

4. The construction of the proposed municipally-owned railroad from the business section of the city to the harbor at the earliest possible day, and that plans should be made for both freight and passenger service on such railroad.

Harbor Front Improvement

5. Immediate steps toward the redemption by the city of the preannexation pledges made to the inhabitants of that section of the city adjacent to the harbor, bearing upon the improvement of the harbor front, etc.

6. The adoption of a plan for the consolidation into a city and county of Los Angeles of this city and such portions of the county as may be willing to enter into the arrangement, and the employment of every possible means to induce the state legislature to submit a constitutional amendment to this end.

7. The establishment by the city, as soon as practicable, of a free public forum to occupy ample space and having reasonable facilities for the holding of several meetings therein at the same time, providing that no such meeting shall be held without the consent of the municipal authorities. Such forum to include open space adequate for the accommodation of such concourses of people as may desire to gather informally or in mass meeting for the discussion of public questions.

Investigate Industries

8. Immediate municipal legislation providing for the appointment of a special commission—preferably of three persons, one to be selected by organized labor, one by organized industry, and one by the mayor—to make, for purposes of comparison, a thorough investigation into prevailing industrial conditions in Los Angeles and in other large cities which are or may be to any appreciable extent industrial or commercial competitors of Los Angeles; such investigation to cover the cost of labor, raw material and transportation; hours of labor of all classes; cost of rent and the chief necessities of life; volume of manufacturing and commerce; and all other conditions affecting the relations between capital and labor; the report upon such inquiry to be given the widest publicity, and to this end printed in quantity sufficient for free distribution among the inhabitants of Los Angeles and civic and other organizations in other cities so far as copies of such report may be demanded.

9. Submission to the electors of Los Angeles at the earliest possible date of a new city charter based upon the so-called "commission plan," with such modifications as local conditions make necessary.

10. That hereafter no territory should be annexed to the city of Los Angeles unless it assumes its full and equal portion of any indebtedness or obligations the city may have assumed prior to such annexation for the benefit of the whole city.

McClure's Magazine is running a series of detective stories from real life, of which William J. Burns furnishes the incidents from his own varied and interesting experiences.

Burns' arrest of the McNamaras as dynamiters will help the sale of the magazine, but no one has yet advanced the theory that the explosives found in Indianapolis and Ohio were "planted" by the enterprising publishers.—Sacramento Bee.

The tramp who threw a brick at Helen Gould probably was moved to it by public sentiment. Throwing bricks at the Gould family is one of our most popular sports—Topeka Capital.

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
COMMITTEE ON THE CENSUS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

26 April, 1911.

Editor, The California Outlook,
Los Angeles, California.

Dear Sir:

The California Outlook is attractive in make-up. Its able editorials and the high character of the contributed articles upon subjects which are engaging the serious thought of the country make a strong appeal, and should assure the success of your undertaking.

There must be a place in California for such a publication. The people want the truth as to men and measures. They know that newspapers are largely controlled by big business. They know that the interests are after the magazines. There is an open field for publications which are free, able and courageous. The California Outlook has an opportunity to render a great public service. I hope it will seize upon it; if it does, it cannot fail.

Very truly yours,

Robert M. La Follette

WE want to double our circulation and our readers can help in this respect. Induce your friends to subscribe for The California Outlook. If they are progressive it will make them more so, if reactionary, it may convert them. Who knows? Use the subscription blank on the inside of this cover, or send to us for a vest pocket book of ten blanks.

Governor Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey

THE CREED OF WOODROW WILSON

By privilege, as we now fight it, we mean control of the law, of legislation and of adjudication, by organizations which do not represent the people, by means which are private and selfish and worthy of all condemnation. We mean specifically the conduct of our affairs and the shaping of our legislation in the interest of special bodies of capital and those who organize its use. We mean the alliance for this purpose of political machines with the captains of organized industry. We mean the exploitation of the people by legal and political means. We have seen our governments under these influences cease to be representative governments, cease to be governments representative of the people and become governments representative of the special interests, controlled by machines, which in their turn are not controlled by the people.

A modern joint-stock corporation can not in any proper sense be said to base its rights and powers upon the principles of private property. Its powers are wholly derived from legislation. It possesses them for the convenience of business at the sufferance of the public. Its stock is widely owned, passes from hand to hand, brings multitudes of men into its shifting partnerships, and connects it with the interests and the investments of whole communities. It is a segment of the public, bears no analogy to a partnership or to the processes by which private property is safeguarded and managed, and should not be suffered to afford any cover whatever to those who are managing it. Its management is of public and general concern, is in a very proper sense everybody's business.

Hence our objects as a party. I take these objects to be to open up all the processes of politics, open them wide to public view; to make them accessible to every force that moves, every opinion that prevails in the thought of the people; to give society command of its own economic life again, not by revolutionary measures, but by a steady application of the principle that the people have a right to look into such matters and to control them; to safeguard our resources and the lives of our workmen and women and children, our chief natural resources, against the selfishness of private use and profit; to cut all privilege and patronage and private advantage and secret use out of our fiscal legislation; to equalize the burdens of taxation, and to throw open the gates of opportunity to mankind.

Wait 'Till Both Sides Are Tired

IF THERE MUST BE American intervention in Mexico, at least let the fateful hour be put off until both sides now contending are heartily sick of the fracas and are looking for some good friend to help them to let go, otherwise Uncle Sam is like enough to find the opposing parties fraternizing and making common cause against him, which will be far from pleasant. Then, too, if intervention come now, it will inevitably be for the sustaining of the Diaz dynasty with which American sympathy does not align. When the strong hand of Uncle Sam takes a grip on Mexican affairs it should be to establish a newer and better order, not to reestablish the old nor yet to set upon any throne of power another dictatorship to replace that of Diaz. When the people of Mexico have had about all the fight there is in them mutually whipped out will come the psychological moment for intervention, if it come at all. Meantime we, as well as they, must endure much.

Roosevelt's Statement of the Case

THE STATEMENT of the case of the Times' dynamiting by Theodore Roosevelt, in the current number of the New York Outlook, leaves little to be said on either side. Like many, if not most, of his utterances this one consisted mainly in the eternally obvious, and yet it is in relation to the obvious proprieties of such cases that men oftenest err and most need to be counseled. It is the obstacle in plainest sight over which we stumble. In difficult situations we feel our ways and so arrive safely. For unionists to assume a put-up job against them was foolhardy. For capitalists to look upon arrest as the equivalent of a verdict of guilty was and is inexcusably unjust. The voice of Roosevelt will recall to sanity many a head in both camps that the swift tide of circumstance had set whirling. Let us keep our heads, control our tongues, but vigilantly watch the unfolding of what must come, solicitous only that justice be done and that right speedily.

Approaching Wool Cautiously

IT HAS BEEN GIVEN OUT from Washington that the Democrats are "approaching wool cautiously." They do well so to do. At any rate they should make sure which is the butt end of the animal upon whose back the wool grows. Mistakes in such cases have been known to entail serious consequences. And yet it was not so that their distinguished forebear, John Randolph of Roanoke, approached wool. It was said of him that, so greatly did he detest a tariff on wool, he would go a mile out of his way any time to get a chance to kick a sheep.

Were They Put Up to It?

WHEN THE CITIZENS of Cordova imitated the Boston tea party and shoveled a lot of British Columbia coal into the bay, in protest against the non-opening of the Alaska coal claims, were they acting upon their own volition or were they put up to it by some Morganheim coal-grabbing interests in the background? The incident wears a suspicious look. Of course the government should take action in the premises. Had Secretary Fisher taken office when Ballinger did, doubtless a leasing policy would have been worked out ere this for Congressional approval, but Secretary Ballinger first antagonized anything looking toward conservation of coal resources and then went head-on to the other extreme, but in fact formulated no working policy by which the coal measures can be developed and the public interests safeguarded. Until that end can be achieved it were better to mark time and let Cordova rage.

A Disquieting Disclosure

A SAN FRANCISCO Panama-Pacific booster, telegraphing from Seattle to the executive committee, stated that, during the Alaska-Yukon exposition, 75 per cent. of the gate receipts were paid in by persons who live within thirty miles of Seattle itself. This is an astonishing and disquieting disclosure. Unless 75 per cent. of the gate receipts of the Panama-Pacific Exposition are paid in by persons who live beyond a radius of 300 miles from the exposition grounds the enterprise will prove, to all boosting intents and purposes, a failure. San Francisco can squeeze its own back country dry as hay almost any time without going to all the trouble and expense of getting up a monster world's exposition to that end.

Venezuela Too?

SO NOW IT IS Senor Somebody who has taken his station in New York to foment another revolution in Venezuela. Nice country, nice people! But cannot the ungovernable Spanish Americans so arrange it among themselves as not to have more than one revolution in full swing at any one time? Such a continuous round of pleasure as these dark-skinned people afford us grows wearing to the nerves and inclines to a general, all-embracing spanking expedition, cost what it may.

Monarchies Tremble at Her Power

BARON D'ESTOURNELLES, lately sojourning in Milwaukee, declared that, "Every autocratic government on earth fears woman and her influence." Right he is. When it comes to that, woman is no slouch of an autocrat herself.

The Star of Woodrow Wilson

THE DISCRIMINATING OBSERVER of current politics is likely to find in Woodrow Wilson the most promising and the most interesting personality that is showing anywhere in the field. He is the first conspicuous national example of a new force that has found its way into our public affairs—a force that we vaguely describe as the "Scholar in Politics." Charles E. Merriam of Chicago is another example, but local rather than national. Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts at one time laid claim to this title, or his friends claimed it for him, but his diploma must have been forged, for his scholarship rested on a few dinky attempts at history writing and his politics consisted in an election to the Senate by certain special interests to look out for their tariff requirements—cheap scholarship and bad politics.

Woodrow Wilson is a thinker, writer and a genuine leader in the field of education. For a number of years he has been at the head of Princeton which stands with Harvard and Yale in the very front rank of American colleges. His scholarship title is of the best and highest order. As an instructor of youth in the duties of citizenship, he has always maintained and promulgated the doctrine that the educated man is bound to give the state the best that is in him. Living up to that principle, he has long been active in the politics of New Jersey, aligning himself with the Democratic party on national issues, but taking an independent stand on municipal issues. He was nominated last year for governor by the Democrats, and elected by an overwhelming majority in a state which since 1896 has usually been carried by the Republicans. As a governor he ranks with Johnson of California, Bass of New Hampshire, Hughes of New York and Stubbs of Kansas for courage, energy and devotion to the interest of the people; and now he crosses the continent and greets friends and admirers by scores of thousands, because he is frankly willing to accept the Democratic nomination for the Presidency if it should be offered him, and because he is regarded by a large element in the party as their most available candidate.

The later utterances of Woodrow Wilson leave no question as to how he stands on the great fundamental issue that is now splitting open both political parties. He is for the rule of the people and the overthrow of privilege. In his point of view the rights of the human being always take precedence over the rights of property. He is for the initiative, referendum and recall, although, like Roosevelt, he seems to be a bit doubtful on the recall of the judiciary. He may in time see the light on that last point. Let us hope so.

Republicans and Democrats alike, the people of California will greet Dr. Woodrow Wilson with enthusiasm and admiration, and will listen with the deepest interest to what he has to offer on the great questions of the day. They recognize his standing as a scholar, a man of affairs and a political leader, and—which means much more—they recognize in him a true friend of the common people. If the nominee on the Republican side should represent the progressive principles upheld by the majority of that party in this state, California is not likely to give its vote to the Democrats, for the state is of the Republican faith on national issues. But if reactionary forces should prevail on the Republican side, it will then be a matter of vast importance to the voters of this state who put principle above party as to whom the Democrats will offer as their candidate, and certainly no one could be more acceptable to such voters than the democratic Democrat, Woodrow Wilson. C. D. W.

Up-Set or Set-Up?

THE COMPLAINT of the standpatters is that the progressives would, if they could, and will if they can, upset everything; that they will blunderingly interfere with industrial and commercial processes ordained by immutable, natural law and that, however good their intentions may be, they are a pack of impracticables whose intermeddling can effect nothing but mischief, create nothing but confusion, for the reason that the direction taken by the activities of men is determined by the nature of things, compelled by the constitution of man and fortuitous eventualities beyond human control. Our modern centralizations of government and industry are cited as manifestations of force and purpose beyond the power of Man to limit or extend.

If this indictment of the progressive movement be, in fact, a "true bill," then the position of the progressive is altogether untenable and he should hide his diminished head in some obscure corner there to study the laws of man's being while wiser men than he go on with the world's work, following the direction of least resistance, cheerful in the consciousness that the consequences, whatever they may be, are none of the concern of such men, lying as they do wholly outside human abilities to add to or take from.

By way of rejoinder, the progressive demands of the standpatter that he look where he is going. The doctrine of irresponsibility for the consequences of our acts is derided and denied. The progressive asserts that the direction of least resistance is backward and not forward, downward and not upward, that it is a manifestation of that atavism whose unhindered course leads to the ancestral type and would place man back upon the bottom rung of the ladder of development, a rung imbedded in poverty and squalor, in disorder and riot, in profligacy and moral downfall. He holds that there has, in the whole history of mankind, been no progress that was not the result of conscious effort to make conditions better than they were: that every good thing that has come to mankind has had to be planned for and fought for by the relatively few at the cost of overcoming the inertia of the many and the opposition of those standpat, retrogressive reactionaries whose paths are unlighted by imagination and purposes unrelieved by considerations for other interests than their own. In short the contention of the progressive is that he has come to set-up, rather than to up-set.

This line of demarkation between the standpatters and the progressives in American politics is elemental, fundamental and temperamental. It is impossible that it shall always manifest itself in contending factions in both political parties. Somehow, some time, the progressives of both parties must come together in one political party and the retrogressives of both parties must gravitate together in the other. Which party shall be the progressive and which the conservative, or, to state it better in terms of history, which shall be the liberal party and which the tory? Traditions, associations, organizations are strong and may delay the line-up of like-minded men, may defer the flocking together of birds of a feather, but these hindrances can only be delays and cannot be interdictions.

It seems unlikely that both the Democratic and Republican parties shall become progressive, merely vieing with each other as to which shall be the most so, and the spirit of progress is too strong in the land tamely to submit to both parties longer being non-progressive and standpat. To attempt that is to bid Socialism lead on and it is to be doubted if the American mind is yet ready for that adventure.

The name "Republican" would be handicapped in the South. In the North the term "Democrat" connotes blind opposition and not puissant leadership and that name also would not be without its handicap. The new departure is not to be altogether unhindered no matter how or when it starts. It will be the policy of standpatism to prevent the new alignment. The predicament of Pharaoh in the Red Sea will not be more intolerable than that of modern standpatism if the new alignment can be effected. It must be.

Meantime, you who believe in a set-up policy, in a policy of conscious struggle for high purposes, watch for the first faint crack denoting the line of cleavage and be sure, whatever your previous condition of party servitude may have been, to put yourself on the right side of that crack. A new and better order is to be set up on this continent. A. J. P.

Buncoed Again, B'gosh!

IT IS JUST BEGINNING to dawn on the American people that they have been once more the victims of an elaborate piece of fraud executed by that well-known confidence operator, the daily newspaper—with the accent on the NEWS.

The subject of the little game this time was Mexico. The news issues involved were: The condition of that country—economic, political, governmental—the rule of Diaz—its popularity and permanency—the prospect of successful revolution, and the interest of Americans in the situation.

These were legitimate subjects of news inquiry, were they not? The American people were entitled to full knowledge on matters of such vital moment to a sister republic; and from what source were they to get it, if not from the newspapers? Laying aside for the moment our business interests in that country, which may affect only one or two per cent of our population, there remains an enormous patriotic and social interest, for Mexico touches our border for thousands of miles, and it is, next to the United States, the largest and most conspicuous republican experiment on this hemisphere. There were any number of reasons why the newspapers—again with the accent on the front syllable—should give us the truth about Mexico and only one reason why they should deceive us. But that one reason is the moving cause of most of the lying and fraud, and, for that matter, most of the wickedness, cruelty and meanness that afflicts the country, and the name of it is: Business Interest.

Something over a year ago our pleasant dreams of a regenerated Mexico under a Grand-Old-Man, Diaz, were rudely interrupted by a series of articles in a popular magazine on the subject of "Barbarous Mexico." Only three numbers appeared, and the reason given by the magazine for the discontinuance was that the material was in such poor order that the magazine would not venture its publication. A socialist paper took up the series and completed it.

The articles, their writer, and the magazine that published them, all received indignant condemnation at the hands of the newspapers of this country. The stories of slavery, of cruel exploitation of the people, of the destruction of liberty and the wild and desperate discontent among all classes—these all were met with fierce denials. The Hearst papers, which are supposed to give us news at whatever cost and consequence, were not satisfied with the customary protest, but sent special writers into the traduced territory to give the "American" articles the lie in every particular.

This ended the first part of the bunco game. The sudden collapse of the courage of the magazine, the general chorus of denial from the newspapers and the urgent demand of the big business interests that we should all mind our own affairs and not interfere with the prosperity of a neighboring republic combined to restore our confidence in Mexico and put a stop to the questions we were beginning to ask.

Then came the rebellion, following close on the heels of a fake election of president. The American newspapers all played up the election as though it were the real thing, and published exalted eulogies of Diaz as the Bismarck-Gladstone-Roosevelt of the Latin Americans. It seemed good, indeed, to get our old ideals restored—for we are all stand-patters by instinct, and only change our minds when we must. The rebellion, according to most of our enterprising news-getters, was nothing but a joke, local rioting here and there carried on by jail birds, socialists and vagrants. There were no real leaders, no organization, no financial backing, and the whole business could be brought to an end in short order, so we were assured, if our border ruffians would quit filibustering and our radical papers stop encouraging the disorder.

It came as a sudden and a rude shock to most of the American people when President Taft brought the army down to the boundary line—and what for? So as to save American life and property when the whole empty sham of a government should totter to its fall. Gradually then the truth began to fight its way into our newspapers. The bunco game was played out. As long as business interests could be helped by suppressing the facts and by bolstering up the Diaz government—a plain old-fashioned tyranny of serfdom plus modern business human exploitation—that policy was followed by most of our highly respected press. When it became necessary to tell the truth in order to save the fragments—why, it would even do that also.

Is it any wonder that the people have become cynical and contemptuous about the press as the "Palladium of our Liberties?" How many different times and in how many ways are they to be buncoed, before they are justified in getting suspicious? Of course the joke is on us. We bit all right. But maybe the newspapers—those at least that participated in this little trick—may have lost something in the transaction.

Senate Constitutional Amendment Number 47

(This series of articles on the proposed constitutional amendments is intended mainly to open the discussion. The writer of them had not the advantage of hearing them discussed in committee and before the Legislature and the views he holds regarding them are confessedly inexpert, but these amendments demand attention and the writer will handle them as best he may according to his lights. Discussion of them is cordially invited.)

THIS AMENDMENT, if adopted, places under the control of the State Board of Railroad Commissioners, with the exception hereafter noted, every railroad, steam or electric, interurban or street; every canal, pipe line, telephone or telegraph, every device for generating and distributing heat or power, every storage or wharfage plant designed, directly or indirectly, for public use. All such are declared to be public utilities and subject to public control.

Having made this declaration the proposed amendment goes on constitutionally to give the Legislature plenary power to confer upon the Commission all powers and equipments needful for the supervision and regulation, including the fixing of rates, of all these public utilities, whether owned by private persons or by associations or corporations, excluding only municipally owned properties.

With the adoption of this amendment all powers of regulation of public utilities, now vesting in boards of supervisors or municipal councils or other governing bodies of cities or counties, will cease so far as they conflict with the powers hereby conferred upon the State Railroad Commission. But here, unfortunately, enters the exception above noted: If any city or city and county, by election held after the adoption of this amendment, votes to retain control of its utilities under the law as it is, such city or city and county shall continue under the law as it now is until it votes to relinquish such authority to the State and to its Railroad Commission. This proviso is unfortunate in that it makes longer the road to the same ultimate goal and continues a principle of government that never was sound, just or practicable.

The principle referred to is this: that neither of the parties to a transaction should be the sole arbiter as to all issues arising out of that transaction. It is no more just that the consumers of a product should determine the price of it than that the producers of it should, and the attempt to empower city councils to fix water rates and rates for lights and power has resulted in the whole subject being taken out of the hands of cities and turned over to the courts. And the courts have broken down under the task.

Oakland lately had a case finally decided a decade after it became an issue and San Francisco has already been waiting eight years for a determination of the value of the Spring Valley water plant, as a basis for rate-making, without a decision and, meantime, the possessions of Spring Valley have so augmented that the decision will not fit the facts when rendered.

A state commission, having in its control all public utilities, will come as near as possible to constituting a disinterested tribunal. The concept of this measure is just and right. How it will work out in practice remains to be seen. Undoubtedly it will focus on the State Railroad Commission all the powers and persuasions of all the special interests in the State. There is no use blinding ourselves to this truth. Heretofore only the railroads were interested in controlling the Railroad Commission and, up to the advent of the present Commission, they had controlled it. Hereafter, if this amendment be adopted, all public service corporations will join in seeking to control, in their mutual interests, this Commission, and yet plenary power to do right and deal intelligently between producer and consumer of public utilities must exist somewhere. Now such power nowhere exists. The burden has broken down every arm of government upon which it has rested. It cannot do worse under the system of control sought by this Constitutional Amendment to be established and it may do better. Unless government is to prove a failure it will do better, but if that fail then public ownership of public utilities will be the only recourse and its coming will be swift and sure.

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 47 should be adopted. A. J. P.

Morally Responsible

JUST HOW FAR a stockholder is legally and financially responsible for the behavior of his company is a subject on which much has been written and spoken, and it has been covered in countless laws and decisions; but the question of how far a stockholder is morally responsible for the behavior of his company has received but little attention. This illustrates perhaps the tendency that prevails in this country to give financial issues precedence over moral.

Corporations have no souls we say, and are disposed to let it go at that. So has a gun no soul; but the man who owns it and uses it to do injury to a fellow man must suffer for what the gun does.

Charles M. Cabot of Boston, is a stockholder in the United States Steel Corporation—one of 15,000. How large his holding may be we are not informed, but he seems to regard it as large enough to carry some moral responsibility. A book entitled "The Steel Workers," by John A. Fitch, came into the hands of Mr. Cabot, and he was filled with astonishment and regret to learn that the corporation whose stock he was holding was working its men with such heartless severity that they were practically used up and worthless at about the age of 40. The book gave much the same story as that presented in the famous "Pittsburg Survey," which was a thorough research into the conditions of steel and allied industries centering at Pittsburg. It will be remembered that one of the first acts of the steel corporation, after it was created by Morgan, Carnegie, Frick and others, was to stamp out all unionism in the mills. Here we have the ideal conditions for which the opponents of the labor unions clamor—entire "freedom" for the American workman. These "free" beings are mostly Huns, Croats and Russians. They work from 12 to 16 hours a day and most of them seven days in the week. They are paid largely by piece and are speeded up to a point that drives them almost inevitably to drink, and yet their average pay is under two dollars a day, tens of thousands of them getting under a dollar and a half. They and their families live in conditions of incredible squalor.

All this was set forth in Mr. Fitch's book, and Mr. Cabot reading it felt that it was only right that each and every one of the other 15,000 stockholders should know the conditions under which their company was working. He appealed to President Gary and asked if he might have a list of the names and addresses of these stockholders, so that he could lay the facts before them. He says that President Gary not only promised him the list, but said he would do all in his power to help in the work of making things better. On a suggestion of Mr. Cabot, Mr. Fitch prepared a magazine article containing the material facts from the book and that was published in the "American" for March. This displeased Mr. Gary and he refused to allow its distribution. Possibly he regarded the medium as too radical in tone.

At the recent meeting of the stockholders of the U. S. Steel Mr. Cabot moved that a committee be appointed from among the stockholders to investigate and report on the truth of the charges conveyed in the article. Mr. Gary, who held proxies for a majority of the stockholders, allowed the motion to pass, although he denounced the article as "partisan, unfair and unreasonable, and the motive for it not good." Mr. Gary is a lawyer by profession and weighs his words, and it will be noticed he did not say the article was untrue. As he is to appoint the committee, however, it is not likely the public will ever hear of the results.

One of these days free government and the vote of the people will be established in Pennsylvania—yes, even in Pennsylvania—and Mr. Gary and his colleagues need not be at all surprised if retaliatory measures follow, the very mildest of which will be an eight-hour labor law.

Wocdrow Wilson In the West Progressive sentiment, in the Republican party, has made little progress in New England outside of New Hampshire, where it has gained a very good foothold. In the Democratic party it has done better. In New York organized progressive Republicanism seems to have died a-bornin,' but New Jersey, hitherto the citadel of corporate power, not only elected a progressive Democratic Governor but the Republican State Senate kept pace with the Democratic Governor right along through the legislative session, doing good things in the right way. Therefore, both Democrats and Republicans of New Jersey have said to the Nation, "Woodrow Wilson is our kind of man. We think he will make a good President. What do you think?" That the people of the West may know what to think, the Governor of New Jersey is taking a four weeks' swing around the western circuit and will pay a visit to California forthwith. He will deliver a commencement address at the State University on the 16th and will be dined by a number of college organizations united at San Francisco on the 15th. He is a notable man and looms large on the political horizon; a conservative progressive, he is not able to keep pace with La Follette in all things, but is too swift for Taft and he outdistances Harmon of Ohio altogether. If any Democrat can draw to the standard of that party the progressive wing of the Republican party Woodrow Wilson would seem to be that man. Therefore mark him well while he is here. He may prove the focal point for a new departure in American politics.

What Shall We Do To Be Saved? The plaint of Superintendent of Public Instruction, Edward Hyatt, that men do not pay their poll tax unless they have to, and that barely half of them have to, has much more of concern in it than the loss of the money to the schools, although the schools could use the $750,000 of uncollected poll taxes to good advantage if they had it. The delinquency signifies that half the men of California are shirks upon whose minds and hearts there rests no sense of responsibility for the maintenance of that educational system upon which the future well-being of our nation more depends than upon any and all other public institutions. Whether or not the men and women of California of the next generation shall be instructed, trained, fitted for life and for carrying on to fruition the mighty task of making democracy make good, is nothing to the poll-tax dodgers, and mighty little to the poll-tax collector, unless he is paid a commission for the collecting. It is not much of a man to whom it is not worth $2 a year just to be a man. Superintendent Hyatt, in his circular letter to the press, suggests that these delinquents would joyously walk miles to the office of the county assessor or treasurer to pay this tax if they only knew that it went into the treasuries of the schools. Would they? It is the policy of the Superintendent to be nice to them. He knows better. He knows that the joy of dodging the tax to that of paying it, even for the benefit of the schools, would be relatively about like the joy that going on a spree bears to sobering up after being pulled out of the gutter. No, the plain truth is that anyhow half the men of California do not care a whoop for government, for education, for democracy making good, for the well-being of posterity, for anything under the sun except what they are themselves busy about. They may pretend that they care, and even think that they do, but that measure of care that neither prompts one to vote, unless there is "something in it" for himself or his friend, affords a mighty poor dependence for the maintenance of a government founded upon "manhood" suffrage. The delinquency complained of by Superintendent Hyatt is a shame to our civilization and impeaches the manhood of half the men of California.

Stop Babying The Propertyless Man Whole broadsides have been written and fired at the iniquity of the poll tax because it taxes the poor man who, because he is unfortunately propertyless, ought not, it is claimed, to be made to bear any portion of the common expense of maintaining government or an educational system. Bah! bah!! bah!!! The Watchman will not be accused, by anyone who has read the things that he has written, of being a toady to property or the propertyful man. He does not highly regard the money getter and he never makes the mistake of rating manhood by the size of the bank account or assessment roll but, in nine hundred cases out of the thousand, the native born American man who reaches the age of forty years without having his name inscribed on an assessment roll, always and everywhere a roll of honor, does so because he has sown tares instead of wheat, does so because he has sown to the wind instead of to the soil, does so because he has been a spendthrift and a shirk. If he has helped to support government it has been through his vices and not his virtues and, whatever he may have contributed in tariff and revenue taxes to the national government, he has failed of pulling his own weight in the government of state, county and community in which he lives. The world respects the man who has property, and rightly respects him, not in proportion to the property he has, but because he is a taxpayer. The possession of property is a certificate of fitness to do jury duty, it forms a basis for credit, it is a foundation of permanent citizenship, it is an anchor to windward, it is a good thing to have and to hold and, in an overwhelming percentage of cases, in this land of opportunity, the native born American who attains forty years and is still propertyless thereby confesses moral as well as financial failure. Howheit, the payment of the poll tax by the man of property does not necessarily involve a guaranty of his patriotism, his love for his race or his consideration for the public schools, for he might also dodge it if he could, but he cannot. It is taxed up to his property and he has got to pay it or allow his property to he sold for taxes. Government is by the very few for the exceeding many, for only the few take an unselfish interest in government while the many grumble and pay what they cannot avoid paying, and are ill content. Can democracy vindicate its right to exist on such a basis? It is time to stop babying the propertyless man. That will be the beginning of making a man of him.

Palpable Limits To Direct Legislation There are those who affect to fear that the so-called "radicals" would, if they could, overthrow representative government and attempt in its place the hazards of direct legislation hy all the people. Governor Johnson had placed before him for executive consideration 956 enacted bills, bills that the people's representatives, in both Senate and Assembly, considered favorably and adopted in both houses hy at least a majority vote. This leaves out the numberless measures that were presented to the Legislature and considered and rejected. How can it ever be possible that a tenth, or even one in the hundred, of legislative issues can come before the general public? Is it not perfectly plain that, under the most advanced form of direct legislation, the people are not likely to be called upon to consider more than a small fraction of the legislative measures that will demand action? The purest democracy will be 99 per cent. representative government at the outside and the only reason that it is not to he 100 per cent. representative is that, in practice, it has proven misrepresentative in precisely that small hut crucially important percentage which the people may, under the direct method of legislating, take into their own hands. It is as certain that, under the most democratic government conceivable, government must he mainly representative as it is that the earth must remain in its orbit or that the pole star must stay put. It is the hundredth issue that makes all our pother for us and it is the hundred thousandth man, a grabber, who is responsible for even that much of direct legislation. If he could be decent representative government would reign supreme 100 per cent. pure.

A Whole Week Of Doing Nothing It was announced that, with the last bill signed, or pocketed, Governor Johnson would devote a whole week to doing nothing. The Watchman doubts his having done it, hut the wonder is that he has not had to spend that week, and several others, in bed trying to recover from nervous prostration. Of what metal is he made that he can stand so much? Reflect that he devoted practically a year to campaigning for the redemption of California from corporate rule, almost without respite, that the Legislature was precipitated upon him immediately after, that the shadow of the office seeker has not been absent from his door, and that during the final thirty days, allowed by the amended constitution for deliberation, there were nearly a thousand legislative measures put up to him for final action. California has few public men who could have survived the campaign that Governor Johnson made and not very many who, had they gone at it fresh and unwearied, could have survived the legislative session and the thirty-day annex of executive consideration of hills without needing to devote more than one week to doing nothing. A remarkable man is this Governor of ours, physically as well as mentally and morally. His enthusiasms suffice to sustain him.

How Can Law Be Practiced? Governor Johnson signed 753 bills, making them laws. That means 753 changes in the laws of the State as they were. A great many of these laws consist in changes in the codes. Until these laws have all been printed and published, chiefly in book form, how is any attorney to practice law or any judge to hold court, to say nothing of the ability of any citizen to know what his rights and duties are? Time was when such laws were published as fast as signed in some newspaper of general circulation, hut that came to be a graft in many states and the custom appears to have been discontinued, but if we had a State gazette, published by the State for the people of the State, it would be possible for it to keep so nearly abreast of the making of laws as to appraise courts, attorneys and people of what changes are made in the laws as the laws are made, or near it, and at no very great expense. It could do all the State's advertising. Departments of State government, State institutions and officials could he required, at proper intervals so as not all to come at once, to publish in it financial and other reports. Every state should have at least a weekly organ of publicity which might, to a great extent, take the places of the voluminous biennial reports that are limitedly distributed and gather dust

The Work of the Legislature

Legislation Affecting the Public Welfare Passed by the Last California Legislature

The laws of most interest, enacted by the last legislature, are those that redeem the pledges contained in the platform of the Republican party in the campaign of 1910. As practically every one of these pledges was literally redeemed, it may be just as well to take them up in order, and show what laws correspond to each.

Kicking Out the S. P.

The first plank in that platform called for the elimination of the Southern Pacific company from the politics of California. This has been done largely by Governor Johnson's appointment of non-railroad men to vacancies in the State administration. But at least two laws were necessary promptly and effectively to remove notorious Southern Pacific influences from the state government. Senate Bill 960 (Black) abolished the old Bureau of Building and Loan Supervision, ousting Charlie Curry and Jake Transue from the eleventh-hour berths provided for them by Governor Gillett, and Assembly Bill 684 (Flint) made possible the immediate removal of Alden Anderson, the Southern Pacific catspaw in the primary campaign of last year.

Direct Primary Law

The next plank called for any practicable simplification of the Direct Primary Law. One of the simplifications which the last legislature found most practicable, and one which also redeemed a later plank in the platform, was embodied in Assembly Bill 1385 (Young) which discarded the absurd district advisory plan in the primary vote for choice for United States Senator, and substituted for it the effective "Oregon plan" of a statewide advisory vote.

But Bill No. 1385 went far beyond this in the improvement of the Direct Primary Law. It eliminated the cumbersome system of estimating the signatures required for candidates' petitions, by counties, and substituted the simple provision that "except in the case of a candidate for nomination to a judicial office or a school office, nomination papers shall be signed as follows: By not less than one per centum and not more than two per centum of the voters of the party of the candidate seeking nomination, within the state or political subdivision thereof in which such candidate seeks nomination.

It provides, further, for the rotation of names of candidates for state office. It abolishes the absurd post-election party convention which last year made the candidates' platform after the candidates were nominated, and substitutes for it a convention of the candidates themselves, who are to make their own platform. It provides for partisan state conventions in presidential years, composed of delegates chosen by the county conventions, which in turn are composed of delegates elected at the preceding primaries.

Non-Partisan Judiciary

This act also redeems a later pledge in the Republican platform, promising non-partisan judicial candidacies. It goes further, and includes school officers, also. It provides that of these candidates at the primary election, the two highest, regardless of party, are declared the only candidates for such office at the general election, except that, in case any candidate for a judicial or school office, that shall be the only judicial or school office to be filled at the November election, shall receive a majority of all votes at the primary election he shall be the only candidate at the general election. The names of all candidates for judicial office are to be printed on the primary ballots of all parties.

Direct Election of Senators

The platform next called for a resolution to congress calling for the direct election of United States Senators. Senate Joint Resolutions 1 (Sanford), 17 (Stetson), and 25 (Sanford), carried this plank into literal effect.

Short Ballot

The next plank called for a shortening of the ballot. Two steps were made toward this goal: Assembly Constitutional Amendment 33 (Young) makes the clerk of the supreme court appointive by the court instead of elective; and Assembly Bill 1106 (Bohnett) makes the state printer appointive by the governor instead of elective.

Party Circle Abolished

The next two planks were redeemed by one bill. They call for a return to the Australian ballot, without party circle or column, and for a non-partisan judicial ballot. Senate Bill 306 (Boynton) provides for grouping the names of all candidates for any office under the name of the office, with the party name after the candidate's name, and for the rotation of candidates' names on the ballot, so that no candidate shall get any advantage by reason of the position of his name in the alphabet; it provides, further, for the elimination of all party designations from that part of the ballot containing the names of candidates for judicial offices or for school offices.

Direct Legislation and the Recall

The platform demanded "the submission to the people of constitutional amendments providing for direct legislation in the state, and in the county and local governments, through the initiative, the referendum and the recall." Senate Constitutional Amendment 22 (Gates) provides for the initiative and referendum in State legislation, and 23 (Gates) provides for the recall of state officials, including the judiciary. Senate Bill 360 (Black) extends the initiative, referendum and recall to all municipal corporations, and Assembly Bill 100 (Held) provides for their extention to county governments.

Home Rule for Counties

"A county government act which shall provide an improved system of county government, with the greatest possible measure of home rule compatible with necessary uniformity."

The Committee (on County Government) Substitute for Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 5, adds a new section to the Constitution, permitting any county to frame a freeholders' charter for its own government, to supersede the general laws adopted by the legislature, as to such county. The freeholders' convention may be called by three-fifths of the supervisors or by petition of fifteen per cent of the voters, and a majority vote is required to ratify the charter proposed by that convention. This charter may later be amended, by majority votes, at an election called upon petition of ten per cent of the voters, followed by approval by the legislature. Such charters may provide for the constitution, election and government of boards of supervisors; for the terms and compensations of all other statutory county officers; for the powers of the supervisors; for the creation of additional officers; and for the construction and maintenance of roads, highways and bridges.

Revision of Criminal Procedure

"Such revision of the laws of criminal procedure in this state as shall make the administration of justice more speedy and certain and prevent the delays in the punishment of criminals and escape of offenders upon technical grounds not connected with the guilt or innocence of the accused."

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 26 provides that "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted in any criminal case on the ground of misdirection of the jury or the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or for error as to any matter of pleading or procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

In addition, Senate Bills 383-385, inclusive (Boynton), limit the grounds of challenge of grand jurors and enlarge the powers of district attorneys in the deliberations of the grand jury. Senate Bill 386 (Boynton) simplifies the definition of "arraignment." Senate Bill 388 (Boynton) is an extremely important reform of one of the most flagrant abuses of the criminal law in this country: it amends Section 1008 of the Penal Code to read, in part:

"An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant."

Reformatory for First Offenders

The next plank demanded the enactment of laws for the establishment in California of a modern reformatory for first offenders, so as to make it possible to apply effective reformative treatment, and to separate from the older and confirmed criminals the first offenders and younger prisoners, whom experience has shown can be permanently reformed by proper discipline. Assembly Bill 200 (Clark) appropriates $150,000 to construct the "California State Reformatory" and to purchase 600 acres of agricultural land for a site; provides for the indeterminate sentence and the application of the most modern methods of reform, including surgical treatment where feasible, agricultural and industrial training, and probation. Makes a commission of five, including governor and lieutenant-governor, responsible for construction of reformatory.

Uniform Accounting and Economy in Administration

The next plank requiring legislative enactments for its redemption refers to a uniform system of accounting and provision for the highest economy in the administration of state and county offices. The committee substitute for Assembly Bill 515 (Benedict) abolishes the old State Board of Examiners, who were members ex officio and too busy to attend to the details of the work, and establishes in their stead the State Board of Control, consisting of three members appointed by the Governor and charged with the duty of auditing state claims and supervising the accounting of all state departments and institutions. This law will provide adequately for the improvement of methods in accounting and management.

Conservation of Natural Resources

"We recommend the enactment by the legislature of laws which, without conflicting with national conservation, shall apply similar standards to the conservation of such natural resources as come under the jurisdiction of the state." The legislature of 1911 redeemed that pledge by the enactment of Assembly Bill 789 (Clark), which creates the "Conservation Commission of the State of California," consisting of three men, appointed by the Governor, provided with $200,000, and charged to investigate the nature and extent of the remaining natural resources of California, to study the conservation laws of other states and nations, to reframe the conservation laws of California, and to report to the next legislature. Assembly Bill 735 (Clark) establishes a State board of control to limit and regulate the appropriation of water for the generation of electricity, and in general to prevent monopoly and excessive charges in the sale of electric power.

There were a number of other conservation bills passed. Assembly Bill 829 (Clark) prohibits the wilful waste of natural gas, and provides $1,000 fine or one year's imprisonment for violation. Assembly Bill 830 (Clark) prohibits the extraction of minerals from any stream or lake under any other arrangement whatsoever than lease from the State, such lease being limited to twenty-five years. This is designed to conserve the soda deposits. Assembly Bill 830 (Clark) provides fines from $50 to $100 or imprisonment from fifteen days to six months for any form of negligence resulting in the setting or spread of forest fires. Assembly Bill 1042 (Rutherford) prohibits the piping or other diversion of the fresh waters of the State to any other State, and charges the governor with the duty of bringing suits to prevent such diversion. This bill was aimed at such attempts as were made to divert the waters of Lake Tahoe to a Nevada reclamation project, with the incidental development of electrical power by a private corporation.

Employers' Liability Law

"An employers' liability act which shall put upon the industry the charges of its risks of human life and limb, along the lines recommended by Theodore Roosevelt." Fulfilled by Senate Bill 14 (Roseberry). This law provides that accident cases may be tried before a jury, in which event the party (employer or employee) who is proved to have been the more to blame bears the entire burden of the accident; or that the cases may be tried before an industrial accident board created by the law, if the employer and employee have both agreed, prior to the accident, to submit them to the board, in which event, an automatically determined scale of relief is afforded the victim, provided the board finds in his favor, the advantage to the employer arising from his ability to discount his accident losses by applying tables similar to mortality tables to an estimate of them, based on the known figures of possible damage that may be awarded under this law.

Effective Railway Regulation

"Such additional legislation or constitutional amendments as may be necessary to make the state railroad commission fully effective; including provisions for the physical valuation of railroad properties as one essential step toward a true basis for the fixing of rates, provisions for a uniform system of accounting, for giving the commission power to initiate action, and such further provisions for the regulation of rates and services, as shall fully and effectively protect the rights of both the people and of the railroads."

Assembly Bill 463 (Bohnett) gives the railroad commission power to fix absolute (not merely maximum) rates for freight and passenger service, to provide a uniform system of accounting for the railroads and compel its adoption, to initiate action in all cases in which it has reason to believe that excessive or discriminatory rates are being charged or inadequate service is being provided, to ascertain the value of the physical property of the railroads and the value of their stocks and bonds and the relative amounts used for interstate and intrastate business, to fix demurrage charges, to compel the railroads to build switches connecting with other railroads or with business houses, to determine whether crossings shall be at grade or not, to investigate accidents, to subpoena witnesses, to institute suits in the courts or complaints before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in general to have all the powers necessary to make the commission able to prevent injustice on the part of the railroads. This law also prohibits the issuance of passes to any except certain specified classes of persons engaged in official, public-spirited, charitable or religious work. Senate Bill 1147 (Stetson) further defines these classes of persons.

Supplementing this law is Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 6 (Sutherland) which will write into the organic law of the State that, "Said commission shall have the power to establish rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight by railroads and other transportation companies, and no railroad or other transportation company shall charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or freight, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in any tariff of rates, established by said commission, than the rates, fares and charges which are specified in such tariff. The commission shall have the further power to examine books, records and papers of all railroad and other transportation companies; to hear and determine complaints against railroad and other transportation companies; to issue subpoenas and all necessary process and send for persons and papers; and the commisssion and each of the commissioners shall have the power to administer oaths, take testimony and punish for contempt in the same manner and to the same extent as courts of record; the commission may prescribe a uniform system of accounts to be kept by all railroad and other transportation companies."

This practically reenacts the Bohnett bill into a constitutional provision. It alters the character of the commission from three commissioners elected to serve four years to five commissioners appointed by the governor to serve six years. It specifically recognizes the Bohnett bill as the law which the amendment is designed to make effective.

Regulation of Public Utilities

The next plank in the Republican platform, that needed legislative enactment to redeem it, read:

"We recommend the submission and adoption of a constitutional amendment providing for the appointment of a public service commission which shall have general supervision of all public service corporations and fix the rates to be charged by them; such commission to be similar to those now in existence in other states, where experience has demonstrated their usefulness."

This was redeemed by the Constitutional Amendment just described (Assembly C. A. 6) when supplemented by Senate Constitutional Amendment 47 (Burnett), which gives the railroad commission exclusive power and jurisdiction to regulate and supervise public utilities (except utilities owned by cities or counties which shall hereafter vote not to come under the commission's authority), and then defines public utilities to be "any commercial railroad, interurban railroad, street railroad, canal, pipe line, plant, or equipment, or any part of such railroad, canal, pipe line, plant or equipment within this state, for the transportation or conveyance of passengers, or express matter, or freight of any kind, including crude oil, or for the transmission of telephone or telegraph messages, or for the production, generation, transmission, delivery or furnishing of heat, light, water or power or for the furnishing of storage or wharfage facilities, either directly or indirectly, to or for the public, and every common carrier."

Woman Suffrage

The next plank reads:

"The submission to the judgment of the voters of California of a constitutional amendment providing for woman suffrage."

Senate Constitutional Amendment 8 (Bell) extends all the privileges of suffrage equally to women and men.

Income Tax

"We recommend that our representatives in the legislature work and vote for the amendment to the constitution of the United States recently submitted to the various legislatures by congress, permitting an income tax to be levied."

This is the last plank in the Republican platform. The title of Senate Joint Resolution No. 2 (Sanford) reads, "Ratifying and approving the proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States relative to the income tax."

Other bills of general interest are:

Regulating Automobiles

Senate Bill 10 (Campbell) makes it a felony for the driver of any motor vehicle to neglect to stop after colliding with another vehicle or to refuse to carry any person injured by such collision to medical aid. S. B. 376 (Campbell) makes it a felony for the driver of any motor vehicle, which kills or injures a person, to be intoxicated at the time of such accident. S. B. 738 (Campbell) makes it a misdemeanor for the driver of any motor vehicle to be intoxicated while driving such vehicle.

Amendment No. 1

S. B. 13 (Curtin) carries into effect Constitutional Amendment No. 1, adopted at the last general election. Senator Curtin was the only member of the legislature who pretended to know what effect this very complicated measure will have, so it would be presumptuous to attempt to analyze it here. It fixes the method of collecting taxes.

Weights and Measures Regulation

S. B. 31 (Welch) provides for the maintenance of correct standards of measurement, for the appointment of county and city sealers, and for the testing of all mechanical devices for measurement used by dealers in commodities, and for the testing of packages offered for sale to see that they contain what they claim, and makes it a misdemeanor to misrepresent quantity or weight or to falsify the scales in the sale of commodities.

Correcting the White Slave Evil

S. Bills 32 and 34 (Wolfe) minutely define the crimes of pandering and pimping, respectively, making them felonies, and make the woman concerned a competent witness against the man, even if they be married. These bills are a carefully devised attack on the White Slave evil, and were introduced at the instance of the California Club of San Francisco.

Race Track Gambling

S. B. 114 (Walker) amends the Racetrack Gambling Bill of 1909 so as to make every conceivable form of betting on the races a misdemeanor. It broke up the system of so-called "oral betting," and ended the racetrack evil in California.

Los Angeles Normal School

S. B. 163 (Sanford) known as the "pay-check bill." Prohibits the payment of wages in any form that is either non-negotiable or subject to cash discount. Strikes at an evil especially acute in lumber camps.

S. B. 221 (Boynton). The "full crew bill" requires railroads to man their trains with enough men properly to run them.

No More Supervisorial Statistics

State Flag

S. B. 291 (Holohan) adopts the bear flag as the state flag of California, and defines the bear flag.

S. B. 359 (Black) extends the commission form of government to cities of the 5th and 6th class.

Tide Lands

S. B. 445 (Hewitt) grants to Los Angeles exclusive control of tide lands at San Pedro for harbor purposes.

Regulation of Dairy Products

S. B. 453 (Martinelli) regulates sanitary conditions of dairies and regulates manufacture and sale of dairy products.

Municipal Ownership

S. B. 466 (Burnett) declares that "any municipal corporation of the State of California may acquire, construct, own, operate, or lease any public utility. A public utility, as the term is used herein, is defined to mean the supply of a municipal corporation alone or together with the inhabitants thereof, or any portion thereof, with water, light, heat, power, transportation of persons or property, means of communication, or promoting the convenience of the public." Permits city to sell excess water, light, heat or power outside city limits.

High School Instruction

S. B. 505 (Larkins) permits instruction in High Schools in athletics and military tactics, manual training, domestic science and art, agriculture, horticulture and dairying.

Disbarment of Shysters

S. B. 590 (Gates) makes moral turpitude a ground for disbarment of an attorney. Strikes at shysters.

Irrigation

S. B. 643 (Thompson) declares irrigation to be a public use, and permits the exercise of the power of eminent domain in behalf of such public use.

Probation

S. B. 1013 (Stetson) improves the probation law.

State Harbor Commission

S. B. 1170 (Walker) makes state board of harbor commissioners, of three members, appointive by governor and holding office at his pleasure.

Local Option

A. B. 37 (Wyllie) provides for local option by supervisorial districts, upon petition of twenty-five per cent of voters. In dry territory, liquors may be served to guests of a family, sold by druggists on bona fide prescription or for sacramental purposes, or delivered to purchasers in unbroken packages of not less than two gallons, or delivered to another manufacturer, or to a common carrier for shipment, or to a storage warehouse —and not otherwise.

Eight Hour Law

A. B. 248 (Griffin). "No female shall be employed in any manufacturing, mechanical or mercantile establishment, laundry, hotel, or restaurant, or telegraph or telephone establishment, or office, or by any express or transportation company in this state more than eight hours during any one day or more than forty-eight hours in one week." The harvesting, curing, canning or drying of perishable fruits and vegetables is exempted. Requires seats to be furnished by employers, and women permitted to use them.

Mechanics' Liens

THE DAY AT SAN FRANCISCO

By Franklin Hichborn

Reciprocity is a policy unknown to that element of higherupdom which took the wrong end of the San Francisco graft prosecution. Abe Ruef, by the way, of the many implicated with him, is the only one of those indicted who up to date has gone to his just reward. But to get down to our mutton—reciprocity and the anti-prosecution branch of higherupdom.

We have heard a whole lot of late about San Franciscans getting together for the good of San Francisco and the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The idea is fine. It had its start with the Panama-Pacific Exposition management, and one would like to see it blossom and bloom with the Exposition, until by the time the Exposition buildings are about completed, reputable San Francisco would be united in one solid army of San Francisco boosters, and every bribe-giver and grafter and municipal corruptionist, for the good of San Francisco, sent across to San Quentin to join their associate in crime, Abe Ruef. Such an outcome, if only as an advertisement, would be as great a benefit for San Francisco as the Panama-Pacific Exposition itself. Word sent out over the world that San Francisco, as a part of the general clean-up preparatory to the opening of the Exposition, had sent her bribe-givers to State prison, would bring the best element of pleasure-seekers and travelers and even home-hunters here by the thousands. Such a clean up would certainly be a fine thing for the Exposition. Inasmuch as the State has helped San Francisco generously in financing the Exposition, San Francisco would appear to owe it to the State to get together in this genuine spirit of practical advancement, and at least make a determined effort to convict her bribe-giving corporation magnates who are under indictment.

But alas! San Francisco, in getting together to organize for the Exposition, seems to have forgotten all about those good citizens who sacrificed time, peace of mind and fortune, yes, even personal safety, that the bribe-givers might be prosecuted.

On the list of Exposition directors, for example, one finds the names of several good men. But one finds, too, that practically every corporation which had officials indicted during the days of the prosecution for bribe-giving, has a representative on the Panama-Pacific Board. Thus, the Pacific Gas and Electric Company has its representative there, and the United Railroads, and the Parkside Company.

In the same way, those large financial interests and newspapers which opposed the prosecution are also well represented on the Exposition directorate. The San Francisco Chronicle has two representatives, the Evening Post, established for the purpose of opposing the prosecution, has one. The Union Trust Company, which advanced $175,000 to the Calkins Syndicate on curious security, about the time that syndicate started the Post, also has one of its men on the Board of Panama-Pacific directors.

But one scans the list of directors in vain for the name of a single San Francisco citizen who took prominent part in bringing Abe Ruef to book.

About the first name one would expect to find, is that of Rudolph Spreckels, whose good work at least rid San Francisco of Abe Ruef, even though we still have Abe Ruef's employers with us. But Rudolph Spreckel's name is not included among the list of directors.

James D. Phelan was also prominent in the prosecution of the corruptionists. To Phelan, too, is due largely the prominent rebuilding of downtown San Francisco. When the grafters, big and little, were looting the burned city, Phelan was raising money to reconstruct the Phelan block, the best-built structure on Market street. Phelan's faith in San Francisco encouraged the more timid Market street owners and San Francisco was rebuilt on the old site.

But Phelan's name does not appear among those of the directors of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Company.

And so the list runs. When San Francisco got together to form a Board of Directors for the Exposition, the good citizens who were identified with the righteous side of the San Francisco graft prosecution, appear to have been left out. But, as was shown in a previous article, the public service corporations that have axes to grind in San Francisco, as well as those identified with the wrong end of the graft prosecution, are well represented.

This interesting fact has been growing upon the community for some time. There is a feeling that in the general getting together, anti-prosecution higherupdom has lost sight of the reciprocity policy, and squeezed the prosecution forces out.

With this dawning idea, has come suggestion that gentlemen whose violent opposition to the prosecution of the bribe givers made them—to put it charitably and mildly—ridiculous, resign from the Exposition directorate, to make room for men who have a higher sense of good citizenship and the well-being of San Francisco than themselves.

The objection to this course has been raised, however, that the gentlemen whom this policy would eliminate from the Board have the good of the Exposition too much at heart—they are fairly wrapped up in the Exposition, we are told—to tender their resignation.

To understand the logic of this curious objection, is very difficult. If gentlemen notoriously opposed to the graft-prosecution, who have places on the Board of Exposition Directors, really have the good of the Exposition at heart, why don't they resign, and, by working for the Exposition without title, limelight, or personal advantage, as thousands and tens of thousands of Californians are doing, give evidence that they are better citizens and better Californians than their attitude toward the graft prosecution indicated.

But if the representative of the public service corporations on the Board of Directors of the Exposition Company do not resign to make way for better material. What?

Why, still we shall have the Panama-Pacific Internatinal Exposition—and still we shall have a good one.

To be sure, the inability of the Directors to promptly decide upon a site, has not increased public confidence in the happiness of the naming of the directorate. But even more powerful than the Directors is the real executive behind the Panama Exposition—Hiram W. Johnson, Governor of this State of California.

In Governor Johnson, the people of California have confidence, confidence in this instance that so far as lies in his power the affairs of the Exposition will be honestly directed. This means more than mere dollar-and-cent honest, it means square-deal honesty.

California is a third partner in the Exposition enterprise, having put up $5,000,000 of the capital. As the largest partner in the company, the State, through the Governor, has appointed a State Commission to see that the affairs of the company in which it has so much at stake are not mismanaged or basely managed.

The Commissioners are four in number. Matt I. Sullivan of San Francisco, president; Chester H. Rowell of Fresno, R. Cameron Rogers of Santa Barbara, and Marshall Stimson of Los Angeles. The State has good reason to have confidence in this Commission.

When, for example, Francis J. Heney was shot down in open court during Abe Ruef's trial, Matt I. Sullivan and Hiram W. Johnson volunteered their services to carry on the prosecution where the stricken Heney had been forced by a would-be assassin's bullet to lay it down. Johnson and Sullivan carried the trial to successful ending. Ruef is in State prison.

Marshall Stimson, Chester H. Rowell, and R. Cameron Rogers, each in his community and throughout the State, have labored in the cause of good government, always. These four men are the agents of the Exposition Company's largest partner, the State of California. They are able, intelligent, honest—and fighters. They will see to it that an enterprise in which the State of California is so largely interested is made a success.

The State law governing the State's pecuniary interest in the Exposition gives the four commissioners practically unlimited supervision and power as follows:

1. To determine whether any of the State's $5,000,000 or any of the money shall be expended for any specific purpose in connection with the Exposition.

2. To determine the advisability, necessity or advantage of any act in connection with such $5,000,000.

3. To demand at any time and as often as it desires of the Exposition Company a full and complete detailed statement of the receipts of the company, of the company's expenditures to be made, or incurred by the company.

4. To examine the books, records, contracts, accounts, vouchers and all papers of every sort and character in the possession of the company. It is required that these documents shall be open to the inspection of the Commissioners or their authorized agents.

Failure on the part of the Exposition Company to permit the agents of the State to make such neeessary inspection of its records is made reason sufficient for the State Commission to refuse to make any expenditures, or to execute any contract, or to pay or disburse any sum of money.

Acting under the powers conferred upon it, it is not unlikely that the Commission—should the wrangling and squabbling of the Exposition Directors over the selection of a site continue—will step in and protect the State by means of a harmony program of its own.

On the score of expenditures, it has been suggested that every bill paid by the Panama-Pacific Company, be first submitted to the State Commission. If it be found to be a just bill, then the State will, out of the $5,000,000 appropriated for the Exposition, pay one-third of it. If the bill be found to be unjust or unwarranted then a sum equal to one-third of the bill's total, will be turned back into the State treasury.

It is not unlikely that some such plan will be decided upon.

The general public would, of course, have greater confidence in the management of the Exposition if on its Board of Directors were representatives of that type of self-sacrificing good citizenship which made the prosecution of the San Francisco bribe givers possible. But still there is no good reason for losing confidence in the Exposition, for back of the enterprise is the State of California, represented by Governor Hiram W. Johnson and a State Commission whose members have long since earned the merited regard and confidence of all classes who stand for law and order and the square deal.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BERKELEY ELECTION

By J. STITT WILSON

Mayor-Elect of Berkeley

Say, what shall be said of the great Bishop's town—
Bishop, and prophet, and poet, and seer?—
Why, pluck up a cedar, and set her fame down
In gold and in flower-fed atmosphere.
City of cities in stories to be—
Classical, schclar-built Berkeley.

Aye, write her fair story—as fair as a star,
As sweet as her sea-winds, as strong as her sea—
City with never a stain or a scar—
City of deeds and of destiny:
Sea-born and sun-bred Mecca to be—
Matchless, magnificent Berkeley.
—Joaquin Miller.

The misinformation supplied by the public through your columns in a recent issue by Mr. J. D. Galloway, on the significance of the Berkeley election demands a reply for the simple sake of the truth. The California Outlook is supposed to be a "progressive" magazine and professes to be the herald of the "advance guard" in state and municipal politics. Its columns therefore should give the people of the state the simple truth if possible concerning municipal affairs.

Mr. Galloway wrote his article he says in order to give the public "proper information" concerning the defeat of Mr. Hodghead, and to give people "a clear idea of the situation which is of far more than local interest." That is all that I wish to do in making this reply.

The first simple fact is that the Socialists of Berkeley nominated me for Mayor. On the 13th day of March I opened the campaign and in nineteen days from that time I was elected Mayor by a majority of 281 votes.

During these nineteen days, night after night, I spoke to the largest political gatherings ever held in Berkeley. Three times, once each week, the High School Auditorium, the largest in the city, was packed to overflowing. I held nearly a dozen small meetings among the students. Column after column of my speeches appeared in the "Gazette." We published our own little paper, "The City for the People," and placed one in every home. A full page of both local papers was published the day before the election containing my message to the electors. Two days preceding the election a personal letter from myself was delivered by hand to every voter in Berkeley.

Mr. Galloway characterizes the men who went to the polls and elected me as "cranks, soreheads, grafters," and last but not least, "criminals." He declares that it was the "bad element," the "forces working against decency and honest government in Berkeley," the "enemies of society" that carried me to victory. He goes further and declares to the public that Berkeley possesses a greater share of such people than is usually supposed.

First I want to say that, irrespective of campaign, election, or results, on behalf of my beloved city of which I am more than proud, whose fair name is our civic jewel, I resent with all my soul this malignant, and false characterization of any part of our citizenship, to say nothing of the splendid and royal people that attended our meetings and fought the campaign and carried me to victory. Mr. Galloway should publicly retract such a slander upon his fellow townsmen, upon his own next door neighbor, upon his own fair city. I am sure that he wrote these words in a fit of anger, and stinging with a sense of political defeat. Let him say so. Let him frankly confess that he wrote in haste and in a fever of chagrin, and our people will as frankly forgive him, and restore him to his place among us as good fellows irrespective of our differences in municipal politics.

Let the facts meet this second point of Mr. Galloway's attack. College professors, students, ministers of the gospel, school teachers, business men by scores, sturdy honest workingmen, even men of large means voted for me and elected me. In their name I resent this shameful attack.

But let the figures of the election talk. I carried a majority of the precincts, and six out of the eight districts of the city. Does the grafter and the criminal thus infest three quarters of proud Berkeley?

Mr. Hodghead and I are neighbors and vote in the same precinct. It is the largest but one in the city. Out of 351 votes cast therein I had 164, or but 23 less than my opponent. Are these neighbors of mine and of Mr. Hodghead's, grafters, cranks, soreheads and criminals? For shame!

In the two adjoining precincts in residential North Berkeley, out of 543 votes cast Mr. Hodghead beat me by one lone vote! Can these citizens be described as "the bad elements" and "enemies of society," simply because they disagreed with Mr. Galloway, the president of the City Club?

Some more figures. I was elected at the primary. Three weeks later came the final election. Two of my Socialist colleagues qualified. The attack upon us continued unabated, including Mr. Galloway's article in The California Outlook.

At the primary, John A. Wilson, Socialist candidate for the council, carried but 7 out of the 22 precincts over his opponent, Mr. Berry, of the Hodghead Club. At the final election, the figures were just reversed. Mr. Berry lost 400 votes and John A. Wilson gained 1000 in the three weeks, gaining in every precinct of the city, carrying 14 out of 22 and doubling and trebling his former vote in several. The other Hodghead candidate was beaten by 800. It is almost unkind to tell the story.

The Socialist candidate for the School Board, H. I. Stern, carried 17 out of 22 precincts with a majority of 800 votes over Mr. Galloway's candidate. In Mr. Hodghead's and Mr. Galloway's own precincts. Wilson and Stern both came off with majorities.

I submit to an intelligent reading public that our victory in Berkeley at both elections, the second greater than the first, is accounted for by the awakening social conscience, the civic spirit and municipal advance of the people, and these figures representing the votes of the people of Berkeley are to give the public "a clear idea of the situation which is of far more than local interest." They repudiate Mr. Galloway's slander on his own city, and indicate a new trend in municipal politics that will sweep the state.

This leads me to the third and remaining part of Mr. Galloway's misinterpretation of the Berkeley election, viz., the platform on which I fought and won.

Here again by the road of petty sarcasm and satire he gives the reader an entirely erroneous conception of our municipal platform which the people so enthusiastically endorsed. He represents me as a man with a glib tongue, deceiving the ignorant, in order to mass them with the "grafters and criminals" already under my banner. As a forceful speaker and an adept in misleading the unthinking I led on the "enemies of society" to "wreck the government," says Mr. Galloway.

Mr. Galloway discolors every proposal of our municipal program and ends up by stating that I promised to "give every one work," and "all the ills of humanity would be cured" if I was elected to office.

Presented to the people of Berkeley a very simple program of Constructive Municipal Socialism as follows:

1. Expert investigation of the physical valuation, investment, etc., of all public service corporations, the report of same to be placed before the people as a basis of constructive action with regard to these utilities.

2. On the basis of these investigations we urged the immediate exercise of the provisions of the charter to regulate the charges of these public service corporations. We especially considered water, gas, and electricity.

3 Beyond investigation and regulation we advocated the ultimate municipal ownership of our public utilities as soon as the legal steps could be taken to that effect. And in this respect we urged immediate steps toward municipal water and municipal light; and a municipal incinerator. These we declared should be carried to successful issue at no late date.

4. We distinctly stated that all our public services could not be socialized at once, but as a progressive city administration, we should take each step with the ultimate end in view of owning all of our utilities and operating them at cost for the people.

5. We urged upon the people a consideration of the taxation of the unearned increment of land values. This method of taxation is not now possible, but would be under an amended charter.

We added our approval of kindergartens, trade union conditions in city work, and a plank for the City Beautiful.

We challenge any fair criticism of the program. It was this program, as explained and illustrated from night to night, that Berkeley adopted by electing the Socialists.

I carefully avoided the least shadow of vain promises. I warned the people that the real battle with the corporations would come later. I distinctly and emphatically declared time and again that the city could not solve the question of unemployment. Mr. Galloway says "every man was to have work if I were elected." This is his manner of telling the truth.

I was overcautious in my promises to the electors; witness my last word to them repeating what I had said a score of times:

"I stand flat-footed for a program of municipal ownership of our public utilities, to be inaugurated and carried out as rapidly as the machinery of law can effect it, and the popular vote of the people shall decide. I believe that the city administration should seek to secure the necessities of city life and the advantages of city life, for the use and enjoyment of the humblest family, and to place these things at the lowest possible cost for the best service. But I hold before the voters no rosy hopes. I am too familiar with the powerful and relentless hostility of public service corporations to think that this can be accomplished in a day. I know better. It is no easy task to initiate such a program. But if you believe in my spirit in the matter it is up to you to decide whether or not you wish a man to be mayor of Berkeley who aggressively stands for these things on behalf of the people."

And they decided. In our campaign we discussed this program and nothing else. Not a man of us uttered an unkind, ungenerous, or unmanly word in six weeks of campaigning, and we won on our principles and program.

I have now placed before your readers my relation to the Berkeley Socialist movement; I have replied to Mr. Galloway's slander upon his fellow citizens; and by reciting my pre-election program and promises I have shown up Mr. Galloway's misrepresentation of our campaign and our municipal outlook.

MAYOR ALEXANDER OF LOS ANGELES URGED TO STAND FOR RE-ELECTION

The chief topic of discussion in political circles the past week has been the action of the executive committee of the Good Government Organization in adopting a resolution presented by F. V. Owen, formally requesting Mayor George Alexander to become a candidate for re-election. On February 18th the central committee unqualifiedly endorsed his administration and pledged him its full moral support "in his determined fight for good government and the people's rights." The action of the executive committee Monday was not only a ratification of the act of the larger body of good government workers, but it took the form of a demand that the Mayor "consider himself as the Good Government candidate for the mayoralty in the coming campaign."

From Good Government headquarters comes the information that the rank and file in the organization are practically a unit, so far as can be learned, in insisting that Mayor Alexander run again, regardless of his personal preferences in the matter. He has not yet announced his determination. It is known that he prefers that some other man continue the work inaugurated by him, but the insistent demand from the ranks of his supporters that he devote two years more to the big tasks in hand, not yet completed, may induce him to consent to stand for another term.

Economy in Road Repairs: Which pays better, to keep roads constantly in good repair by having men at work on them all the time, or to allow them to wear out to a point where they become really troublesome, and then turn in a gang to put them in good order again? The Fort Worth, Texas, authorities propose to find out by keeping a careful record of repairs made under each of these two systems, and comparing the cost through a period of years. It would seem to depend in a large measure on the original construction of the road and the character of the wear to which it was subjected. California people were the first to discover that it paid to keep a country road well sprinkled—if water could be obtained on reasonable terms—because the cost of sprinkling was less than the cost of constant repair on the dry road. The same general law would apply to the work of keeping a road in repair. Given a well-constructed oiled macadam road, for example, and it would probably pay best to keep it in almost perfect repair.

Advanced Housing Code: Columbus, Ohio, is said to have the most complete and up-to-date housing code of any city in the United States. It is based on the "Model Tenement House Law" of Lawrence Veiller, modified to meet local conditions. The law includes not only tenements but dwelling houses as well, guaranteeing to the tenant a minimum standard of light, air, yard, water and toilet facilities. No tenement or dwelling may be higher than the width of the street on which it stands, rear tenements are not allowed, non-fireproof tenements are limited to three stories, wooden houses must not contain more than two families, basement and cellar rooms are not to be used for living purposes, tenements are not permitted on streets without sewer and water pipes; these are some of the provisions of the act.

May Move Factories Out of Town: Brought up against the concrete problem of how to safeguard a fifteen story building containing inflammable work-materials, so that the hundreds of operatives will not be injured by a sudden fire, the authorities of New York city find it necessary to impose so many restrictions that it will have the effect of driving many of these factories outside the city. Everybody agrees that this probably will be the very best thing that can happen. Why should Manhattan Island be 15 stories deep when all around it is clear open country? Perhaps the essential error of the situation lies in trying to conduct a factory in a sky-scraper, and like enough the problem has no solution except the simple one that it must not be done.

Child Labor: Georgia is now the only state in the Union where children under twelve are allowed to work over 60 hours a week. North Carolina put in a 60 hour limit this year, but it allows thirteen-year-old children to work all night. The laws are somewhat better in South Carolina, but there is practically no inspection. A bill providing for two inspectors passed the legislature but was vetoed by the governor. Carnegie gives millions for libraries, and Rockefeller gives millions for universities, and our churches send millions to convert the heathen, but the tenth part of one million wisely expended in agitation through the South and in making the people understand these conditions would remedy this hideous and sickening wrong.

Pays to Get a Good Engineer: Providence, Rhode Island, has employed Engineer John R. Freeman, formerly of the Panama Canal Commission, to plan the best method of cutting through a broad street from the business district to the residence district of that city. The work will probably cost about a million and a third of dollars, and it is believed that good engineering advice will be worth all it costs in such an enterprise. The good old doctrine was that our local city engineer, who was nominated by the boys because he was a good mixer and belonged to 15 varieties of secret society, was just as good as any of them. That notion still prevails with respect to most things but not with regard to engineering questions.

Women in Police Work: Women vote now in Washington, and the police authorities of Seattle have decided that it will be wise to find some places on the force for a few of the gentler sex. There are to be some women detectives, and places about the jail are, several of them, to be taken by women. In Wakefield, Vermont, it happens that the acting night chief-of-police is a woman. She is chief operator of the local telephone exchange, and, as the watchmen report to her, it was thought best to make her deputy chief for the night hours. Wakefield has the red light signal system, so she can call up the men on their beats whenever it is necessary.

Ventilation and Efficiency: In the new study of efficiency the matter of ventilation and proper sanitary conditions in factories plays an important part. Experiments show that the noxuous effects of carbon-dioxide or used-up air increases with the increase of temperature, and work rooms are usually overheated. By a systematic care of the ventilation of its work rooms, the Pension Department at Washington reduced its annual sickness absences from 18,736 to 10,114. The effect of bad air is to make workers sluggish, sleepy and depressed. Pure air means better work and more work.

First in Line: California was the first American state to pass a law for the compulsory reporting of diseases of occupation. This law, which is under consideration in many other states, requires the attending physician when the disease is one that grows directly out of the occupation to send an account of the case to the State Health authorities. England has had this law for several years, and has gathered valuable statistics, whereby measures of reform have been accomplished and the death rate lowered.

Electric Fans for Playhouses: Experiments carried on by the Board of Health in playhouses and moving picture establishments in South Bend, Indiana, by means of clouds of smoke thrown into the auditorium and allowed to stand until removed by natural drafts, show very plainly that the air in most of these places stands still and must be very deleterious to the health of the people witnessing the show. Most of these houses will be required to put in electric fans to clear the air.

Widening Streets Campaign: St. Paul, which, like many cities in California, is laid out with narrow streets in its business district, proposes to undertake an active campaign for widening them. It contemplates using the same plan that has been used with success in Philadelphia, by which new lines are set for a street, and a long period of time, from ten to twenty years, allowed for the moving back or reconstruction of buildings.

Effect of Dry Year: The long drouth of last spring and summer has awakened many eastern cities to the dangers of a limited water supply. Northampton, Massachusetts, having put in a reservoir of half a million gallons, had fondly supposed it was fixed up to run 100 years; but now the water experts report that a reservoir of half a billion gallons is needed for complete safety.

Cleaning Street-car Streets: The city of Pittsburg got a decision from the courts that the street car lines were responsible for the cleaning of their part of the street, and it proceeded to bring suit to collect for past work with interest. The sum demanded was over seven hundred thousand dollars, and a verdict was recently rendered giving the city $225,000.

Women in Office in Colorado: As a result of recent elections a number of important municipal and county positions in Colorado will be held by women. One of the County Commissioners of Denver is a woman, and there are four in this legislature. Pueblo has a woman auditor, and Leadville, Greely and several other cities have women treasurers. Some places have women for city clerks.

Open Air Schools Needed: A report on conditions in the Philadelphia schools shows that there are over 1000 children with marked tendency toward tuberculosis who should be kept in out-of-door school rooms; but although the Bureau of Health has repeatedly made demands for action on the Board of Education, nothing has been done.

Commission Government: After noting the success of municipal lighting and the business-like methods of a commission form of government in other Michigan cities, the people of Saginaw are agitating in favor of those two things.

Public Drinking Cup: About one-third of the States of the Union have now abolished the public drinking cup.

THE RECALL OF JUDGES

By State Senator LEE C. GATES

A strong argument in favor of the recall of the judiciary was presented to members of the Los Angeles City Club at the regular weekly luncheon of the club last Saturday.

The speaker of the occasion was State Senator Lee C. Gates, author of Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 23, which provides for the recall of State officials, including the judiciary.

Senator Gates spoke, in part, as follows:

The recall has been demonstrated here in this city, as it has in other cities, to be a necessary, as well as a very effective, weapon by which the people may take from one who is unworthy to hold it the power that they have bestowed and take it back where it belongs, to themselves, and bestow it upon some more worthy incumbent.

If there be any principle in American government that stands out preeminently above any other, it is the power of self-government that is properly administered, and if any individual be employed by the people in any capacity, administrative, clerical, executive or judicial, that agency ought to be revoked the moment that the individual proves himself to be either unworthy or incompetent or untrustful; and that power is the power that we intend to give to the people of the State by the amendment which has been prepared and will be submitted at the election which has been called for the tenth of October.

All will admit, I think, for the sake of the argument and by conviction, that an unworthy public servant should be recalled. So also will every man admit, I believe, that an unjust judge, an immoral judge, an incompetent judge, an oppressive judge, a judge who has become corrupt, a judge who is not loyal to his country and who has not the spirit of the institutions of America in his heart, ought to be recalled and be replaced by a man who will answer to the description of a judge, firm, just and incorruptible.

What is there in the office of the judiciary that makes a man sacred instantly when he has been clothed with the power that is his when he dons the ermine and ascends the Bench? Does he cease to be as human as before? Has he changed his characteristics? If he were a corrupt man before he was elected and placed in that office, does he become instantly incorruptible?

The history of the judiciary of every state of the Union, the history of the federal judiciary, the history, even, of the Supreme Court of the United States, has answered that question in the negative.

The main objection that was made to the recall of the judiciary at the last legislature was that it would put the judges in terror; that the judges under this recall measure, if it were adopted by the people, would be put into terror as to their duty. It was argued that the law was an exact science,—that, however, is believed by the layman mainly; there are few lawyers who believe it.

No man knows what the law is until he has carried the case to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court has said that the legislature had the power to enact the law; that the legislature has enacted a law that is constitutional; that the legislature has enacted a law that is not against public policy; that the legislature has enacted a law that it has the power to enact; and until they have looked it all over and said, "This law is one proper to be enacted." After all that has happened the court has said what the law is and not your legislature; because there has grown up here in America a system of judicial interpretation which has become no more nor less than judicial legislation, and the legislation of the country and the laws of the country are made far more completely and definitely by the courts than they possibly can be made by the legislature, and that in face of the fact that our government is declared to be divided into three co-ordinate branches, legislative, executive and judicial. The judiciary of the country has usurped the functions of the other two without any single check against them, and unless you put that check upon them and reserve unto the people of the country the power that they possess under the constitutions of our nation and state, you have established here a judicial monarchy.

The constitution of the State of California was adopted thirty-two years ago. For thirty-two years we have had the recall in the constitution of the State of California. Did you know that? For thirty-two years we have had the recall in the constitution; not in the hands of the people, it is true, but in the hands of the legislature.

Section 10, Article VI, of the Constitution reads:

"Justices of the Supreme Court and of the District Courts of Appeal and judges of the Superior Courts may be removed by concurrent resolution of both houses of the legislature adopted by a two-thirds vote of each house."

What is that? What is that but the recall? Judges may be removed by a two-thirds vote of the legislature, expressed in a concurrent resolution, and that, too, without their being permitted to do more than appear and make explanation of the charges that are made against them. No trial necessary. That isn't an impeachment. It isn't a forum on that question. The Legislature of the State of California, at its recent session, could have called any member of the Supreme Court before it at that session; could have called all of the members of the Supreme Court before it at that session and could have removed all of them by a two-thirds vote if it had seen fit to do so. The Recall has been in the constitution ever since it was written.

The Recall has been there for thirty years and more, and to be exercised by whom? By the agents of the people? Well, not exactly. It was written there because the "interests" in this state wanted to control the judges of the courts, and knowing that they could control the legislature, put the power there where they could exercise it whenever a judge didn't do their bidding. Whenever a judge would stand out against those interests and they desired his recall, it was within the power of the Southern Pacific, up to the convening of the last legislature, to have invoked the recall and removed any judge that refused to do the bidding of that great corporation.

The recall is in our state constitution. It is in the constitutions and the laws of at least twenty-six other states of this Union. I investigated that far. There may be more, because in my investigations I didn't take the time to make the investigation complete. But I found it in twenty-six other states, and that, too, from the very time that those states were organized. In some states the Governor may remove a judge; after making charges and presenting the same to the Legislature, the Governor himself may remove. But in nearly all the states the power rested in the legislature.

Every opposition made to the recall of the judiciary is based upon a distrust of the people, and yet I say to you that every man who believes in a republican form of government, every man who is imbued by the spirit of democracy, every man who believes in the principles of the Declaration of Independence and that government is instituted by men for their own benefit, is willing to trust the people. They are honest; they are patient; they are long-suffering; they are forbearing; they are just, and in the end they are wise,—wiser than any of us. But whether they are or whether they are not, they are the supreme power in this country.

There are two places that I always have approached with the deepest awe. I enter the sanctuary of religion with an awe that is profound. I come into the presence of the courts, that tribunal that stands as the exemplar of liberty and justice and right, with the same deference that I approach the throne from which the religion of God is preached. I have that respect. It is inbred. It is inborn. To the lawyer it is not only inborn, but it is inculcated and cultivated. Not by right, but because we have permitted it.

Yet I would criticise the courts, as any other independent and self-respecting, thinking man must, when the decisions of those courts run counter to the decrees of sense and equity and absolute right and justice, because within the heart of every man there is that sense and judgment of right.

When the Dred Scott decision indicated to the American people that slavery had laid its polluting hand upon every branch of the government and had at last obtained control of the judicial branch as well, it was Abraham Lincoln, in that series of masterly debates with Stephen A. Douglas, who fought against that decision and declared that the American people must revise, must revoke, must rewrite the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the rights of common man.

Criticise the courts? I am going to quote something that has been said respecting the decision in the income tax cases decided in 1895 by the Supreme Court of the United States:

"In my judgment—to say nothing of the disregard of the former adjudications of this court, and of the settled practice of the government—this decision may well excite the gravest apprehensions. It strikes at the very foundation of national authority, in that it denies to the general government a power which is, or may, become vital to the very existence and preservation of the Union in an emergency, such as that of war with a great commercial nation, during which the collection of all duties upon imports will cease or be materially diminished.

"But this is not all. The decision now made may provoke a contest in this country from which the American people would have been spared if the court had not overturned its former adjudications, and had adhered to the principles of taxation under which our government, following the repeated adjudications of this court, has always been administered. . . .

"With the policy of legislation of this character, the court has nothing to do. That is for the legislative branch of the government. It is for Congress to determine whether the necessities of the government are to be met, or the interests of the people subserved, by the taxation of incomes. With that determination, so far as it rests upon grounds of expediency or public policy, the courts can have no rightful concern. The safety and permanency of our institutions demand that each department of government shall keep within its legitimate sphere, as defined by the supreme law of the land."

Who said that? Some anarchist? Some ranter upon a street corner? Some member of the legislature that has just adjourned? Not by any means. That was said by Judge Harlan of the Supreme Court of the United States, reflecting upon the decision that had been rendered in that case, where five members of the court had overruled five decisions of the Supreme Court, had overruled the other four members of that court, had overruled the entire legislative branch of the government, had overruled the executive of this country, and had declared that to be law which never had been declared law before.

Here is what somebody else said of the same thing.

"Even the spectre of socialism is conjured up to frighten Congress from laying taxes upon the people in proportion to their ability to pay them. It is certainly a strange commentary upon the Constitution of the United States and upon the democratic government that Congress has no power to lay a tax which is one of the main sources of revenue of nearly every civilized state. It is a confession of feebleness in which I find myself wholly unable to join. While I have no doubt that Congress will find some means of surmounting the present crisis, my fear is that in some moment of national peril this decision will rise up to frustrate its will and paralyze its arm. I hope it may not prove the first step towards submergence of the liberties of the people in a sordid despotism of wealth."

What said that? Justice Brown of the Supreme Court of the United States in his dissenting opinion.

I want to quote two more:

"The practical operation of the decision is not only to disregard the great principle of equality in taxation, but the further principle that in the imposition of taxes for the benefit of the government the burdens thereof should be imposed upon those having most ability to bear them. This decision, in effect, works out a directly opposite result, in relieving the citizens having the greater ability, while the burdens of taxation are made to fall most heavily and oppressively upon those having the least ability. It lightens the burdens upon the larger number in some states subject to the tax, and places it most unequally and disproportionately on the smaller number in other states. Considered in all its bearings, this decision is, in my judgment, the most disastrous blow ever struck at the constitutional power of Congress."

That was said by Justice Jackson of the Supreme Court in his comments upon the decision that had been rendered in that case.

I have one more:

"The injustice of the conclusion points to the error of adopting it. It takes invested wealth and reads it into the constitution as a favored and protected class of property. . . .

"It is, I submit, greatly to be deplored that, after more than one hundred years of our national existence, after the government has withstood the strain of foreign wars and the dread ordeal of civil strife, and its people have become united and powerful, this court should consider itself compelled to go back to a long repudiated and rejected theory of the constitution."

Who said that? Another Associate Justice at that time but today the Chief Justice of the United States, Justice White.

So when you say that I have no right to criticise the courts, I answer that, so long as four members of the Supreme Court of the United States have used that language with respect to their colleagues upon that Bench, every citizen has a right to look into their decision to see whether or not it intrudes upon his rights and invades the rights that belong to him under the constitution and the law.

We created a government in America founded upon the principle that men were equal and each entitled to a voice in that government. We created a government here that was founded upon public opinion and upon public will. The constitution, by and through the people, declared that there should be three co-ordinate branches of government. In the debates before the constitutional convention it cannot be found that it was the opinion of the framers of the constitution that there should be a power upon the part of the judiciary to override the others; that they should have the power to declare a law unconstitutional.

Is there any branch of this government that can, under the spirit and the theory of our government, have supreme arbitrary power? Is there any branch of the government that, under our form of government, should be clothed with a power beyond the people themselves?

We have no power over our judiciary,—I say the national judiciary,—we have no power over them—who say what your laws mean. They say what the effect of your laws shall be; they declare whether the legislature has acted properly and legally in the enactment of legislation, and yet there is no power whatever over them. Witness our struggle to obtain the power to levy an income tax in the United States today. Why haven't we that power? Because the Supreme Court has said we haven't it. The legislature has said we have. The executive has said we have. The judiciary had said at least once, and in my opinion five times, before, and as was said by these men, the associate justices, before that decision was rendered, the judiciary has said such power existed; but it is now said that it doesn't exist. And I say that, under the spirit of our law, under the very spirit of our civilization, and our government, the essence of our political existence requires that we put the creator above the creature by giving to the people the power to withdraw the judiciary if it violates the trust imposed in it by the people.

There is but one agency in which should rest supreme arbitrary power. We are told that we can remove judges by impeachment. In all of the history of the United States we have only impeached two men. Two judges I am speaking of now, two judges of the federal courts. Only two. One for drunkenness and debauchery; and the other because of disloyalty to the Union. Those two are the only men we have removed under the impeachment process in the United States.

The impeachment proceeding against Warren Hastings lasting eight years, and then failing to remove him from office, is an example of the swift and energetic methods provided for the removal of public officials by that route.

Justice Brewer, in one of his opinions, said that the protection of property is a supreme power of government I would have that doctrine changed to mean that vested rights and property and public rights and individual liberty should stand equally within the pale of the law and be equally entitled to protection of the courts; but when the two conflict and vested rights and property rights are in opposition to human rights, the property rights are not supreme but that human rights rise above all others.

William Kent on the Tariff

April 26th Mr. Kent took part in the debate in the House on the free list. His remarks, in part, are given below. Looking through the scores of speeches made in this and the reciprocity debate we find few to be compared with that of Mr. Kent for clear thinking and for attractiveness of expression. Evidently the talk made a "hit."

Mr. Chairman, we novices in the art or profession of manufacturing Federal law, subject, of course, to revision by the Senate, the President, the Supreme Court, and the powers above, have eagerly absorbed what has been said and have learned much that can not possibly be true. How could it all be true when judged by the votes on the reciprocity treaty and by the explanations given for those votes? There is no concensus of opinion on either side of the House, even amongst the most experienced and tutored as to the causes or probable effects of that measure.

In so far as the discussion relates to the protective-tariff theory, there is, however, some unanimity on one point, at least a partial agreement that the protective tariff should be regarded as a "local issue." That this particular national policy must be wrought out of the clash of class, section, district, and other special interests, and settled by a sort of mutual give-and-take, less euphemistically known as log-rolling—this makes of the tariff a sort of a grab bag, and we may reasonably expect that the more powerful get the first, last, and biggest grabs.

I am a Republican, or what used to be a Republican (applause on the Republican side), because I believe in the protection of infant industries that stand some eventual chance of becoming self-sustaining. That many of these industries, once fostered by protection, are now self-sustaining and do not need a protective tariff is abundantly shown and notoriously confessed as to the great steel industry by Mr. Andrew Carnegie. Many industries, having outgrown the cradle, have not been required to hustle for their livelihood, but have been carried bodily to a ward in the hospital where our standpat friends advocate keeping them during all eternity, to be doctored, nursed, and nourished at the public expense. One is reminded of the prayer of the man who possessed a cantankerous invalid wife: "Oh, Lord, let her get well, or —or—something." (Laughter.)

It is argued that by taxing one industry for the benefit of another industry, and vice versa, we create a home market that is productive of wealth. This brings to mind a story told by David Starr Jordan concerning the eagle and the blue-tailed lizard. It seems that the eagle one day swooped down upon the lizard and bit off and ate the lizard's tail; whereupon the eagle acquired sufficient energy to lay an egg. The lizard climbed the tree, sucked the egg, and, through the encouragement thus afforded, grew a new tail. This process continued through many years, apparently, without much profit to either party save as it added to the interest of existence. (Laughter.)

A tale of similar import, but more profitable sequence, was related of a man who lived near the Petaluma marshes and started to raise carp. He was doing fairly well selling carp from his pond, when he suddenly conceived the idea of raising a side line of cats for the fur. He discovered that he could feed the carp to the cats and the cats to the carp, so that he increased mightily in his output of cats and carp and became wealthy. (Laughter.)

Concerning the change and evolution that has come over the early Republican protective doctrine, designed to foster infant industries, I would further submit the following:

Mary had a little lamb,
Its fleece was white as snow;
It followed her to Pittsburg,
And now you ought to see the darned thing.

(Laughter and applause.)

The old idea of encouraging new industries is being destroyed by the present system, for, in so far as

Trusts and monopolies are being encouraged, individual enterprise and personal initiative are being suppressed. A monopoly need not confine its charges to a high percentage of profit on the product, but it can charge up to the public all the graft and mismanagement that may go to make up its costs. It is not compelled to be efficient. It can afford to dispense with improvements in machinery and methods. It can put valuable patents in cold storage. Thus the tariff, in so far as it aids the trusts, throttles progress instead of fostering industry.

In song and oratory we are properly reminded of the gratitude we owe to the Providence that placed us in this land of liberty and plenty. Is there not shown a lack of appreciation when we hear the solemn assertions made by some of the gentlemen that our prosperity is not due to the natural bounties of our country, not to the genius and efficiency of our people, but to a system of taxing ourselves. (Applause on the Democratic side.) Whenever protest is made against the existing protective tariff an argument promptly adduced in its favor is one which was best phrased by the Hon. "Bathhouse" Coughlin in the city hall of Chicago. He asked a fellow alderman how he could advocate the creation of prohibition territory and consequent loss of revenue from saloon licenses, when, as he stated it, "we are all of us heartily in need of funds." If either the Government or any interest happens to be "heartily in need of funds," there is always a means of raising revenue by boosting the tariff. I do not believe that it helps matters much to hold that we ought to lower the wall to such a point as to provide only for the higher wages of American labor plus a profit to the manufacturer or producer. This amendment still justifies the establishment in our country of industries that do not belong here. It would justify the raising of cocoanuts in hothouses. It would justify a tremendous tax upon tea in order that the laborer engaged in tea culture could be recompensed at upward of a dollar a day, while he is now receiving probably less than 10 cents a day on the other side of the ocean. I am unpatriotic enough to be grateful to the heathens who in their blindness are picking tea for us at that rate of wages, and I would not advocate forcing them to adopt our standard of living by the wearing of American clothes, or even the drinking of Missouri champagne, Mr. Speaker, for I fear they might be brought to feel the necessity of charging us more for doing us this service.

No one has ever shown any fund from which can be drawn the tax levied by the tariff and paid out in subsidies to the protected interests except the fund that resides in the pockets of the people. Those who assume that the tariff is a means of creating prosperity or of creating wealth are much better at juggling and at picking coins out of the air than was Herrmann, the magician. If we can tax ourselves rich, we can prove poker to be a productive industry. (Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.) Equally, an individual may become opulent by shifting coins from one pocket to another, and the Nation can acquire wealth, if not merit, by unanimously consenting to the reciprocal picking of pockets by all the people.

Economists would doubtless urge that this universal and fairly distributed pocket-picking system would be unproductive, but we have had too much of the doctrinaire teachings to listen to any more of it.

It might be surmised that should the pocket-picking system become thoroughly established it would not be equally enjoyable to all the people. There would be some more adept than others. There would probably be coteries formed in the profession that would band together in "strong-arm" or "holdup" work, and when, if perchance through popular clamor, because of overactivity, the practice were put into partial disrepute, and there arose the question of proper limitation, it would be found that the least skilled and the unorganized would first be deprived of the privilege of picking pockets. (Laughter.)

Through many of us newly-elected members the people are protesting, not against the wealth of the country, but against the present system of distribution, which fully deserves the bitter resentment it has incurred. The evils of distribution are caused by special privileges and the protective tariff creates and licenses privilege. It would not interest the men described in the Pittsburg Survey, who are worked to death and thrown on the junk pile, to figure out and to ascertain how many wives per annum a Pittsburg millionaire could afford out of the dividends of the Steel Trust. (Laughter.) Rather would he be interested in supporting one wife and some few children with less work and more pay. There would be little satisfaction to a cash girl working for the Marshall Field Co. at a weekly wage of $3 to know that she and that corporation were jointly worth over $50,000,000. (Laughter.) The people are not satisfied with statistics of national wealth, they want better conditions for themselves.

But after all, the greatest sin that can be laid at the door of the protective tariff is the economic waste which it encourages. The fortunes piled up by the richest men of the country amount to nothing when set against the annual loss caused by the employment of men in unjustifiable occupations.

A subsidy which supports those occupations must come from other occupations which belong on our soil and in our country, and the men engaged in either the wrong thing or the right thing in the wrong place form an army which we might call the "army of the mal-employed." They have to be supported by the well employed, just as much as every standing army is a charge upon industry.

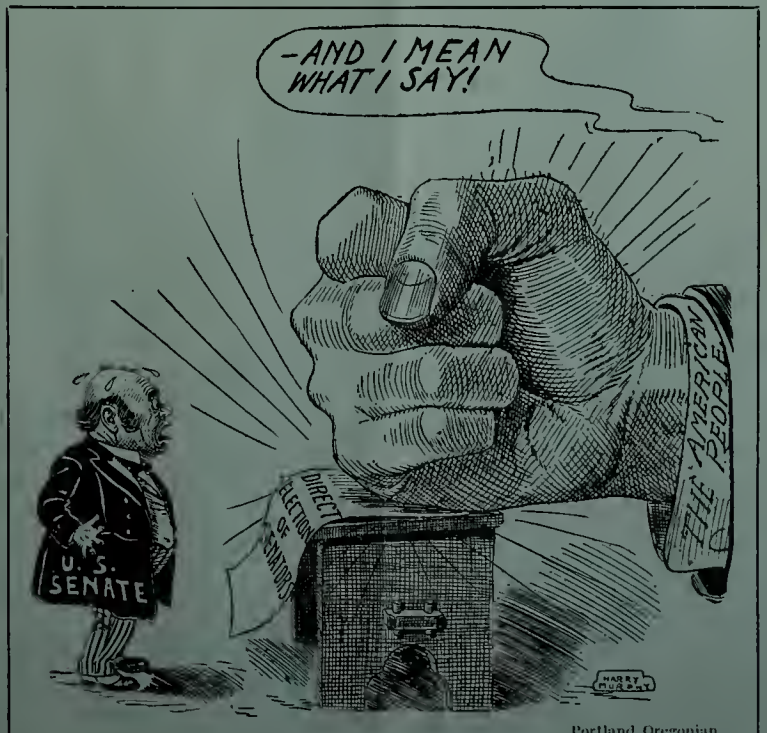
Some day I expect to hear our standpat Republican friends making the old confession, "We have caused to be done those things that ought not to be done; we have left undone those things that ought to be done, and there is no health in us." (Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.)

The Record, with its vast compilation of statistics, shows a mathematical ability engaged in proving out what is logically absurd. The accuracy of the almanac does not prove the value of the nostrum it advertises, nor can questions of ethics be determined by the use of logarithms. One is rather inclined to doubt the efficacy of such figures when they are used to prove views diametrically opposed. We certainly get into "topsy-turvy land" when we try to follow the statistics. You must remember the old rhyme—

Down here below two and two make four;
Perhaps up in heaven they make six or seven.

The statement was made on this floor that the dividends paid on the stocks of the great corporations were the proof of the wealth of the country and meant prosperity. There might properly be query made as to whether dividends represent the fruit of production or extortion, whether they were produced by the use of plow and ax or spindle and loom, or whether they were "produced" at the point of a revolver or searched for in the pockets of victims rendered unconscious by sandbag or lead pipe.

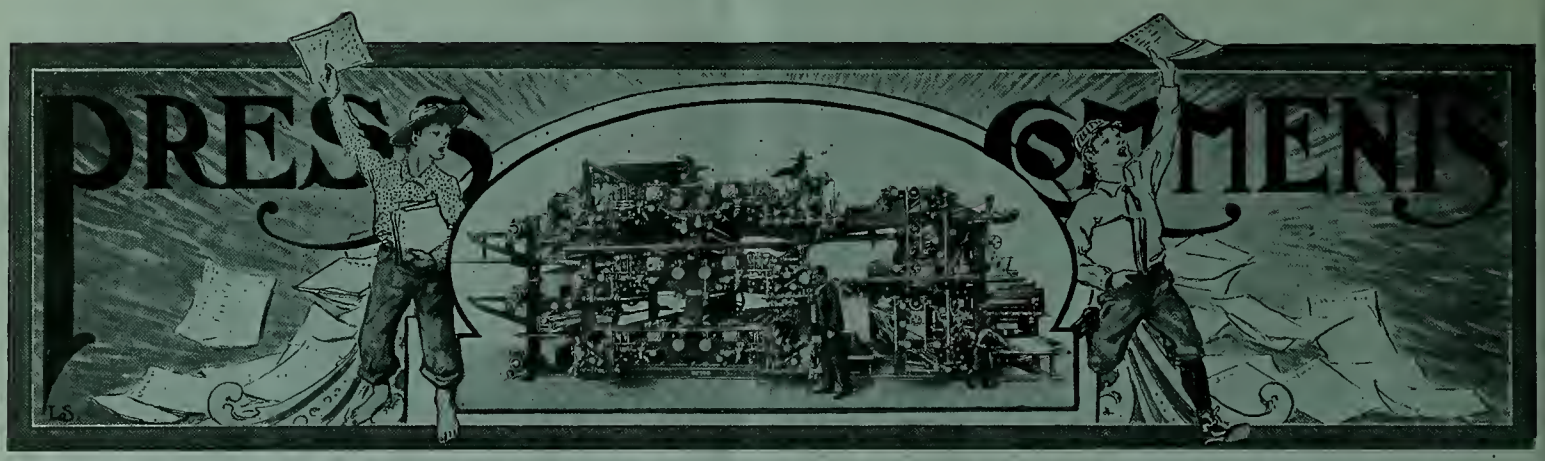
As a freshman in this course of education, I can not understand how a country can get rich by sharing its natural resources with all who choose to come, dividing our patrimony, as it were, and at the same time keeping out all possible things that can be excluded that would go to increase the size of our hoard. Privilege clamors for cheap labor and immediate development of everything. Statesmanship calls for readjustment of opportunity for ourselves and our children.



The balance of trade argument is not entirely convincing to some of us. Whenever China or Russia improve their balance of trade by exporting foodstuffs in time of famine, there seems to be something the matter with the mathematical self-sufficiency of this theory. If a freezing tramp should sell his clothes, he certainly would improve his balance of trade, although not his condition. (Laughter and applause.)

Anyone who has lived on the Pacific coast can not fail to entertain profound respect for the self-helping ability of the Japanese. They are the most remarkable self-helpers in all the world, and no one need ever again invite them to help themselves. Some two years ago, in the islands of Hawaii, just at a time when the cane-grinding season was at hand, the Japanese engaged in that industry unanimously struck. They did not appear to be satisfied with their wages nor disposed to recognize the contract they had made with the planters, which procedure was not entirely original on their part. In the course of the dispute they wrote a series of resolutions to the planters to the effect "that it was the duty of the planters, in accordance with the true American principle of protection, to get an increase in the sugar duty and thereby raise the value of sugar, and then out of the added profit they they should divide with the laborers." Strange that this simple and excellent and wholly American plan was not at once adopted. (Laughter.)

I can not agree with those gentlemen on the majority side who believe in a tariff for revenue. There is doubtless justification for a high tariff on certain luxuries, but there is no fairness in a revenue tariff laid upon necessities. The burden is not upon the proper shoulders. Mr. Rockefeller probably pays less Government revenue on the food he consumes than does the average hod carrier. He would doubtless like to pay as much, but he can not without eating as much. For the present we must look to the tariff for revenue. Eventually we shall provide for Government funds from income tax, from heavy taxation of community-created land values, from rentals of the public domain, all of them direct and comprehensible. We shall have internal-revenue taxation on articles not necessities.



I have discussed theory without any idea that we could afford or should make any sweeping changes at once. Too many people inhabit the rickety structure to permit of its immediate demolition. A revision downward, schedule by schedule, is the beginning of the work, and a notice to make preparations to vacate. (Applause on the Democratic side.) At some time or other these patients, the "invalid industries," must leave the hospital, whether to turn their steps to self-support or to the cemetery. (Laughter.) They cannot forever remain parasitic. The tariff has been too often revised upward by its friends. The people have commissioned its enemies to revise it downward. That we may have a more just system of distribution and a more equitable system of taxation, we must study the sources of our wealth and the means whereby this wealth may be saved and increased for the benefit of the many.

There is great hope in the growing ideals and the clearing outlines of the great policies of State and National conservation. By saving the common wealth for all our people and by wiping out the great special privileges in land and other natural resources, by breaking down the extortions of monopoly and by regulation of our public utilities, we shall make this country better for the average man, and no worse for any man. (Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.)

Pertinent Editorial Extracts From Our State Exchanges

Double-Session Amendment Merits Popular Endorsement

Several times in the days when the machine was in control of affairs at the State Capitol attempts were made to put through a constitutional amendment providing for a double session of the Legislature. The object was to give the people an opportunity to become familiar with all important measures before the final vote was taken, but as such a plan would have worked to the disadvantage of the machine extreme care was always taken to program both houses against it. Now the machine is out of power and a progressive Legislature has decided to submit a double session constitutional amendment to the people.

The proposed amendment provides for two thirty-day sessions of the Legislature. After the first session, which would be devoted to the introduction of bills, there would be a recess of thirty days. Then the legislators would meet again and take up the work of separating the wheat from the chaff. Introduction of bills at the second session would not be forbidden, but no member could offer more than two new measures.

Such a plan would be a big improvement over what we now have. The work of the Legislature would be systematized, the people would know more about pending bills, and with public opinion keeping close tab on the second session even the keenest survivors of the deluge that swept over the ancient regime would have little chance of "putting something over." Divided legislative sessions are a step in the right direction, and when the plan comes before the people at the special election next October it should be given the endorsement of all progressive voters.—San Francisco Bulletin.

A Momentous Railroad-Rate Decision

The Interstate Commerce Commission has rendered a big decision in the case of a little railroad—a decision which, applied to the big railroads, as it will be, means great reduction in railroad rates.

The case decided was that of the electric road running from Washington to Mount Vernon, which was ordered to reduce certain rates from fifteen cents to ten cents.

The momentousness of this decision arises from the fact that the Commission ordered the reduction in rates on the sole ground that, while the real value of the nineteen miles of road is only $988,000, or $52,000 per mile, it is capitalized at $3,933,000, or $207,000 per mile, and the public has been compelled to pay returns on the latter sum.

The Interstate Commerce Commission's decision means that value, not paper capitalization, shall determine railroad rates.

The decision also means that "value" shall not be defined as "earning power capitalized," but as actual investment.

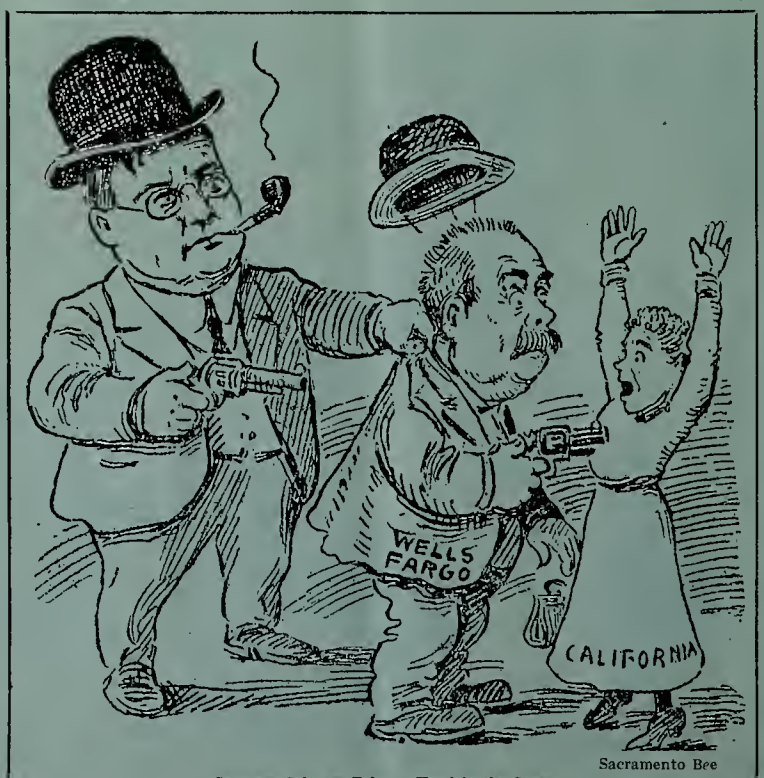
The decision applied to all the railroads and other public service corporations of the country, as it soon will be, will greatly lessen the burdens the public is now compelled to bear in order that the vastly overcapitalized public service corporations may pay dividends and bond interest on oceans of capitalized "water."—Oakland Enquirer.

Postal Banks a Success

The government postal savings banks recently opened appear to be attracting the people who want to save, and are succeeding beyond the fondest hopes of the advocates of the proposition. The small depositor who really wants to save is impressed by the absolute safety of the postal banks and is willing to accept the low rate of interest offered provided he can feel that his money is where it cannot be gotten away with. People who desire a larger rate of interest will continue to patronize the private concerns or to invest their money in what is termed gilt edge securities.—Ukiah Republican Press.

Kent Rings True

When we read the first announcement of William Kent last spring it rang true. It was as straightforward, honest and clear a bit of political literature as we had had the pleasure of seeing and this paper a short time after entered heartily into his support for congress.



Kent's subsequent course would seem to indicate that our faith was justified, for he is proving himself a statesman rather than a politician.—Colusa Herald.

The Improvement of Streets

A bill amending the Vrooman act, and giving to municipal governments added powers in the matter of street improvements, signed by Governor Johnson, will have important bearing on future movements for the betterment of highways and the building of permanent roads in California cities.

By the provisions of the amended act it is now within the powers of the city council to override the protest of property owners by a four-fifths vote of the members of the council. This puts final action on all street improvements in the hands of the council, and it is now impossible for the property owners to block paving or grading projects, if in the opinion of the city fathers, the work is of sufficient importance to justify them in disregarding the wishes of the protesting owners.

It is generally conceded that the new act increases the responsibilities as well as the powers of the city council, hut that with progressive men at the head of city affairs it will be possible to make great strides toward better streets and a more up to date municipality.—Salinas Index.

Right Must Prevail

In all your meanderings among men do you find any who down deep in their hearts are not in sympathy with the revolutionists in Mexico? If you do you can just bet your bottom dollar that one has financial holdings in Mexico. The almost four score years of tyranny has become too galling and the end must come and is coming.—Norwalk Call.

Making a Good Start

Good roads is a prime factor in getting outside people to locate in a given section of a country, and a country that can boast of good roads will always have and hold all the people that locate in that given section. The subject of good roads is the most important question before the people today, and those districts that first solve this question will be the ones to reap the primary benefits to be derived from same.

The good roads agitation is bearing fruit in more ways than one. In the bonding of the state at the last election, the people of the state went on record as wishing good roads, and this one thing alone is doing more in the line of getting the various counties interested in the roads question than any one thing. Different communities of the state are awakening to the advantages that will accrue from good roads and are endeavoring to influence the expenditure of state money in getting the proposed state highway through their locality. * * * * * —Delano Record.

Chief Clerk Helps Legislative Economy

One of the men connected with the recent session of the Legislature who deserves high commendation for splendid service is Chief Clerk L. B. Mallory of the Assembly. Constantly on the alert to facilitate the vast and complicated clerical business of the lower house, his genius for systematic handling of details no doubt saved the State many hundreds of dollars in time economy alone.

Contrary to the usual practice, legislative employes were this year required to perform their duties. Chief Clerk Mallory also practiced other economies. The stationery issued to committees at the session of 1909 cost $615.50, this year $199.96, a saving of $415.60. The postage bill of 1909 was $950, this year $750, notwithstanding the fact that 115 libraries, chambers of commerce, etc., were supplied with all of the bills introduced and the printed matter issued this year. The codes for the members were secured at a reduction of about $200 from the cost in 1909. The present session was the longest in the history of the State (eighty-five days), yet its cost was nearly ten thousand dollars less than that of two years ago.

What To Do With Our Governors "What shall we do with our former presidents?" has long been a question in the public mind, still unsettled. The same query, applied to our governors, here in California, has proven less difficult for the reason that, with the exception of Perkins and Pardee, they have emerged from office so politically dead that it mattered little what became of them. Not one man in forty knows, today, whether former Governor Markham is dead or living. Henry T. Gage emerged from obscurity long enough to be seen tucking his trousers into his boots preparatory to embarking for Portugal, but he was never heard of after. Former Governor Gillett is as out of mind as though he were forty fathoms under the sea. Our governors not only drop the office but the title that goes with the office, whereas a judge or colonel is judge or colonel to the end of his days. Perkins declined to be a political cadavar when his gubernatorial term was out and, as for Pardee, well, he merely rested up a bit and then went at it hammer and tongs just as though he expected to live right on to his three score and-ten. To be sure he did not go office seeking, but he went forth seeking that which was better, a place to serve his State, in the ranks or anywhere where a boost was needed. He helped to organize the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League and aided that cause all that he could, but his heart went out toward the conservation of the resources of his State and country and into that he has thrown a fine enthusiasm. He has attended all the conservation and irrigation congresses and was a wall flower at none of them. Now, as president of the California Conservation Commission, he will render a service only less valuable than he rendered as Governor of his native State. It will prove no insuperable obstacle to honorable mention, if not to fame, to such a man to have been Governor of California. Indeed, in the light of subsequent, unselfish and ungrudging services to his State, it will become increasingly evident to his fellow citizens that, notwithstanding his being "sot down on" by the Santa Cruz convention, George C. Pardee made a mighty good Governor, and what his fellow citizens hold in their maturer judgment to be true, is extremely unlikely to be questioned by posterity. Pardee cherished no grouch, he refused to be mummified and laid on the shelf, but went to work.

The Political Odd Jobs Man Report has it that the San Francisco Harbor Board is having a sorry time of it trying to place all the political odd jobs men who are seeking berths along the water front. There is said to have been over 700 applications filed, by representatives from every county in California except one, for places under that board. What can such men be thinking of? Are they pot-bellied ripe cucumbers thrown up on the woodpile to go to seed that they covet places, just anywhere, doing just anything, so that they can be relieved, for a few years, of the task of taking care of themselves? It were well for the State if it were rid of that whole shooting-match of political troubles, for San Francisco's water front has been chiefly a barracks for small politicians to do politics in the interests of some boss ambitious to be a factor in metropolitan, rather than state, politics. It might not be a bad idea to turn out every mother's son of the 291 San Franciscans now employed in that service and put in their places men from Del Norte and Modoc, men from the mountains of Madera and oil wastes of Kern, but this does not excuse wholesale volunteering to enter the State's service in the bilgewater district. In such cases the volunteer is to be looked upon with suspicion. The draft would be likely to yield better men for the places.

A Public Refutation Mr. A. J. Pillsbury, Piedmont, Cal. Dear Sir and Friend: I am surprised and grieved that you should allow your paper to so grievously misrepresent and give Berkeley such a black eye.

Through your undisputed correspondent, you annonnee to all your good subscribers all over the country that Berkeley of which we are so proud, and of which the entire state is proud, has become most vile and is dominated by the worst element of society. Speaking of the late election your correspondent says:

"It was a triumph of the grafter, the criminal, the sorehead, the crank and the push." What a charge to go out against Berkeley, a criminal libel. It represents that the voting majority of Berkeley's citizens uphold crime and graft. You are so well acquainted with the people and spirit of Berkeley I see no excuse for you. You devote nearly a page to the correspondence but not a word to deny the foul slander. I know you are no friend to the socialist but I did not suppose you would be instrumental in blackening the reputation of a fair city to hit their party. I shall expect a public refutation of the article. Yours truly,

E. A. May.

Where Arguments Fail

N. J. Bachelder, master of the National Grange, P. of H., has written a letter to President Taft, protesting against Canadian reciprocity. Some of the arguments advanced by Mr. Bachelder would lead one to believe that our natural resources and fertility of soil are inferior to those of Canada. He says the American Farmer expends millions for fertilizers which are not required by the Canadian farmer. He says the cost of living is much cheaper in Canada than here owing to that country's lower tariff. If that is true it is an argument against high tariff here. If living can be cheaper in the Canadian northwest where the bulk of Canada's export crops are raised and where the cost of transportation is high, it is high time that Americans were bestirring themselves to remedy conditions here. His statement, however, that labor is cheaper in Canada than here is not borne out by the facts. If labor were cheaper the exodus of laborers would be from Canada to the United States instead of from this country to Canada as at present.—Fowler Ensign.

Real Estate Mortgages

THE safest form of investment is a real estate mortgage on improved business or residence property in cities, provided it be selected with care and judgment. Such loans pay interest at the rate of six, seven or eight per cent, varying somewhat according to the amount loaned.

I make a specialty of securing such loans for my clients. My experience in building and knowledge of real estate values assure reliable appraisements and safe investments. I attend to drawing all papers, securing certificates of title, insurnce policies and the collection of interest without expense to the investor, the borrower paying all charges.

I will accept the care of large or small amounts and promptly invest the same in safe mortgages, forwarding to you the papers as soon as they are complete. Money can be sent to me by mail with instructions as to the term of the loan, or brought to me in person at my office, in which event it would be advisable to arrange an appointment by mail or telephone.

A LEADING PROGRESSIVE

WILLIAM THUM, Recently Elected Mayor of Pasadena

Pasadena is coming to be a well united city on local questions. There is a general feeling of harmony and hope among its citizens, based in part on the success of the people's first real venture in public ownership—municipal electric light—and also founded in part on a few fundamental laws recently passed at Sacramento in the interest of all men.

This same feeling is apparent in many California cities and, if traced to its very source, is found to have originated in that new and healthy gathering of mental and moral forces which are responsible for the direct primary and other pioneer laws of the present political movement.

Pasadena is entitled to a prominent position among progressive cities of California.

Works at Work

IF THE STANDPATTERS thought they were shoving Senator Works off into a corner where he would never be heard of, when they made him chairman on the government of the District of Columbia, that is where they made a mistake. He is up and at 'em already. It has always been a desire on the part of the moral element in America to have the nation's capital city made as decent as possible, a moral model as well as an architectural. They wanted slavery abolished there first, it will be remembered. Why not the slums also? Why should not the liquor saloons be confined there into the narrowest prudent limits and why should not the street car systems give universal transfers? These are some of the questions that suggested themselves to the militant mind of Senator Works and he "went to the bat" at the first opportunity. They say back there that these reforms stand as much chance in Washington as an icicle would in Yuma, but wait a bit. Give the Judge a chance. He has seen service in Los Angeles where they do just such things and do them up brown. Washington may yet become the model license city of America.

Thirty-seven Millions to the Good

IT IS STATED that the trainmen of America have, within the last twelvemonth, won an annual advance of aggregate wages amounting to $37,000,000. Of course there are many brave fellows to divide that jackpot among, but it is no small sum however divided. And who has the hardihood to say that it was effected through the law of supply and demand? Who will venture to declare that it was not won by a wholesome respect on the part of railroad managers for the power there is in organization of a militant manhood in a common cause? It took nerve to make such a demand and so to insist upon it as to command it. Organized labor may venture too far. It may abuse its power as pitilessly as organized capital sometimes abuses its power, but the trainmen, unorganized and unmilitant, would have been as inefficacious in obtaining that advance as wishing it would rain has proven impotent to bring the deluge. The achievement of the Trainmen of America is to be gloried in. But how they must have made poor old Ripley weep!

Why the Gringo Is Hated

WE ALL KNOW that our Mexican neighbors love us not. Some say that it is because our swashbucklers go over there and tell them what we'll do to 'em when we get good and ready; others say that it is because there cannot be a Mexican senorita, with an estate, that some adventurous American Adonis does not swoop down upon her and take her, acres, cattle and all. Others say that it is because even the most polished and cultivated Americans are Boors in their eyes and do not know how to behave when they are away from home; but perhaps a more cogent reason, more recently suggested, is that our big financiers go (or send) to Mexico, get fat concessions, suck the opportunity like an orange and go back up North to spend the proceeds without leaving behind anything more important than the dried and shriveled peel. Not a school is founded, hospital built, library established or anything else done for the permanent development of Mexico or its people. In short it is the American exploiter who, in making himself detested abroad, as he is coming to be at home, taints the fair name of the whole American citizenship. There may be something in that view.

Financial Neutrality

JAMES SPEYER has hit it. It is not international arbitration treaties that we need, although they would not do harm, nor will it suffice for the spirit of fraternity to so bind together in love the men of all nations that only those who make the quarrels would be the ones to fight. The thing to do is to convert the financial powers-that-be to the gospel of peace when, presto! the swords may be beaten into plowshares, the spears into pruning hooks and the dynamite and lydite may be used to split granite boulders into convenient dimensions for erecting monuments to our financiers of peace and pecuniary apostles of good will. War cannot be made without money. Easier said than done! What financier, himself secure from the draft, could refuse to underwrite a war loan with a possible margin of three or five per cent. for the service rendered? It is not in the nature of The Beast.

Another Term for Alexander

THE QUESTION of who is to be Mayor of Los Angeles for the years 1912 and 1913 was neatly and effectively settled a few days since by the response given by George Alexander to an inquiry from the Good Government Organization. The inquiry was to this effect: "Will you?" And the answer was substantially as follows: "Yes." After that nothing remained more serious than handshaking and smiles.

There will be some opposition to Mayor Alexander, of course, but it will probably not get beyond the primary, for under the new charter provision, if a candidate gets a net majority at the primary, he is elected thereby, and is not voted on again at the final. It is known that a former city auditor who failed to get by the primary two years ago is anxious to try it again. The Socialists and union labor people seem likely to combine on one nomination, and this one, as being the most promising center of opposition, will probably receive the support of the saloons, the wreck of the old S. P. machine and the Los Angeles Times. Much as that paper hates socialism, and much as it despises the laboring element, it hates and fears decent government a good deal more.

It was about two years ago that George Alexander was first elected mayor of Los Angeles. The fight was close, and his majority was small, for the recall of Harper had stirred up a great amount of feeling. But from the moment he took office, and announced the names of his commissioners, Mayor Alexander's stock began to rise. The people knew their friend, and they were with him. The citizens that desired good government recognized his sincerity and efficiency, and were ready to back him in all that he undertook to do. True he has had an advantage over all his predecessors in this office in an aroused and cooperative public sentiment and a general city administration made up of efficient earnest people, who stand on the good government platform with him. But this sentiment, we must remember, has been greatly strengthened by the good work of his administration, and although it is helpful, it is at the same time more exacting than ever before, and demands a higher standard in its public servants.

The California Outlook and the progressive element in both parties all over the State offer congratulations to Los Angeles on its prospect for two years more of sterling good government under Mayor Alexander.

Wilson and the Recall

GOVERNOR WOODROW WILSON, it appears, is against the recall of the judiciary. At first he was quoted as not having come to any conclusion, but later he corrected that statement, saying that the function of the judge is essentially different from that of other elected officers, and that there are valid reasons why he should not be subject to the intimidating influence of the recall. Governor Wilson adds, however, that he would rather be excused from talking on this particular matter, as it is a live, local issue, and he does not think it seemly that he should take sides in the middle of the discussion.

To consider the last point first, we can see no reason why Governor Wilson should hestitate to discuss a local issue with us when that issue is of a general character. If the matter at stake were an appropriation of money by the people of the whole State for the benefit of an exposition at San Francisco, for example, he might very properly look upon that as strictly a family affair. But the recall matter, including the recall of judges, is a general question that sooner or later is likely to come up in every State in the Union. Roosevelt also treated it as a local issue, but after a different fashion. He held that conditions had been so bad in California, that we were justified in adopting a plan of correction that in any other State would be extreme and perhaps dangerous. Here again we find a point of view that we cannot accept. Conditions may have been a little worse in California than in other States, but if that were true, it was a difference in degree not in kind. The recall does not present itself to the mind of the average Californian, who has been able to look at it with unblinking eyes for nearly a decade, as a matter of expediency here or there, but as a foundation principle of government.

Dr. Wilson's attitude with respect to the recall of the judiciary does not in the least surprise us; in fact the surprise lies the other way about—in the extent to which he, a man of scholastic temperament, with conservative surroundings and in the difficult position of a prospective candidate for President, has been willing to go on the road toward absolute democracy. Many stout hearts that pass through direct nominations and direct election of Senators without a quiver hesitate at the referendum. Others go on until they come to the initiative, at which they balk. When we get to the recall, there is panic all along the line, and it is only the seasoned veterans or the reckless young enthusiasts that walk up without flinching. Yet these three principles are the very essence of real democracy. Without them there can be no rule of the people.

How rapidly we move in these days! Only three years ago when Mr. Bryan got back from Europe, in the speeches preliminary to the campaign he made for the Democratic nomination, he played up the initiative and referendum. He did not venture the recall. Straightway "Harper's Weekly" pictured him holding up two weird rag babies, and beneath, the legend: "The Sawdust Twins." This same paper is now ardently supporting Dr. Wilson, who goes about the country doing just what Bryan did and doing it better. Bryan, by the way, apparently made up his mind there was nothing much in direct legislation as a popular issue, dropped it and took up the guarantee of bank deposits by the government. All of Mr. Bryan's campaign issues have had the same congenital failing. They are real nice while they are fresh, but they will not keep over night. Free silver, anti-imperialism and guaranteeing deposits—all gone to join green-backery, anti-masonry and knownothingism in the limbo of the forgotten.

To the clear and open mind that is accustomed to regard these questions in their relation to the fundamental principles of government—and we use the word "accustomed" so as to omit the new convert Woodrow Wilson—the recall of judges is the inevitable supplement of the election of judges. If the judge is to be regarded as an officer who deals with technical issues outside of and beyond average human understanding—like an engineer, for example—he should not be elected and hence not subject to the recall. Democracy does not undertake to exercise its fundamental right to choose any and all of those who serve it. It elects only a limited number, and they such as carry on the original functions of government. For the rest it will accept appointments, on the principle that what one does through another he does through himself. Now is the judge one who exercises these original functions? We hold that, under our system, he is and therefore should be elected, and if elected, recalled. It is not a question of how it may work out—that is only guesswork in all governmental changes. It is a question of what is right—what constitutes a genuine rule of the people.

Dr. Wilson has gone too far on the road toward pure democracy to balk finally at the last way-station. If he wishes to contend that judges should be appointed, he has good holding-ground for an argument. But if he believes in the recall principle as essential to democracy, and if he accepts the election of judges by the people, his keen sense of logic and of justice must ultimately bring him to accept the reform that he now condemns.

And in the meantime the people of California will vote for it by at least three to one majority. C. D. W.

Civil Enlistment

MENTION WAS MADE in these columns some time since of the likelihood that, under government or municipal ownership, employes will be required to enlist for stated periods rather than merely to hire out, as in the service of individuals or private corporations, whereat the Coast Seaman's Journal retorted that, if men may not serve under government or municipality and still be free men, it were better not to have such forms of ownership. That issue is debatable, but that there is such an issue cannot longer be denied. The President, at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, on Sunday of this week, distinctly raised the issue.

The strike and the boycott are war measures and any union of employes that should undertake to strike against, or boycott, the utilities of government or municipality, would be in insurrection. Doubtless insurrection and revolution are, upon some occasions, justifiable. There seems not to have been any other alternative left our Mexican neighbors unless they were content to suffer a group of home and foreign plutocrats to exploit the nation for private advantage, but resort to these instrumentalities involved war and the shedding of blood and the risk of being adored as patriots or shot as traitors. These are possibilities to be well considered before embarking upon government and municipal ownership.

For, whatever else a government may or may not undertake to do, it must go on with its activities. It cannot suspend them and be a government. If it undertake the postal system it must carry the mails; if it extend that system to the parcels post it must receive and deliver express packages; if it undertake the operation of the railroads it must operate them or cease to be a government, and whoever enters government employ will be required to enlist in the civil service as surely as in the military, for stated periods and under stipulated terms which will insure the prompt and orderly discharge of assigned duties without hesitation, questioning, parleying and on pain of being summarily dealt with in the event of failure to obey orders.

This does not involve the sacrifice of freedom on the part of one who enters the civil service, any more than going into the military or naval service involves such sacrifice, but it does involve the suspension of certain civil rights during the term of enlistment and the surrender of industrial implements of warfare, such as the strike and the boycott, which would be mutiny and treated as such.

Postal employes desire to form unions, to have those unions assemble behind barred doors, to use passwords, to exclude their superiors in office, there to consult and plan, perhaps to plot, for their own advantage. The whole concept of unionism, as applied to the government service, is untenable. Associations, yes, but unions, no—associations meeting with doors open to their superiors, for mutual benefit and mutual conference, but to permit the federation of such associations with a militant power like that of the Federation of Labor, the Western Federation of Miners, the I. W. W.—the very idea is preposterous and no government can entertain it.

The President spoke at Harrisburg, in regard to the proposal to unionize the postal employes, with great moderation, but the shock lately sustained by France, relative to strikes against government authority, is not to be lost upon any thinking mind. Strikes against government are not to be tolerated nor is the machinery of government to be thrown out of order by obstructive demonstrations. Civil service enlistment will develop pari passu with the development of municipal and government ownership. Collective bargaining by nation, state or city, as party of the first part, and organized, embattled labor as party of the second part, or as a foreign power, is incompatible with the concept of sovereignty and cannot be endured.

The right of petition and the right to refuse to re-enlist for service under unsatisfactory conditions are the only rights that a sovereign government can recognize in a servant, whether military or civil, a self-evident truth that persons eager for governmental entrance into industrial activities need to ponder over. It does not follow that such entrance may not prove a good thing, the best possible safeguard against that long line of abuses that have grown out of the performance of public services by corporations, but an inevitable civil enlistment is not to be ignored as not being an important factor in municipal and government ownership. It is an inevitable concommitant of it.

Inside the Unions

BECAUSE THE LABOR UNIONS present a homogeneous and united front to the public, we naturally think that the members of those organizations all hold the same view with respect to their essential policies. But on a moment's reflection we know that this is not the case, for the members are sane reasoning beings, like the rest of us; and while they all favor the union principle and all loyally submit to the will of the majority there are many of them that do not approve the entire course of action.

It is evident that all unions do not think alike, for some of them pursue entirely different policies from others. Take the issue of the open or closed shop, for example. There seems to be a determined effort on the part of the union people of San Francisco to make everybody there and in other coast cities believe that the closed shop is a positive essential of unionism, whereas there are any number of unions, in excellent standing as such, who do not maintain this doctrine at all, but on the contrary hold that it is a foolish scheme that does nobody any good and the cause of unionism a great deal of harm. Take the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, for example, with its membership of 65,000. No one will question its standing as a union of the highest and most valuable type. Its men as a whole get more pay than those of any other union in existence. Although 90 per cent. of all available places are held by members of the order, so they are probably in a position to enforce the closed shop idea if they should wish to do so, the sentiment is almost unanimous among them that they are better off under the open shop system. Any man who would propose that they should engage in a strike to drive out the other ten per cent. and to compel the railways to employ only union men, would be looked upon as a crank and a maker of useless trouble.

Many of the older and more substantial unions, those that have money in the treasury and a record for winning without strikes, have deliberately accepted the open shop policy, both because it is right in theory and because practically it works out to the advantage of the union. Of course we are using the phrase in its true meaning and have no reference to the fake "open shop" clamored for by enemies of the unions, who propose a shop where no union men are allowed to enter. It is best theoretically because it does not hold the employer down to a limited number of men, in a labor monopoly. The public does not think much of monopolies, and it will never get over its feeling that a man is entitled to a chance to earn a living whether he is a unionist or not. The public is entirely willing the unionist should have the best of it, and is glad to hear that he has 90 per cent. of the places, and would like to have him get them all if he can do it by fair means, but it has little sympathy with the cinch idea.

As a matter of actual practice and experience, nine times out of ten the open shop strengthens the union. When animosity between the union and non-union men ceases and the matter is talked over good-humoredly at the lunch hour and on the way home, and when the non-union man learns that there is no purpose in view of striking or raising trouble, if he is a decent fair-minded fellow he is very likely in the long run to come into the union. There are always a few who are natural out-siders, a possible ten per cent., and these serve to maintain a principle of freedom which is more a theory than a fact.

A vast number of strikes have taken place on the question of the open shop and constant friction is likely to occur where it is insisted upon. Some large unions, like that of the molders, for example, have gone completely to smash on this issue, losing all in the pursuit of a thing that was worthless. In every union, however, there is a body of men who do not believe in fighting for a closed shop, and as time passes these men will win converts until they control, and one by one the unions will abandon this error. Senate Constitutional Amendment Number 32

(This series of articles on the proposed constitutional amendments is intended mainly to open the discussion. The writer of them had not the advantage of hearing them discussed in committee and before the Legislature and the views he holds regarding them are confessedly inexpert, but these amendments demand attention and the writer will handle them as best he may according to his lights. Discussion of them is cordially invited.)

THIS PROPOSED AMENDMENT is supplementary to the Employers' Liability and Workingmen's Compensation law enacted by the late Legislature. That law leaves it optional with employers whether or not to come under its provisions, or take chances with the general law of liability as it now stands, with the fellow servant defense abrogated, the assumption of risk doctrine, which the courts were at much pains to reason into it, eliminated and the contributory negligence rule so far modified as to make it a rule of comparative negligence only, a rule for the apportioning of liability in proportion to the degrees of negligence involved on the part of employer and employe respectively.

The first sentence in the proposed amendment reads thus: "The Legislature may by appropriate legislation create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employes in the course of their employment irrespective of the fault of either party."

It cannot be foreknown whether or not the courts would interpret the term "all employers" to cover "any or all," but if not then the proposed amendment must be held to be, in that particular, defective, for the need is that certain dangerous industries, especially, should be subjected to such a liability while others, not so dangerous, might be left under the general law of liability for negligence only. However, this objection, if well grounded, does not lie against the amendment in any vital way and is not to be regarded as fatal.

Be it understood, however, that this provision will not, of itself, make the employers' liability law compulsory. Its adoption will only give the Legislature power to make it compulsory, if this may be done by a State constitution. The Court of Appeals of the State of New York lately suggested the probability that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States might interfere with such an extension of the police power of a state. But it is to be said of that decision that scarcely a public journal or publicist has commented on it except to condemn it as unsound and unwarranted and an example of that fogyism of courts that goes as far as anything else to bring them into disrepute.

The second sentence in the proposed amendment reads as follows: "The Legislature may provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under the legislation contemplated by this section, by arbitration or by an industrial accident board, by the courts or by either, any or all of these agencies, anything in this constitution to the contrary notwithstanding."

This provision is intended to avoid, if it may be avoided by a state constitution, the "due process of law" objection urged by the high court of New York to the methods sought to be employed in that state for making workingmen's compensation compulsory, again the shadow of the fourteenth amendment rising ominously to bar the way. To be sure the persons who drafted, and the millions who adopted, the fourteenth amendment never dreamed of putting it to any such use, but that cannot estop a court from legislating it into use if found convenient so to do. Courts are jealous of extra-judicial instruments for adjusting differences, but the inadequacy of the courts for meting out justice makes the people jealous of them and desirous of finding something better and, for this reason, resort to administrative boards and to arbitration is more and more being had. This amendment would constitute all these "due processes" of law.

The Legislature should be given full power to cope with all the phases of this great problem of meting out justice to those who, through no fault of their own not willful and gross, suffer harm in the performance of their industrial tasks. Roughly speaking, half the injuries inflicted through industrial accidents are without the fault of either the employer or the person injured. It has been the policy of civilization to suffer such accidents to be borne wholly by the injured and his family, whereas a sense of justice should long since have distributed as much of the consequent harm as possible to society as a whole by making it a charge upon the industry and an item in cost to the consumers of the industrial product.

European nations have gone much farther in establishing justice than has the United States or any of the states of the American Union, but the problem has not been perfectly worked out even in Europe. It is up to us. We must grapple with it. The adoption of this amendment will help. It should be adopted. A. J. P.

Investigate Him

POSTMASTER GENERAL HITCHCOCK is to be investigated. He ought to be. He has been charged with prostituting the second class postal rate law, not only to the mulcting of muck-raking magazines, but to the outlawing of publications whose political policy has not met his approbation. More heinous than this, however, he is charged with so conducting the affairs of the postoffice department as to have converted a sixteen million dollar annual deficit into even money if not actually into a surplus. That is suspicious. It savors of wildcat banking where enormous dividends are paid without visible means of support. Let him be gone at and looked into. Is he robbing the widows and orphans or only making the rich buy postage stamps. Such management was never known before. No other postmaster general was ever charged with making way with a deficit. How ever did he do it?

Noses Counted

IT IS CONFIDENTLY DECLARED in Washington that senatorial noses have been counted and there is a solid fifty-five who will stand pat and stay put for the Canadian reciprocity measure, whereat the President's smile grows so expansive that not even the embattled farmers can disturb his equanimity. By the way, it has been authoritatively figured out that we sell more agricultural products to Canada than we buy from Canada by the value of $10,000,000 and more a year right along and the business will be bigger when barriers are burned away. A few farmers along the border may be hurt a bit in their local markets by Canadian competition, but even these are more frightened than they will be hurt, whereas the agricultural interest of the nation is on the side of reciprocity, not alone with Canada, but with Mexico, Cuba and other neighbors near and far.

We Have Heard It Before

IN CERTAIN LABOR CIRCLES, where class spirit and fiery zeal have outrun discretion, it has been declared that the prosecution of the dynamite suspects in jail at Los Angeles, is not a prosecution, but a persecution. Where did we hear the likes of that before? Oh, yes, we do now remember. It was while Heney and Burns were striving to convict the rich rascals of San Francisco of high crimes and misdemeanors. The refrain of "persecution, not prosecution," was whistled and sung in every possible key and played upon every possible instrument that might torture the ear, from gutter snipe to metropolitan journal. It wasn't so then, as it isn't so now, but continual harping it made it seem so to many. Extremes meet, more frequently at the bar of justice, perhaps, than anywhere else.

Why Does Perkins Still Stand Pat? The Watchman asked this same question some weeks since, but only echo answered. Personally a most likeable man, a man self-made and not without ability, Senator Perkins has many friends who would like to see him cut himself loose from vicious political associations and square himself with the prevailing sentiment of his State. And there are at least some of his appointees who would like nothing better than to see their chief forsake the cohorts of standpatism and array himself with progressive Republican sentiment. One of these, not long since, in effect, said to The Watchman: "You folks complain of the standpat attitude of the Federal brigade in California, but how can we do otherwise as long as Perkins stands pat? I am under great political obligations to him and you folks are after his scalp. I would be an ingrate not to defend him, and yet my sympathies run your way. I see no course open to me except to get out of the place I am in, and I think that I shall do so at an early date, but until I do I cannot act as freely as I would like to. I do not want the Southern Pacific company to run this State any more than you do, and there are others in the Federal brigade who feel as we do, but what can we do as long as Perkins stands pat? We must either hold our peace or resign our offices, and we cannot all afford to do that." So not a little depends on the attitude of Perkins, and that is unfortunately standpat through and through. With a little of the Johnson pluck and resolution in the Lincoln-Roosevelt League Perkins could have been beaten for re-election two years ago last winter, and pity 'tis that he wasn't.

An Appeal He Sidestepped Anxious that Senator Perkins should put himself right with his constituents a long-time friend of his, Mr. S. M. Augustine, of San Rafael, addressed to Senator Perkins the following letter:

Hon. George C. Perkins,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:—From an extended acquaintance with the people of this county, based upon thirty-seven years' continuous residence therein, I feel competent to speak for the Republican sentiment as well as the popular feeling of the county in the matter of reopening and properly disposing of the unsavory Lorimer case.

It would be an easy matter to flood you with letters and telegrams imploring you to protect the fair name of the great State which you represent as well as the august tribunal of which you are a member, by casting your vote to unseat a man, the method of whose election, as disclosed by recent investigations, has shamed and humiliated every patriotic American before the entire civilized world.

I believe, however, that a review of the causes that led to Governor Johnson's election and other recent political events should be sufficient to convince you that the moral sense of the great West is aroused to an insistence on cleanliness and honesty in public life.

Your friends in California are sincerely solicitous that your voice and vote may be with the forces of decency and reform.

With assurances of personal esteem I am,

Yours very truly,
S. M. AUGUSTINE.

San Rafael, Marian County, Cal.

Characteristic Perkins' Reply The reply of Senator Perkins to Mr. Augustine's letter was eminently characteristic. He at once put the onus of the issue upon the State of Illinois. Note the words that The Watchman has caused to be emphasized with black type, that if it "Should be conclusively shown that Senator Lorimer used money corruptly to secure his election," then, and in that event only, the opinion is ventured, that "a second investigation will be ordered." No such requirement should be insisted upon by the Senate. That which one does by another he does by himself and Lorimer cannot, with a far-away look in his eye, be the beneficiary of a "slush fund" and still be fit to sit with reputable men. Whatever was going on, Lorimer, shrewd politician that he is, knew of it and approved of it or it would not have gone on, and Senator Perkins, an adept in politics equal to Lorimer, does not need to be told that this is true. Enough has become known to warrant a more searching investigation of the Lorimer case than was made by the Senate last year, by men more likely to search, and Senator Perkins will not strengthen his position before the people of California by passing the buck to Illinois. But here is what he, himself, says about it:

Hon. S. M. Augustine.

Dear Sir:—I am in receipt of your letter relative to reopening the Lorimer case, and am glad to have your opinion. The question of again taking up this matter is now before Congress, which must decide what action should be taken. An investigation is now under way in Illinois, and the discovery of new evidence there will undoubtedly have a controlling effect here. Should it be conclusively shown that Senator Lorimer used money corruptly to secure his election, I think there can be no doubt that a second investigation will be ordered, and if it should be proved that he holds his seat through corruption and fraud there can be no doubt as to what the action of the Senate should and would be.

In the investigation already held, such facts as were obtainable were brought before a body of able and conscientious men, many of them very able jurists, who are accustomed to weigh evidence, and the opinion of the committee was that no case against Senator Lorimer had been made out. In that opinion the majority of the Senate concurred. It is of course possible that a new investigation would bring to light many fresh and pertinent facts that would change opinion very materially. I am inclined to think that the result of the Illinois investigation will determine the course of Congress.

Yours truly,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
United States Senate.

Washington, D. C., May 4, 1911.

A Palpable Reason Why After mature deliberation The Watchman has reached the definite conclusion that the reason why Senator Perkins stands pat is that he is a standpatter and never will be anything else, that the "interests" have got him and got him to keep, else the rejoinder, quoted below, from the pen of Mr. Augustine, must cause him to take some new observations and set his course with the prevailing wind:

Hon. George C. Perkins,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:—For your information and that you may understand how a very large portion of your constituency feels in the matter of the Lorimer investigation, I will answer your letter of recent date by saying that it seems hardly in keeping with the traditions and dignity of the United States Senate that it should practically abdicate its high function of purging its own body of members that have been corruptly elected, by delegating the responsibility for action to any body whatever, other than itself.

I can understand that if the Illinois investigation finds against Lorimer, the Senate will be in a position where it must act or stultify itself; but even if the corrupt influences that elected, should succeed in whitewashing him, I do not see how the Senate can ignore the overwhelming evidence now open to the world, that should be as convincing to the eminent jurist, of large experience in applying the rules of evidence, as it is to the average lay mind, without giving substantial grounds for a growing popular conviction that it is itself dominated by the same influences that dictated Lorimer's election.

I have taken the liberty of writing this merely to acquaint you with what I believe to be a sentiment that should be reckoned with and that might not otherwise make itself felt in the atmosphere of Washington.

I thank you for your patience in reading and answering my letter; this one does not require a reply.

Yours very truly,
S. M. AUGUSTINE.

San Rafael, Cal., May 9, 1911.

House of Barnacles Just what sort of a house of barnacles is our United States Senate anyhow? Recent investigations disclose that its payroll is padded to the last extremity, there being two or three persons to do each person's work, and all drawing pay that should be drawn by only one. As each new Senator came to take his seat, and to be served with his share of patronage, his hangers-on were accommodated without removing any of the old ones, until attaches became thicker than three-in-a-bed. Nothing more clearly indicates domination by the interests than just that sort of congested condition of the senatorial payroll. It is upon patronage that the interests feed. Nor is the House of Representatives wholly free from the charge of petty fraud. A rigorous execution of the pure food law, as to stuff sent out by both houses of Congress for the intellectual deglutition of their constituents would result in most of it being condemned as spurious. Leave to print speeches that were never made, applause and all, and to circulate them free—sometimes by trainload, has become a serious abuse and tainted with fraud. Is it unreasonable to expect the American Congress to be as reputable in these relatively small concerns, at least, as the California Legislature has become? They do fall short of it.

Not A Bad Cartoon The Sacramento Bee of the 12th contained not at all a bad cartoon in which the President is represented as "Getting the dope on California." The representation of Rowell bears no suggestion of the original, but that of the President, leaning forward with mouth agape, drinking in every word, is highly suggestive. There is no question that Mr. Rowell gave the President the "straight dope" without ifs or ands to qualify it, things he seriously needed, but the forces of progressive Republicanism were not then organized and there was no one to speak with authority. All we could do was to stay at home and grumble. Among other things, it may be surmised that Mr. Rowell told the President that he could not make sure of keeping California in the Republican column by distributing political plums, share and share alike, with standpat Perkins and progressive Works, for the Republican party in California can no more endure half standpat and half progressive than the nation could have endured half slave and half free. The President must be one or 'tother with all his might, and stand or

By Franklin Hichborn

The alleged exploitation of the tenderloin has involved San Francisco in a scandal quite equal to that of the French restaurants during the Ruef-Schmitz regime.

There are several methods by which one may live off the earnings of the women of the underworld, and still hold one's place in respectable society. The most popular, and at the same time safest, method is to get "a share" through the polite medium of extortionate "rent collections." Another method, which was very popular with Ruef and Schmitz, is to get "the share" as "attorney's fees." Still another, is through political "influence" to secure a monopoly of supplying bad wines and worse whiskies to the tenderloin trade, and charge all the traffic will bear. And yet another, is by selling immunity from prosecution—which is too often persecution—to the unfortunate women.

There are methods, it will be seen, in sad plenty by which the higher-up maquereau may collect his toll and continue "respectable," in social circles where no discriminating sense is shown of the smell of the taint of the dollars.

The present scandal seems to grow out of a confusing conflict of all the degrees of partnership in vice exploitation. The scandal began, as such things often do, in the name of "reform."

Segregation houses were to be established, the evil was to be restricted and placed under police and medical supervision. A committee of clergymen was even appointed to assist in the good work—as "a kind of advisory committee"—as the good souls put it over their own signatures.

Another assistant in the reformation of the t nderloin was Jerome Bassity, as notorious a wholesale dive-keeper as ever taxed the patience of a community. Mr. Bassity could not very well take on any worse notoriety than he possesses, but his assistants in the "reform," the committee of clergymen, could. In lieu of additional notoriety, Bassity seems to have been content with profits.

Incidentally, the committee of clergymen is no longer identified with the "reform." According to the printed account of a statement by Dr. George Lee Eaton, President of the San Francisco Board of Health, made before the Presbyterian ministers, the clergymen fled because they lacked back-bone. There is, however, a strong suspicion that they fled because they possessed noses.

The scandal came to a head with the publication of the letter of withdrawal of the committee of clergymen. After setting forth the good motives which got them into their astonishing predicament, the clergymen state:

"To our utter astonishment, we discovered that there was a crib-house, operated by and under the supervision of the Board of Health, for the purpose of housing the unfortunate women. We were informed that they were paying the sum of $5 per day, or $30 per week, for the use of this crib, and that about 100 women were housed there. As we knew nothing whatsoever of these plans, a letter was written by Rabbi Nieto, on the part of the committee, and directed to Doctor Eaton of the Board of Health, asking in the plainest terms whether the crib was thus run, and whether the sum of $5 per day, or $30 per week, was exacted. There was no answer by letter to this communication, but Doctor Eaton's answer to Rabbi Nieto only convinced us of the correctness of our attitude in this matter."

On the same day on which the letter was issued, Carroll Cook, formerly on the Superior bench of tbis county, made even more sensational charges in a local police court. In speaking in behalf of a woman charged with vagrancy, Cook said:

"This woman who has just been before your honor and who has been released on her own recognizance pending an investigation into the case, must either submit to the orders of these doctors, go to jail or leave the city. She refused to pay the fee of 25 or 50 cents twice a week and she was brought into court as a vagrant. There are 5,000 women in the half world of this city. and a fee is required from each of them either once or twice a week. If your honor will take the trouble to figure this out, you can easily arrive at the total amount derived each week from this business."

And there you have the scandal that has San Francisco by the ears.

Since these charges were published, a woman of the half world, Thelma Le Roy, has been before the Grand Jury and told an extraordinary story of graft and attempted extortion. By curious coincidence, this woman was within a few hours after she had testified under arrest as a vagrant. She has, however, been released. But no other woman has been so venturesome as to tell her troubles to the Grand Jury.

In her statement to the Grand Jury, the Le Roy woman has brought in the names of men prominently connected with the McCarthy administration, including that of "Pete" Fanning, a detective connected directly with the Mayor's office as messenger; E. C. Leffingwell, private secretary to Mayor McCarthy, and Dr. Eaton, President of the Board of Healtb. The three make vigorous denial of the woman's assertions. The Grand Jury is, at present writing, probing the scandal, and before this article reaches the reader, will probably have taken definite action one way or the other.

The affair has been given a side interest by a passage of arms between Mayor McCarthy and Carroll Cook—or perhaps it should be, passage of letters.

The two gentlemen have resorted to printer's ink, and are having much to say about each other, which is instructive to the onlooking citizen, if not edifying.

Simmered down to cold facts, McCarthy holds that the tenderloin flare-up is for the purpose of discrediting organized labor, and Cook claims that it isn't.

"The animus," says McCarthy in one of his "statements," "is not directed to individuals such as myself, the President of the Board of Health, my secretary, messenger, etc., but rather is Carroll Cook but one spoke in the wheel which has been built to crush organized labor, the small tradesman and merchant. . . . And I again, here and now, challenge Cook and all of his associates to carry out their threat, and I do so with a full realization of the fact that in the end the community will find Carroll Cook is, as usual, in the wrong."

This last statement. coming from McCarthy, is somewhat confusing. The popular understanding has been that Mr. McCarthy has assisted Judge Cook in his political ambitions and aspirations, and vice versa. But that is another story.

The McCarthy "statements" have brought forth warm replies from Cook, who is even more handy with his pen than is Mr. Leffingwell, the Mayor's private secretary.

"I do not remember," observes Mr. Cook in one of his "replies," "when McCarthy became the sole and perpetual representative of organized labor. I do remember that for twelve years I served on the Superior Bench of this State, and at each election, when I was a candidate, I had not only the nomination of my own party, but also the labor nomination."

After going into discussion to show how, as a judge, he was fair to organized labor always, Cook takes this parting fling at McCarthy:

"Further, by referring to scrap books in my office, I can produce statements made by McCarthy himself wherein he asserts that before me as a judge labor always had a square deal."

But to leave the interesting question whether Judge Cook has always given labor a square deal, or whether Mr. McCarthy is "sole and perpetual representative of organized labor," there is not a good citizen in San Francisco who does not hope that the tenderloin scandal will be probed to the bottom, and the beneficiaries of the graft of the tenderloin, be they plain dive keepers, or millionaire backers or public-official backers of graft-collecting dive keepers, brought to full publicity and punishment.

This sentiment is well expressed by the San Francisco Star, which supported McCarthy at the last municipal election, and has backed his administration at all times:

"As the charge is heard," says the Star, "the municipal clinic has been bartering with fallen women. It is a charge that must be sifted to the very bottom. If there is truth in it, those who are guilty of so foul a deed should be punished most rigorously as they deserve. There should be no half way measures in a matter that involves the honor of all the people of the city.

"Another thing, The Star is friendly to Mayor McCarthy. It believes in him, and is convinced, as it has been from the beginning, that he means to give San Francisco a good, clean, helpful administration. But his administration must be, like Caesar's wife, above suspicion. We believe in him wholly, but while such charges are afloat no other man can owe so high an obligation to him as he owes to himself and the city he serves.

"That obligation consists in giving the full force of his administration to ascertaining the truth concerning these shameful charges, and this should be done without fear, favor, or prejudice. If these men are guilty, the fact cannot be known, and punishment meted to them, one moment too soon; if they are not guilty, it is equally essential that the fact be known."

The Star then calls upon McCarthy to suspend from office the men against whom the charges are shouted until the truth or falsity of the charges is known.

Unfortunately there is some reason to believe that, sifted to the bottom. some of our reputable financiers whose names have not yet been mentioned in the scandal, would be found to be large sharers in the various tenderloin collections.

This was so in the days of the Schmitz-Ruef regime, and has probably continued so during the several administrations, "reform" and otherwise, which we have had since.

The official report of the commission, known, from the name of its chairman, as the Denman Commission, appointed by Mayor Taylor, to report on the causes of municipal corruption in San Francisco, sets forth that one of the largest assignation places in the city was on land "owned in trust by one of the largest, if not the largest, trust companies in the West," and the building constructed by the trust company according to plans satisfactory to the notorious character who kept the place. Commenting upon this astonishing fact, the Denman report says:

"The significant thing about such a transaction is, not that there are people who are willing to accept money from such a source, or financiers willing to put trust moneys to such uses, but that the facts, though well known, did not seem to detract in the slightest from the social recognition accorded to the persons so taking a share of the profits, while the officer of the trust company which made the lease of that particular house situated in the shopping district, was appointed a regent of the State University."

An even more striking example of higher-up participation in tenderloin gains is cited in the Denman report.

During a raid made by the Andrews Grand Jury, during the Schmitz administration, upon one of these places, which, because of its immunity from police interference had earned the name of the "Municipal Cub," 160 women were arrested. To get them out of jail, bond money exceeding $16,000 was required. Continuing, the Denman report sets forth:

"It was subsequently published—and never denied—that the money was furnished by a prominent liquor man who was, at the time of the publication, the president of one of the oldest, the most powerful, .and the richest of the associations of merchants in the city. That their president, a wholesale liquor man, might be also a wholesale backer of prostitution, did not arouse the merchants to the extent of even making an investigation, and he served out his term, which, at the time of the exposure had less than one-half expired. The fact that his company was, at the time of the raid, selling liquors to a large number of resorts whose licenses were dependent upon the Schmitz Board of Police Commissioners, was accepted by many as a sufficient excuse for his supplying the bail."

It would be a great thing for San Francisco, if these skulking capitalists could be dragged out into the light of full publicity. But whether anything would come of it is after all a question. The discouraging fact remains that although nearly two years have passed since the Denman report was published, the members of the Board of Regents of the State University, as far as known, have taken no steps to ascertain whether one of their number is an official of the Trust Company that had part in wholesale prostitution. Certainly his retirement from the board has not yet been accomplished.

And while the attitude of the public is such that a person of this description can hold place on the Board of Regents of the highest institution of learning in the State, what hope is there that the cruel graft of the tenderloin will be stopped? A few of the smaller beneficiaries, the sub-agents and collectors, may be "exposed," and even jailed; but the big beneficiaries escape, and the graft, with new sub-agents to collect, goes on as before.

The present scandal will be dubbed, no doubt, "The Shame of San Francisco."

But it is larger than "The Shame of San Francisco." Since the publication of the Denman report, now nearly two years old, it has been "The Shame of California."

Restoring Popular Government

By WOODROW WILSON

From a Speech Delivered in Los Angeles, May 13

Governor Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey delivered the principal speech of his Los Angeles visit in Temple Auditorium, last Saturday, under the auspices of the City Club.

Princeton's Ex-President was introduced by General E. C. Bellows, Vice-President of the Club, who, in his introductory speech, briefly sketched the trend of modern politics and recited the causes which have led up to the wave of insurgency that is sweeping the country. General Bellows gave Woodrow Wilson a place among the possible candidates for the Presidential nomination in 1912, describing him as "that peerless statesman, that profound scholar, that champion of equal rights to all and special privilege to none, the Honorable Governor of the State of New Jersey."

Governor Wilson spoke, in part, as follows:

I thought, before I came to California, that I had certain political lines clearly marked in my mind. I knew that there were progressives everywhere, and I thought that I knew how to classify progressives everywhere. But I must admit that I find political lines so utterly obscure and gone to pieces in California that I don't know where I am.

I can't, for the life of me, in this place, be certain that I can tell a Democrat from a Republican.

I will assume that what we are discussing is a problem which it is impossible to state in party terms. And I will say to you very candidly that it is a very welcome circumstance to me that this should be the case.

I am not fond of debating party issues. And I cannot be mistaken in observing that audiences who meet upon occasions like this all over the United States are now very much less interested in the annals and the precepts of political organizations than they are in the discussion of the fundamental political questions of our life.

You do not rouse enthusiasm by referring to what are supposed to be the traditions of either of the existing parties, because those traditions, follow them but a little way, carry you back into a time that you now can scarcely recognize.

What is it in our day to be progressive? What do we mean when we separate ourselves from our fellows by saying that they are conservatives, they are stand-patters, and we are progressives?

The first thing that strikes me in thinking about the matter is, that the word "progressive" does not represent a mere state of mind. We are not speaking of an impulse. We are not speaking of a different temperament. We are not speaking of a vague aspiration. By progressive we mean a man who soberly is addressing his thought to the actual problems of the time and trying to find solutions of those problems.

What Distinguishes a Progressive

Now, there are all sorts of progressives. There are progressives who want to go very fast and there are progressives who don't want to go quite so fast. There are progressives who let the lines of their thought run into a far distant, future, ultimate solution; and other progressives who confine themselves modestly to the problems of the moment. But there is one thing that must distinguish all progressives. They must have an insatiable appetite for the facts of the case. They all of them must be men who are tired of being deceived by platform promises and insist upon having specifications, both in the matter of what is to be done and in the matter of what is done.

It is just as important to understand what the facts are as to devise remedies for the things which we think to be wrong, for you can't devise remedies until you know what is the matter.

I believe that Americans are less squeamish than they were a few years ago about the facts in the case. We used to be very punctilious and polite about not mentioning names. We would a great deal rather, in a great audience, have said, "the railroads," than specifically to have said, "The Southern Pacific."

We would have discriminated carefully in our thought between the street railways and the great trunk lines of steam railway, and would not have mentioned the circumstances that a great many of the street railways have been bought by the trunk lines and constitute one and the same interest and power; constitute a single net-work which has been woven around, so that you can't sway in this direction or in that without running up against the same persons, the same interests, the same obstacles, the same insidious influences.

We didn't go into particulars in our thought. But now we are getting down to what are known popularly as "brass tacks." We are getting down to the actual circumstances of the case, and we are asking ourselves what is it that we are in revolt against? We are not in revolt against the circumstances of our lives. We are not desirous of turning the world upside down with a sudden revolution. But we are in revolt against playing one thing and doing another. We are in revolt against making believe that we have control of our own affairs and are now ready to take control of them in actual fact.

What are the circumstances of our political life?

In the first place, we know that hitherto, in most parts of the country until the present moment, the persons who make up our so-called representative assemblies and fill our so-called representative offices have not been selected by the persons who voted for them. We know that they have been selected by small groups of persons whom we never elected to act for us in any capacity whatever. We know, in short, that they have been selected and elected by the preference and by the power of the political machine, and we know that the political machine is shut against us in the matter of actual choice on our part. We know that in nine cases out of ten the choice for us is between voting for the nominees,—or rather I should say the appointees—of one machine or the appointees of the other machine. And we know that it is a toss of the penny to choose between the machines. We know that when the minority party is about to enter a campaign it too often makes an arrangement with the majority party, and that the minority machine generally is simply a tail to the majority kite.

These are not conjectures. These are actual facts.

The Hudson River is a noble stream, but it doesn't divide New York and New Jersey in respect to political interest; it does not divide New York and New Jersey in respect of political control; because there is a community of interests in respect of control of this sort that knows neither boundary nor sect nor kind nor color.

These are the facts that we are beginning to realize. And we are beginning to realize that, while the political machine is not accessible to us, there are certain persons to whom it is extremely accessible. In other words, we are beginning to realize that the real motive power in politics in this country has been money, nothing more nor less than money; that political interests and political principles were neither here nor there; that politics was a means of controlling legislation in the interests of great business undertakings. That is what it had come to be.

Our Indictment Must Be Specific

Now, let us be just in this indictment. Do not let us make the mistake of including great classes of persons in an indictment which ought to pick out individuals whom we know to be guilty. You know that fine remark of the great Edmund Burke. "I do not know," he said, "how to draw up an indictment against a whole people." And I do not know how to draw up an indictment against those men of energy and genius all over the country that have been building up the great material enterprises of America.

No indictment drawn up against all of them would be a just indictment. But there have been managing spirits amongst them, and these managing spirits have known what they were about when they were contributing to campaign funds.

A witty friend of mine used this

GOVERNOR WOODROW WILSON

This picture of California's distinguished guest is a copy of a charcoal sketch made by Fred Yates, the eminent London artist. Mr. Yates was recently sent for by Princeton College to do an official portrait in oil of Dr. Wilson. This picture is loaned to The California Outlook by Mr. J. D. Hooker of Los Angeles, to whom Mr. Yates recently paid a visit. The artist is now in San Diego where he has done a portrait for Lyman J. Gage, ex-Secretary of the Treasury, and he will presently visit San Francisco where he is to do Judge Melvin for the Bohemian Club.

illustration a good many years ago, when he was speaking of a certain campaign fund then considered very liberal, which had been collected chiefly in the cities of Philadelphia and New York. He said, "Down in Kentucky, where I live, we get most of our water from pumps, and you know that it is a peculiarity of a pump that sometimes the plunger will get dry and won't suck; so that the prudent housewife, before she goes to bed at night pumps up a bucket of water and leaves it standing until morning. Then, in the morning, if the pump won't suck, she pours the water into it to swell the plunger. Then it begins to suck, and, of course," he said, "the first water that comes out is that same water that she poured in. Now," he said, "I am not saying with regard to this campaign fund that it was intended for the grosser kinds of political corruption. What I am intimating to you is that it was water poured in to make the pump suck. And the gentlemen that poured the water in knew the law of nature by which that same water would be returned to them."

There has been an extraordinary, systematic care to see that the pump sucked; and these gentlemen always with calculation have contributed what they did contribute to these great campaign funds. Almost without exception they have made terms. They have said, "Yes, we will contribute, provided you assure us that our interests will be safeguarded." And so soon as they were assured that their interests would be safeguarded they have contributed money. And the men who accepted the money were under explicit and tacit agreement and obligation of honor that they would not permit anything to be done which was detrimental to the interests of the men who had given the money.

Do you not know that our legislatures are more numerously attended from the outside than from the inside? Do you not know that there are more persons who go to watch what is done in the interests of somebody or other than who go there to do the things? The lobbyists outnumber the members. What does it mean that the corridors of the state houses are thronged when certain measures are expected to be up for consideration?

Have you noticed any violent amount of debate in many of the American legislatures recently? Have you noticed important bills discussed upon the open floor every day? What is it that you hear about most in our legislatures? It's about the action of committees; the make-up of committees; the whole politics that lies in the hands of the speakers of our various houses of assembly in making up the committees; and the maneuvers on the floor of those houses. The measures which do not clearly and inevitably belong to a particular committee shall be referred to a committee that is friendly to the interests that are watching the matter.

I am not telling any tales out of school. Anybody who chooses to keep his eyes open at all knows these things.

"Representative" Government

Have we representative government? Yes, we have representative government. The question is. Whom does it represent? How we are going to make our government represent our communities; represent our people; instead of representing particular interests? The question of this moment is to release from our institutions the strangle-hold which particular interests have got upon it.

I don't want to cut the sinews of that hand. It may be necessary to do it. But that is violent. I want to convince the person who exercises the muscles of that hand that he had better let go; that on the whole the handsomer game is the more profitable game. For I believe that, while America suspects the great interests of the country, if they will but serve her, she will serve them.

After all, we can't depend entirely upon a moral awakening. The moral awakening is coming and it is coming by those processes so characteristic of America—the free, outspoken opinion of common men everywhere, who intend to have their own way.

Instruments of Reform

But we must have something in which opinion is to form itself. We must have instruments of reform which will constitute definite measures of rectification. What are we going to use by way of remedy? Why, we have made up our minds from one end of this country to the other that, in the first place, we are going to use the direct primary. We are going to dispense with the machine.

Remember that the direct primary is not a means of making us any better or any smarter than we are. We don't improve our wits and we don't improve our processes of choice merely by taking them into our hands.

In the little borough where I live I seldom have to vote a ticket of more than thirty-five or forty names. But think of thirty-five or forty names! I have been a busy man, and I can't find out between the time of nomination and the time of election the records of thirty-five or forty men nominated for every kind of obscure office. The best that I can do is to find out who the men are who are nominated for the principal offices that I am to vote for. And you know how the politician takes advantage of that. If the people are watching and are critical at that particular time, he puts very respectable names at the top of the ticket and depends upon those names to pull all the rest through. That is the well known process of politics. He is a little bit careful sometimes about whom he nominates for Governor. He scrutinizes the candidates for Congress. But for the rest nobody knows, generally, who the men are, and he can pad or fill in the ticket with any number of tools that he chooses to put on the ticket.

I have voted tickets as big as a newspaper. I can show you a ticket in one of the most advanced states of this Union that contains 700 names. Now, there isn't a man in this house that can intelligently vote a ticket of that kind.

Now, it takes machine politicians most of their time to work that trick on you. Are you going to take the time to make up these long tickets? If you don't know who you are voting for, after the ticket is made up, how are you going to make up the ticket?

What is your remedy, then? The direct primary? Yes, the direct primary, if you will have something else; if you will shorten your ticket.

The way the American people have been cheated in this business is by being given something to do that they can't do: that they didn't have time to do. A man can't make up a ticket of one hundred names and earn his living also; unless he earns his living by picking out the hundred names. You have got your choice, then. If you are going to govern yourselves, reduce the thing to what is practicable. Choose a few men whom you can pick out with discrimination and then hold them responsible. That, in my judgment, is the initial step in restoring self-government in the United States.

Philadelphia North American

"My! It's Nice to Have a Man Around the House!"

Fix the Responsibility

I daresay that many of you remember a famous cartoon of Thomas Nash, regarding the Tweed Ring in New York City. It represents a circle of men, each one of them has his thumb to his neighbor, and the thumbs go all around the circle, and the cartoon is labeled, "Twant me." Now, the point to that cartoon extends far beyond the history of the Tween Ring. What we have invented for the benefit of our politicians is a "twant me" system of government, and what we have got to substitute is a "tis you" system of government, so that we can elect few enough men to watch, and then watch them.

When a man wishes to run a great complicated business, he attends to the business. He doesn't attend to the appointing of all the people who are conducting the business, from the superintendent down to the office boy. If any man at the head of a great corporation were to undertake to pick out all the employees of that corporation, he couldn't run the corporation.

Very well, the analogy is perfect to your own cases. If you are going to pick out all the employees of your government, you can't run the government. You can't do anything else. You can't even earn a living.

The first prescription, then, is to do for all of your governments what we are very rapidly doing for our city governments. That's the whole moral of the extraordinarily rapid spread throughout this country of the commission form of government. We find that when we put the government of a city in the hands of a small board of responsible managers we have at last got control of the government of the city. That is the solution of which America already is convinced in respect of our city governments. Now, she presently is going to be convinced of it in respect to our state governments also.

Restoration of Self-Government Not Radical

But there are other means of restoring government into our own hands. You don't need to have me discuss before you, who have discussed them so thoroughly in this part of the country and so convinced yourselves as to adopt them, the principle of the Initiative and the Referendum and the Recall. What I want to point out to you, however, is that in using these instruments supposed to be new, you are not as radical as you supposed yourselves to be. I don't think it is radical to restore a government to its original purpose. I don't think it is radical to take a popular government into the hands of the people. And I do not, and you do not, expect that your ordinary method of legislation will be to initiate the laws and put them through without so much as consulting the legislature, or that you will insist on having the legislature refer every law that it originates for your sanction, or that you will overnight and carelessly and frequently recall officers from the offices to which you have chosen them. Nobody expects these to be the ordinary processes of government in this country. The purpose of all three of those is to keep men whom you have elected always in mind of the fact that they are your servants; that, if they do not serve you, you have means to serve yourselves, and that, if they will not carry out the laws that you make or sanction in the spirit in which you made them, you will recall them and substitute others who will.

That is the principle of the initiative and the referendum. They are means of resuming control, just as the short ballot is the means of resuming control: just as the discovery of all the deviltry that is up and the exposure of all the deviltry that is up is a means of resuming control. You are giving free course to the processes of public opinion.

But don't stop with these matters. These are local matters. You do not need to have me to tell you that the Federal Government does not determine questions of suffrage, does not determine questions of control, such as these that I have been discussing; and you do not need to be reminded that there are federal matters after which you had better look with equal keenness of scrutiny and equal determination that you are going to take things into you own hands.

What do you think of the tariff, for example? And what do you really think of the tariff, now that you are beginning to see the inside of it? How careful everybody used to be to let

Forward Movements of a Progressive City

Some Things Pasadena Expects to Accomplish

By WILLIAM THUM, Mayor of Pasadena

During the next two years we shall try to continue the forward movement of our city. There are in Pasadena many laymen and specialists who are particularly qualified in certain branches of municipal business and municipal government. As a rule, these men are public spirited and many of them are experienced. From these men I expect to choose a number to act on commissions and shall make it a point to pick out such as have acquired an understanding of human nature. This latter qualification is necessary in order that any friction between city officials and employes and the commissioners may be reduced to a minimum, or obviated altogether.

Three excellent men have consented to serve on a Street Commission, the purpose of which commission will be to co-operate with our engineering and street departments and, in time, to make Pasadena one of our foremost cities in street development.

A commission of three on a "Municipal Accounting and Purchasing Department" will be tried. Two good men have practically agreed to serve on this commission.

The study of municipal government, with a view to suggesting improvements for the charter of Pasadena, will be taken up by a commission. Three good men are in prospect for this work.

The question of temperance regulation will be handled by a carefully selected committee of men who will have a most complicated and difficult subject to treat.

There are a number of other commissions that should be organized as soon as qualified men will consent to take up the several tasks.

Our municipal electric light has been fought for step by step and its present state of success is another evidence that we of Pasadena stand together firmly when attacked by an enemy of the city's best interests. A great many of Pasadena's citizens are standing unselfishly by the Electric Plant, principally for the reason that its success or failure is a matter of vital concern to every patriotic citizen of the United States. The general desire of our people is to see the plant forge ahead with a healthy growth. The present administration was elected on a strong municipal light platform, and for this reason nothing could better please Pasadenans than to have Los Angeles make a great success of its power and water project.

Los Angeles is in a position to offer us a most ideal solution of the water problem. By her permitting us to conserve and use some of the higher Tujunga water, we could supply all of our highest territory—that is, the land between Devil's Gate and the very base of the mountains. The Devil's Gate water could be applied to the intermediate section lying between Devil's Gate and Colorado street, and a pipe line from the proposed San Fernando Reservoir through Eagle Rock Valley could be made to supply our lower section. This plan would supply gravity water to every part of our city and vicinity, thus eliminating for future citizens the perpetual expense of pumping. The electrical energy inherent in the Tujunga water could thus be conserved and such Owen's River water as we would use would be taken from the San Fernando Reservoir after all power had been utilized. Consequently, no power would be lost.

Other plans for water have been offered and they are being carefully considered by our "Water Committee." Thus far, none of the other propositions look quite as good to me as that which Los Angeles could offer if she would.

Los Angeles will, I believe, come to appreciate Pasadena's ambition to develop an almost ideal city government, which means an almost ideal city, and will aid and co-operate with Pasadena in attaining its ambition, not alone in respect to the latter's water supply but in other and perhaps more important ways. That there is a strong desire upon the part of the people of Pasadena that this city maintain its identity and continue with a full measure of local self-government does not mean that there must be a spirit of distrust or antagonism between the two cities. Both are working for high ends. Each can help the other. And I for one anticipate only the most friendly relationship between the two cities.

"THE BETTER COUNTRY"

A Valuable New Work by the Rev. Dana W. Bartlett

Los Angeles and the State of California has no more useful citizen than the Rev. Dana W. Bartlett, social worker, evangelist, author and man of affairs. For many years he has had charge of a social settlement enterprise known as Bethlehem Institute, located in a district in Los Angeles where foreign immigrants and laborers live, which he has built up to potent influence and valuable service to the people of that region. The "Good Doctor" is a member of the Housing Commission and an influential advisor of the Alexander administration in Los Angeles, and he is widely known and highly respected in all classes of society.

A year or two ago the Doctor wrote a book entitled "The Better City," which was a review of the work in progress in California and all over the Union to improve political and social conditions in the cities. Now he has turned out a companion volume entitled "The Better Country," in which he does for the rural districts and for the nation at large what he did before for the city, viz., presents a rapid, up-to-date survey of all the various agencies that are making the country better to live in and that are helping to open the field of opportunity to all men.

A brief enumeration of the principal topics covered in the 550 pages of this volume will give the reader some suggestion of its scope: Organizations at work in the human uplift; work in other countries than ours; our land laws and reclamation work; conservation, its history, purposes and progress; harbor and waterways development; the struggle with special interests; work of the National Government in improving agriculture; getting people out of the city into the country; stimulating the rural spirit; enrichment of country life by parcels post, good roads, etc.; conservation of human life by sanitation and laws protecting workers; educating the people; caring for the nation's wards; transforming foreigners into fellow citizens; developing our esthetic side; the agitation for permanent universal peace; democracy, the bona fide rule of the people.

In the form of appendices at the end of the book are presented the full text of a number of laws and other matters that are referred to in the main body of the work. These and a good index make the volume one of special value as a book of reference.

But the greatest service that Dr. Bartlett renders us in this book is to give us solid ground on which to base the optimism that inheres in the souls of most of us and to stimulate a hope for better days, without which life would be almost unendurable in this world of trouble. Existence is smooth enough for those fat and greasy citizens who have all they need themselves and do not care a hang how much the other fellow may suffer; but it has a large element of tragedy for those who have the sympathy and the insight to comprehend what those whom we carelessly denominate "the poor" actually endure. But things are growing better; this book shows us how and where and why and how much. And it makes clear to us that the reforms and changes of the present day—great as they are—serve merely as a suggestion and outline of the great social revolution just ahead of us.

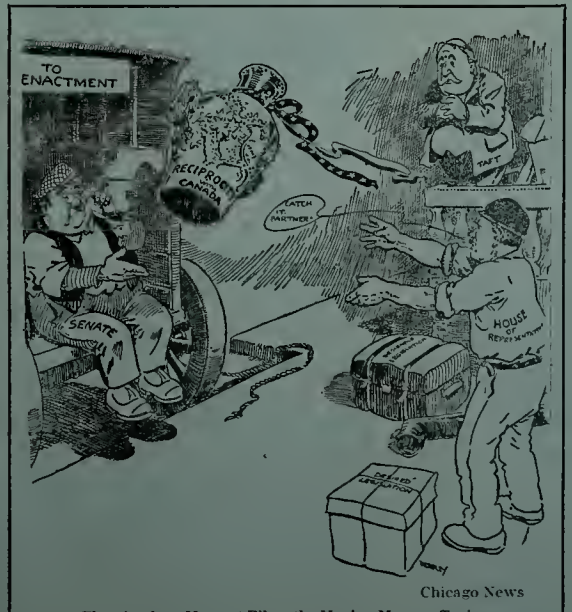
THE STEEL TRUST

Constituent companies of the Steel Trust are today delivering steel rails for $24 a ton in Mexico, South America and other foreign countries, in competition with Belgian and English manufacturers. In the United States, for ten years past, the Steel Trust has not sold one steel rail under $28 a ton.



Mr. Brandeis said that scientific management would save $1,000,000 a day to the railroads of the United States. If railroads bought their rails as Mexican and other foreign roads do, at $24 a ton, they would have saved just $16,000,000 on the rails which they bought last year from the Steel Trust at $28 a ton. The way to put this particular detail of scientific management into effect is for the railroad officials to go before the Democratic Ways and Means Committee and ask to have the tariff taken off steel rails. But they won't. The reason they won't is that most of the dominating officials of the railroads are participants in the profits of the grossly improper relation which exists between the railroads and the Steel Trust.—Collier's Weekly.

That Anxious Moment When the Moving Men are Toying with Your Treasures

Denver Post

First Chance in Sixteen Years

Great Municipal Display: The International Municipal Congress and Exposition will be held in Chicago from the 18th to 30th of September next. For particulars respecting this event one should address John MacVicar who is commissioner-General of the affair and who has offices in the Great Northern Building in Chicago. By the way, somebody should suppress, or at least tone down, the individual that writes the advertisements for this enterprise. In large type he is announcing that in addition to municipal exhibits of every variety it will show the work of "the great inventors and manufacturers of the world who are manufacturing and providing municipal supplies for the universe." For the universe, eh? Will he give us the address, please, of some firm that is making irrigation machinery for export to Mars? Or that makes vacuum cleaners to take the spots off the sun? Or that manufactures voting machines to break up the rings on Saturn? Or that has patents for testers to be used on the Milky Way?

Los Angeles Municipal League: The Municipal League of Los Angeles held its annual meeting on the 11th of this month. James A. Anderson, who has served as vice-president during the last three years, was elected in the place of J. O. Koepfli, who is traveling in Europe. Mr. Anderson was for four years president of the city Board of Public Works and has a large knowledge of municipal affairs. R. W. Burnham, who has been a member of the Executive Committee of the League from its beginning, was made first vice-president. Others chosen who have been in service a year or more were Frank Simpson, A. L. Stetson, B. N. Coffman, L. W. Myers, Dr. Elbert Wing, Fred L. Alles and S. M. Newmark. New members elected were Dr Elmer A. Clark, Clarence Drown, J. H. Francis, W. E. Hampton, E. J. Stanton and R. D. Wade.

Too Much Strain for One Man: The city of Staunton, Virginia, some time ago undertook to go the commission plan one better, or four better, and put all its affairs in the hands of a business manager. There was a city council, but it merely went through the form of voting assent to the manager's acts. This went on successfully for nearly a year, and then the manager collapsed with nervous prostration, chiefly, it is believed, as a result of the importunities of place seekers. This result is discussed by newspapers as though it had peculiar and definite significance —which it has not. The plan may or may not be a good one, and the fact that this particular individual failed in health from overwork is important to him and his friends but not to the question at issue.

A Galveston Opinion: Galveston, Texas, was the first city to try the commission plan (not counting Washington, where the commission is appointed) and it has had now nearly ten years of genuine business-like good government. Now this is what its City Club says in an official manifesto on the election that is about to take place: "An honest, efficient and progressive city government encourages the citizen, secures new people and enterprises, increases the value of property and brings prosperity. It has more to do with the progress, advancement and general improvement of a city than any other agency."

Killing Dandelions: The dandelion has become a serious pest in lawns in California. If allowed to have its own way it is likely to run the grass out almost entirely. Several methods of treatment are suggested. One is copperas, or iron sulphate, dissolved in water in the proportions of one and one-fourth pounds to a gallon of water. It must then be applied by a sprayer that will thoroughly cover all the leaves. It will blacken the grass but do it no permanent injury. Another treatment is with creosote, which can be poured into the plant at its center and will permeate to the roots.

Correcting Election Abuses: The new corrupt practices act in the State of Illinois contains pretty strong medicine. Treating to drinks or meals in politics, is forbidden, and one is punished for asking a candidate to buy a ticket to a ball or picnic. Paid matter in newspapers must be so marked, and all election literature must bear the name of the author. Political meetings must not be held in dram shops. In the election of a United States senator it is a felony to give money or to promise position to any candidate for the Legislature.

The Wife's Bank Account: Under the new law in California, worthless and drunken husbands are no longer able to draw their wives' savings out of the bank. The wife is allowed to conduct an account in her own name and no one else can draw the money. This is one of many things that have waited long for just action by man-made legislatures. No doubt even now it will strike the stand-patters as another melancholy evidence of woman's disposition to leave her proper sphere, the home, that she wishes her bank account let alone.

In Favor of Revocable Franchises: A new provision in the constitution of Michigan forbids the granting of utility franchises without a referendum unless they are revocable by the "indeterminate" plan. The effect of this is likely to be to make all future franchises of the indeterminate kind.

No Street Car Killing: The report on street car accidents for the twin cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul for the year 1910 shows not one loss of a life, which is most extraordinary considering that the population aggregates nearly half a million. The railway people themselves lay this immunity to the use of gates, which they were compelled by law to put on their cars several years ago. No one can get on or off while the car is in motion. The rate of speed also is low.

More Elections: Chicago has had five general elections in the last eight months. The direct primary doubles the number of elections and direct legislation and freedom for the people to alter their charters by amendment will add to the number. That the people should be called upon to give up an hour or so of time to civic duties several times a year seems to the reactionary editors quite a terrible thing. Politicians are deeply worried about it. The people themselves, however, seem to be quite calm.

Directory of Organizations: The Civic League of St. Louis, which is one of the most original and effective municipal organizations in the country, is preparing, as a basis for better coordination of civic forces, a directory of organizations, which will contain the names of all officers and members and description of the purposes of every civic and business body in the city of St. Louis. A volume of this sort would be of service in any city.

Level-headed People: Judge McBride of the Supreme Court of Oregon calls attention to the fact that no law thus far passed by the people of Oregon, where the initiative has been in force a number of years, has ever been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, whereas many laws passed by the Legislature during the same time have been thrown out for that reason.

Women for Police Head: Mrs. Kate Kane Rossi, one of the best known women lawyers in Chicago, who has done a great deal of work in that city for the welfare of women and children, has made application to the newly elected mayor of Chicago for appointment as Superintendent of Police. She says she can make Chicago the best regulated city in the nation.

Garbage by Night: New York has adopted the rule of removing garbage by night instead of by day so as to get rid of offensive odors. Several cities that have used this system for a time have abandoned it, because they found they could not get as clean and thorough work done by night as by day.

Reducing Cost of Government: Under the commission form of government the expense of running the government of Birmingham, Alabama, is $74,000 less per year than under the old system.

McClellan at Princeton: The professorship of public affairs in Princeton College will hereafter be held by George B. McClellan, former Mayor of New York City. Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, McClellan—Democrats —seem to be in particular favor at that institution of learning.

Teaching Municipal Government: Over forty universities and colleges in this country now present special courses in municipal government. Yale has a class on this subject numbering about 500.

Loss Through Smoke: Chicago figures its annual loss through the smoke nuisance at $50,000,000. Cleveland puts its loss at $4,000,000 and St. Louis estimates it at $1,000,000.

GOOD GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION PLANS

Officers of Los Angeles Organization Elected and Plans Perfected for 1911 Campaign

The action of the Good Government Organization in unanimously and enthusiastically adopting resolutions endorsing without reservation the administration of Mayor George Alexander and asking him to stand for reelection has greatly clarified the political atmosphere in Los Angeles. The Mayor's letter of acceptance was characteristically brief and to the point. Acknowledging the receipt of the request, he wastes no time or effort in circumlocution:

Fred C. Nelles, First Vice-President

"I answer directly that I will."

Mayor Alexander's letter was read to the executive committee of the Good Government Organization at its meeting last Monday. It was presented to the city central committee also at a meeting held last night in Blanchard hall.

At the latter meeting the city central committee and the city executive committee jointly considered the declaration of principles, or platform for the municipal campaign of 1911. Copies have been in the hands of all the members of each committee for several days, giving them time for careful consideration of the various planks proposed.

The platform contains the following principles:

1. Rigid adherence to the policy of non-partisanship in the administration of municipal affairs, and, as a means to this end, the nomination, election and appointment to municipal office of men selected solely on account of their fitness for positions of public trust and pledged to work for the advancement of the general principles herein enunciated.

2. Vigorous opposition to the relinquishment by the people, through their agents or representatives, of any of the property holdings of the people which may be required for the comfort, convenience or profit of this or a future generation.

3. Ultimate municipal ownership and operation of all public utilities in the city of Los Angeles.

The specific application of these principles is given in a statement of ten important points, viz: The distribution of electric power and light by the city, the construction of the harbor railway, consolidation of city and county, establishment of public forum, public inquiry into industrial conditions, framing of a new charter under the commission plan, regulating the granting of franchises to privately owned, public utility corporations, the prohibition of further mutilation of the surfaces of streets by public service corporations, redemption by the city of pre-annexation pledges made to the inhabitants of that section of the city adjacent to the harbor, and providing that hereafter no territory should be annexed to the city of Los Angeles unless it assumes its equal portion of any indebtedness the city may have assumed prior to such annexation for the benefit of the whole city.

This procedure is rather new in political programs. The conventional method of determining what shall or shall not be submitted to the rank and file of a political organization for adoption into a party platform has been to name a small platform committee to consider all proposed declarations. The fruit of its deliberations would finally reach the parent body, but many a general or specific declaration proposed by some man with ideas, which might have been welcomed by the majority in the greater body, has been put to sleep—"in committee."

The innovation for which somebody within the Good Government Organization is responsible this year—the initiation of the platform in the central committee itself, a body composed of delegates elected by the various precinct organizations—has been well received and in the opinion of many will in time be accepted as a precedent worth consideration. The provisions of the platform proposed already have been touched upon in The California Outlook.

The executive committee of the Good Government Organization has elected the following officers for the year ending May 1, 1912:

President, S. C. Graham (re-elected); First vice-president, Fred C. Nelles; Second Vice-president, Walter J. Desmond of Long Beach; Treasurer, Otto J. Zahn; Secretary, George Baker Anderson.

At no time since the first good government campaign has greater interest in the progressive movement been evinced than now. Secretary Anderson states that hardly a day passes without additions to the membership roll of the organization.

Otto J. Zahn, Treasurer

While many of the new members are men who have taken up their residence in Los Angeles within the past two or three years, it is noteworthy that the majority of the new members are men who have resided in the city for years but who only recently have voluntarily identified themselves with the movement. Without exception those recently enrolling have declared themselves as unequivocally in favor of the re-election of Mayor Alexander.

Most of the 230 voting precincts in the city now have Good Government clubs. The work of organizing the relatively small number of precincts now inadequately organized or entirely without clubs will be commenced at once. It is the intention of Secretary Anderson to have a working club in every precinct before the beginning of the actual primary campaign.

THE "COMMON PEOPLE" AND THE PROGRESSIVE MOVEMENT

Los Angeles, Cal., May 3rd, 1911.
California Outlook,

Gentlemen: I noticed in last week's Outlook some of Herbert Johnson's cartoons and the request made by you, "We want the endorsement of the Common People," and wish to relate a few experiences I have had during the past month, which cause me to believe you do have the endorsement of the common people to a much greater extent than of the class who are giving their undivided attention to accumulating property—and then more property.

I have greatly enjoyed reading the Outlook for several years and have the pleasure of quite an extended acquaintance with bankers, business and professional men and of mechanics and people working on salary; so I wished to have them read the Outlook and have carried a copy with me and solicited subscriptions during the past month.

My idea at first was to obtain a few subscribers and then give up the business of subscription agent; but I soon became interested in the study of human nature, especially as I found it so different from what I had expected. I found that the workingmen were much more interested in good government and much more desirous of information concerning the progressive movement in California than were the business men. I found a good deal of apathy among the men who have great property interests and who should be vitally interested in every movement for better government and better political conditions in city, county and state, such as we are now enjoying with Governor Johnson and the best legislature California ever had, with Mayor Alexander and our present excellent city government, and with such men as Pridham, Butler and Manning in control of county affairs.

Much to my surprise, most of the business men in their banks and offices did not have time to read the Outlook and did not have time to read politics, anyway. They seemed, however, to have a wonderful instinct to enable them to vote on all the important matters, which are to be settled by the people, and to vote right. They would not waste time from money-making to devote to obtaining information on mere city, county and state affairs which seemed to be of minor importance and to be considered when the time came to vote, and not before.

Among the "Common People," of whom Abraham Lincoln remarked: "The Lord must love the common people, he has made so many of them," I found general interest and a desire to obtain all the information they could on this progressive movement in California. As a result, the great majority of the new subscribers I obtained for the Outlook came from the "Common People," and I gained an experience in human nature that was quite different from what I had expected when I commenced to solicit subscribers for the California Outlook.

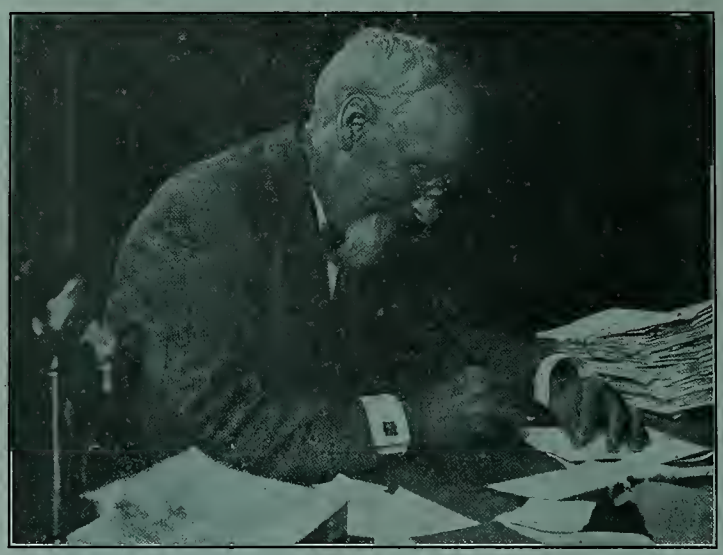
fall as the side he sides with stands or falls. There is no other way.



Binding Up the Party's Wounds Standing by itself nothing could better have been done by the President than promptly to accept the resignation of Secretary of War Dickenson and promptly to appoint to his place Henry S. Stimson of New York. Mr. Stimson splendidly represents the progressive spirit in the Republican party. But what evil genius could have induced the President, almost at the same instant, to appoint C. S. Millington, of "Sunny Jim" Sherman's political family, assistant treasurer of the United States? No doubt the intention was to bind up the party's wounds by distributing sops without prejudice to the left as well as to the right, but it is to be doubted if there be any balm in that Gilead. What Republicans want to know is under what banner William Howard Taft is going to march, the progressive or the retrogressive, with the common people or the special interests. He has talked all right, and he has done some mighty good things, but never was king or potentate surrounded by a more dubious lot of near advisers than was President Taft during the first two years of his administration. If he would be entirely impartial between the two wings of his party, having consorted with the standpatters for half his term, he would fire the whole bunch bodily and train with the progressives from now until the end of his administration. That might not insure his renomination and election, but he would at least be in good company during the remainder of his journey, whereas, if he tries overmuch to placate both wings, he is not unlikely to be dropped by both and be forced to go the rest of the way on foot and alone. That indeed would be a melancholy spectacle.

Oakland's Election The "horrible example" set by Berkeley, was not followed in Oakland, although a most strenuous campaign was made by the Socialists and their sympathizers to that end. The two contests were not analogous in all respects. In Berkeley there was an out-and-out reform government to punish and an "old guard" of politicians to do the punishing. In Oakland there was no special reason why any "old guard" should take sides and the contest was between, not a reform, but a progressive government and the Socialists, reenforced by about as unsavory a court house machine as any county in California can boast of. As in Berkeley, so in Oakland, the Socialists will live to see the day when they will be heartily ashamed of their allies. The Socialists were all beaten, but they managed jointly to elect to the governing commission one of the court house fraternity and, in doing so, to defeat one of the best men on the progressive ticket, City Treasurer Meese. So Oakland starts off with the commission form of government and a rousing bond election issue in prospect for an early date.

Significant Side-Lights Berkeley also had a bond issue in prospect immediately to follow the city election of officers. What a frost was that! Every proposition was voted down cold. Wherefore? The reasons are not far to seek. The enthusiasts who elected the Socialist ticket no doubt generally voted for the bonds, but not the off-color "old guard" who had accomplished all they wanted when they had defeated the non-Socialistic reformers. The old guard of Berkeley had no stomach for putting into the hands of the Socialists any considerable credit to be expended without their participation. Why, the money might be honestly expended! That would be objection enough. It takes no great sagacity to divine that the old guard's expectation is that, two years from now, when the Socialist regime shall have been discredited, it will be opportune to come forward with a "business man's" ticket to resume control, a government of "practical" men. Having beaten the reform element in one election, and the Socialists in another, what should hinder the old guard entering into their heritage, voting bonds, distributing patronage to the boys and, in fact, beginning to live once more? The Berkeley vote on the bond issue was, so far as it expressed anything more important than a general apathy, a vote of lack of confidence in the new regime, a recoiling from the leap that had been taken in the dark. For, waiving the unsparing denunciations of Mr. Galloway, Berkeley, in turning out the best city government it ever had, and installing the Socialists, made a sad mistake, but as it made its bed so must it lie in it. And it must sleep alone, too, for Oakland takes its blankets and goes off by itself.

The Man Who Don't Vote What is to be done with the man who does not vote? The Oakland city election was a redhot affair. All sides put forth their utmost endeavors to get out every friend they had, and yet barely two-thirds the registered vote got to the polls. To speak with exactness 22,023 votes out of 37,000 registering. In the Berkeley city election not more than two-thirds of the qualified voters got to the polls and, in the bond election, not more than one-third. So far as the non-voters are concerned they have no rights that anyone is bound to respect. They are under obligation to accept such government as those who do vote choose to give them and hold their peace, the kind of government meted out being none of their business; but do they owe anything to others? Would it make any real difference to the social welfare if they were all to be disfranchised? As long as they are on the voting lists they cause expense in postage and other efforts made to get them out to vote and with their names off the great register the burden of conducting campaigns would, to that extent, be lightened. That is no small burden, but do these shirks really hurt anything through their shirking. The Watchman is not clear in his own mind on the subject and craves light. He has a lurking notion that these delinquents ought all to be disfranchised, but if they are only so many political nonentities why go to that trouble? Precisely what harm do they do anyhow? Will some one who knows venture to explain? For upon the determination of this issue very much will depend as to whether or not women are to be given the franchise which, if granted, will enormously increase the stay-at-home vote.

Alexander Consents to Stand for Re-election

Mayor Alexander

In response to the urgent request of the Good Government Organization of Los Angeles that he become a candidate to succeed himself at the next city election, Mayor Alexander consented last Monday.

The Mayor's letter of acceptance follows:

"George B. Anderson, Secretary of the Good Government Organization, City.

"Dear Sir—I am in receipt of the resolutions of the central and executive committees of the Good Government Organization, expressing their approval of the present city administration, asking that I again become a candidate for Mayor of the City of Los Angeles, and pledging their support.

"I answer directly that I will.

"While the cares and worries of the office have caused me to feel some hesitancy about taking this course, the intense interest I feel in the city's affairs, particularly at this time, when her policies as to water, power and harbor are being formed, the earnest requests of many loyal friends, and the fact that the term of office will be but two years, have overcome that hesitancy.

"I highly appreciate the honor of being mayor of this great and progressive city that we all love so well. I appreciate also the good-will for and the confidence in me that the members of your organization and many others of our citizens have shown. I have tried to be worthy of that good-will and confidence and have worked always for what I believed to be the best interests of the people of this city. If the people see fit to re-elect me, I pledge my best efforts along the same lines.

"I wish to thank the members of the Good Government Organization and the citizens in general for the loyal support they have accorded our efforts to give a clean and efficient administration."

"GEORGE ALEXANDER."

AN EASTERN VIEW OF DIRECT LEGISLATION

The New Haven Journal-Courier says that those who are urging the initiative and referendum and the recall are seeking, not to escape the consequences of a full developed form of democracy, but to invite them. They do not believe that a republican form of government has had a fair chance on this continent, and that the ills which have resulted from our political experiments are to be attributed to the obstacles that have been placed in the way by methods of restraint more nearly related to a monarchy than a democracy. They would bring the people into the closest touch imaginable with their government and make them responsible for its achievements.

OF FIFTY YEARS AGO

May 13, 1861

The letter of Governor Downey to the Union meeting at San Francisco, has been, within the last twenty-four hours, the most prominent theme of conversation in this community, next to the topics presented in our 'Pony' extra. It has caused unbounded surprise and regret, and we cannot be mistaken in the symptoms of popular displeasure when we assert that it will prove fatal to the political aspirations which Governor Downey is alleged by his friends to entertain."

The objectionable language in this letter was:

"I did not then believe, nor do I now, that an aggressive war should be waged upon any section of the Confederacy, nor do I believe that this Union can be preserved by a coercion policy."

May 14, 1861

"It is said that the Settlers of Santa Clara have agreed to submit their cause to a decision of the Supreme Court. Several lawyers have agreed to plead their cause without charge."

The Sacramento Union of May 14, 1861, quotes the following from the Cincinnati Press of April 27th:

"Professor Lowe, the balloonist, who ascended from this city on Saturday last, arrived here yesterday morning. . . . He was carried to the southward, and finally landed a short distance north of Columbia, South Carolina, just before 1 o'clock, and about nine hours after his ascension. The distance traveled could not have been less than 1,000 miles, so that he must have moved at the rate of more than one hundred miles per hour.

"He was arrested once in South Carolina as a spy, but on his informing his captors who he was he was dismissed."

This is the Professor Lowe for whom Mt. Lowe, near Los Angeles, is named.

"Watermelons.—The Sacramento market has been supplied for the past week with watermelons from the Sandwich Islands."

"Sitka Ice! Sitka Ice! On and after Monday, May 6th, the price of Sitka Ice, delivered to customers, will be (3) three cents per pound. Phil. Caduc, Agent for the American Russian Commercial Co."

May 18, 1861

"The President in Earnest.—T. J. Dryer, who is now in San Francisco, and on his way to his mission at the Sandwich Islands, relates the following:

"When paying his respects to the President, he expressed the hope that Lincoln would be enabled to administer the government satisfactorily to himself and to the country. Thereat 'Old Abe' raised one long arm aloft, and, as Dryer asserts, 'looking about seventeen feet high,' he said with border emphasis, 'I will be enabled to administer the government as our fathers have done, or I will sink the secessionists or myself seventy fathoms in—a very bad place.'"

OF TODAY

OAKLAND, May 10.—The present municipal administration, under which Oakland has been raised from the seventy-sixth rank to seventeenth in the great cities of the United States, a magnificent system of parks and children's playgrounds inaugurated, and bonds voted for municipal wharves and docks and a $1,000,000 city hall, received hearty endorsement yesterday by the voters of the city, when Mayor Frank K. Mott and the candidates on the progressive business men's ticket, which Mott headed, with possibly one exception, were elected to serve under the new charter, which goes into effect in July, by substantial majorities over the Socialist and county ring office-seekers.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 10.—Today's session of the fifty-ninth annual convention of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows was devoted to lodge business. More than 400 subordinate lodges were represented.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 11.—A twenty-million dollar hydro electric power project to serve the principal towns of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys and the cities on San Francisco Bay, is being developed by John Hays Hammond, world renowned mining engineer, and special envoy from the United States to the coronation of England's King, who is to become a leading factor in the electric power development of the State.

Hammond six months ago purchased the Tuolumne River Power Company and the Tuolumne Light & Power Company holdings on the Tuolumne River. Yesterday he closed a deal for the La Grange Water & Power Company, and will consolidate the three big concerns in one immense project.

The three plants combined involve an outlay of $20,000,000 and guarantee their owner 100,000 horsepower within a year, when Hammond expects to have his transmission lines extended into San Francisco, Sacramento, Stockton, Marysville, and other big towns in Central California.

BAKERSFIELD, May 12.—At 11:35 o'clock this morning Bank Examiner R. E. Dobbs, acting under orders of State Superintendent of Banks W. R. Williams, closed the Kern Valley Bank in this city. . . . The Kern Valley Bank is the pioneer banking institution of Bakersfield, it having been established in 1874.

SACRAMENTO, May 13.—State Controller A. B. Nye today apportioned $60,752.92 to the several counties of the State from the United States Forest Reserve fund, paid to the State by the Government. One-half of the amount goes towards the school fund and the other half is placed in the road fund of each county.

LONG BEACH, May 13.—An attempt to bring the suffrage question before the State Federation of Women's Societies at the morning session today failed because of a misunderstanding.

Number 14

By the Onlooker

THE SHRINKING VIOLET

Listen, my children, and you shall hear not a word that Senator Avey says. And you are not missing an awful lot of words, either, for the number he spilled at the last session was so few that he should be sent to Congress expressly to help keep down the cost of printing the Congressional Record. The truth is, Senator Dr. Avey, or Doctor Senator Avey, or however you want to say it, holds all the original patents on the shrinking violets stuff. Modesty and he were twins, and took to the tall timber simultaneously in the long ago, and have been camping out there ever since. It's lonesome, but it suits Modesty, Avey, et al., so be it far from us to kick.

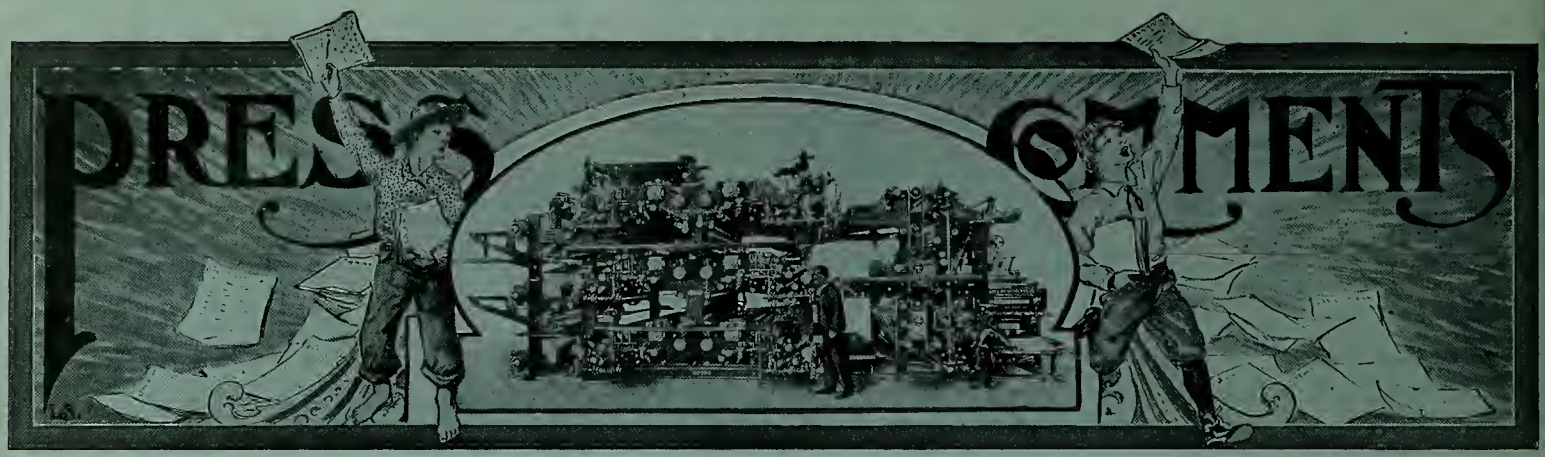
If you will take a map, you can locate this camp with ease, but you will gather a surprise when you do it. For, knowing that Senator Avey's district is the counties of Inyo and

Senator Avey

San Berdoo, and, further, knowing Senator Avey, you naturally look for his hidden habitat in such sections as Turtle Mountains, Soda Lake, Panamint Valley or the Pinto Peaks. Any of these resorts is dry enough to shrink anything, from a modest violet to a pair of buckskin pants, and all of them are lonesome enough to suit the wildest wild gazelle that ever fled the haunts of man. Here, you say to yourself, here is Avey's happy home.

Friend and gentle stranger, you are wrong. All the wilderness that Doctor Avey ever saw can be observed from Smiley Heights on a clear day, with the naked eye. All the solitude that he finds convenient to seek is located in the streets of Redlands, in the land of the golden oranges, the gateway to the Western Paradise, circulars free on request. Address the Chamber of Commerce. In short, Doctor Avey is a practicing physician, and can about as well afford to be solitary as a landscape gardener could afford to live with the Esquimaux. The only opportunity to flee from the madding crowd was opened when politics sought him for her own. Here, said Avey, is an opening into the simple life, a cool and fragrant byway to obscurity, afar from the bustle of mankind. So he went in and got himself elected Senator. When he found himself in the quiet corridors of the Capitol at Sacramento, he was happy; and when he was assigned the chairmanship of the committee on executive communications he realized with joy that he was so near the coveted oblivion that he hastened to hire a man to watch out for him for fear he would wake up some morning and not be able to find himself.

In brief Senator Avey was not one of those stertorous individuals, so rampant in our legislative halls, with the lungs of the calliope (and often eke its brains), the arms of the windmill, and the delivery of a seventy-stamp mill competing with a string of blasts on the mother lode. When Senator Avey had anything to say, he led you out to a quiet corner and whispered it in your ear, and maybe he had to whisper it over again before you heard it good. But—and here is the heinous heresy of it, the unbelievable miracle of it—he actually got his bills passed! And not one cylinder head blown out, nor a single boiler burst! I suspect—sh! don't breathe this—I just suspect, that Avey was as much surprised as everybody else, too.



His district is the largest, geographically, of any in the state. Numerically, it is about the size of one of the larger of San Francisco's nine districts. Senator Avey's territory is something larger than the State of New York, with a total population somewhat in excess of four city blocks of New York city. One day Senator Avey rose and addressed the chair. Telepathic communication being established, the Senator made substantially the following remarks:

Mr. President: I hold in my hand a communication from certain residents of Inyo County, referring to the bill before the house. I am reliably informed that these signators are my constituents—that they dwell in the district which I have the honor to represent. Mr. President, I accept this information as true because of the source from which I receive it. Owing to the pressure of business, I have not had time to consult an atlas and prove its correctness. Some day, when I am wealthy enough to be able to afford to take such an extensive journey, I shall take a few months off and pay this section a flying visit, to show my appreciation of the votes it cast for me. In the meantime, I take pleasure in presenting this memorial to the consideration of the Senate."

That's the sort of a district that Avey represents. You'd rather imagine that that sort of a district would pick out a big, two-fisted, swashbuckling type of Senator. But not a swash did they buckle in the trusty 30th. They chose Avey; and when you size up his record—they could have done a good deal worse.

Pertinent Editorial Extracts From Our State Exchanges

Sherman Has Ambitions

The Washington correspondent of the Chicago Tribune writes that paper that "the Cannon-Lorimer following is talking about getting delegates for the nomination of Vice-President James Schoolcraft Sherman of New York. Lorimer purposes to stand by Sherman as far as he can. The Vice-President has been his consistent friend in the Senate and has used all the resources of his high office to assure the retention of the "blond boss in the seat he holds."

If Sherman really thinks the backing of Lorimer and Cannon will make for success in a canvass for the presidency in this country right now he had better try it on. The results would without doubt be quite illuminating.—Riverside Press.

Roosevelt Not a Candidate

Col. Roosevelt has sidetracked a movement to boom him for the Republican presidential nomination next year. But the press dispatches continue to tell of brand new schemes on the part of certain leaders to force the nomination of the former president on the grounds that he is the only man the party can elect and of Col. Roosevelt's willingness to accept it if it be demanded that he lead the fight.

Such a story has many elements of truth—except the essential one that Col. Roosevelt is not willing to accept the nomination and will not allow it to be forced upon him.

So strong are his feelings in the matter that it is believed he would refuse a nomination after it was made, but his immediate concern is that no steps be taken that might possibly lead to developments where such a course would be necessary. In other words, he insists that his friends see to it that his name is not brought into the situation in any compromising way.—Salinas Index.

Seeking to Discredit Women's Eight-Hour Law

The woolen mills at Oakland have announced a reduction in the wages of women and children employes, on the claim that the eight-hour law cannot be observed and the same compensation given employes as under a nine-hour day.

This probably introduces a method to be generally followed in an effort to discredit the eight-hour law.

It is an unfair and insincere method of attempting to block a reform of industrial conditions as affecting women.

The mills could do one of two things and observe the law without financial loss: They could forego some of the big profits which a tariff-locked market assures to them, or they could arbitrarily advance the price of their products in a market owned by the highly protected woolen manufacturers.

But the mills choose to do neither; for, like most of the textile industries, they demand a patent right to exploit without opposition the home market, and to produce their goods largely by the sweat of women and children—women and children whose workday exceeds that of the brawny labor in the mechanical trades.

Such a system is inviting its own abolition.—Stockton Record.

What Colorado Loses Through a Bad System

Colorado poignantly illustrates the plight to which a State may be reduced by the system which permits the legislature to elect a United States Senator, instead of The People by their direct votes.

Her legislature, after a long and unlovely struggle, has failed to choose anyone to fill a vacancy caused by the death of a Senator, while the Senator who remains, Guggenheim, represents the great monied interests, stands opposed to most of his constituents' wishes, and holds an office to which he could not have been elected if The People had had the choice.

So The People of Colorado have no representation, or worse than none, in the United States Senate.

Fortunately, owing to numerous changes in the composition of the Senate, there is now a good prospect that it will soon yield to public sentiment and consent to the Constitutional Amendment providing for direct popular election of its members. Otherwise there would sooner or later be a national convention to amend the Constitution, and the Senate would be powerless to prevent it. —Sacramento Bee.

Arbitration an Accomplished Fact

In an article on "Disarmament and Arbitration" Rear-Admiral Mahan says that an arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain would only ratify an accomplished fact, since "there is no intelligent man today who finds it conceivable that the two countries would ever go to war again." War between the United States and Great Britain is a very unlikely thing, but as all things are possible, an arbitration treaty between the two English-speaking nations would about settle the matter definitely for all time. It would be a splendid object-lesson to the world also.—Redlands Review.

California's Governor Gives Full Measure of Service

Some of the few good governors of American States confine their aggressive efforts in the people's behalf to the few weeks or months in which the legislature is in session. Others, to use a popular phrase, are "on the job" three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. And one of these is Hiram W. Johnson, Governor of California.

No sooner had Governor Johnson finished the work of passing on the many bills left for his consideration when the Legislature adjourned than he took up the patriotic duty of doing all in his power to promote the success of constitutional amendments which are needed to complete the task of wholly restoring the government of California to the people. * * * —Redding Searchlight.

From the Pockets of The People

Over three hundred Republican employees of the House have received their discharges to take effect May 1, and as many Democrats who have waited since the convening of Congress, will take their places. Many of these officials have been in the service for sixteen years, and it will be difficult to separate them from the government pay roll, and the administration has been importuned by their backers to find suitable places in some other departments.

Investigation disclosed that some persons on t' e House pay rolls never rendered any service for the government, but were kept there by influential members, because of their political power at home, in fact they never came to Washington except to sign the pay roll, and in some cases even this was not done.—Downey News.

The Alaska Coal Fiasco

The efforts being made by the capitalistic press to make it appear that the throwing overboard of a cargo of coal, delivered at an Alaska port from a Canadian mine, is a protest against the action of government in the coal cases, and that it is similar to the famous "tea party" of Boston before the revolution, is in keeping with other false news by the same press.

There is plenty of coal in Alaska and no reason why it cannot be mined and sold, but the large interests are trying to swindle the government out of the coal lands and create a coal monopoly, which a few honest men are trying to prevent.

Some of the government officials are standing in with the conspirators, but fear public opinion. The throwing overboard of this coal is the scheme of the coal pirates and not of the people.—San Diego Herald.

you see only the outside of the tariff!

The outside of the tariff is that handsome, specious, misleading thing that we call the principle of protection. We have all these years gone along deceiving ourselves with the impression that we were protecting the American people against foreign competition when really what we were doing was protecting them against domestic competition and putting them in the hands of a small group of capitalists.

I want to give you an example, and I will ask you if it is an unfair example. It is an example of the modern processes of conducting your industries. Let us say that there are twenty mills manufacturing the same sorts of goods, and that the gentlemen controlling these twenty mills get together in some quiet room and say, "Here, we had better not compete with each other any more. If we combine, we are perfectly sure of controlling the American market, because there is that splendid wall of the protective tariff that makes it unnecessary that we should compete with anybody but each other. Very well, then, we won't compete with each otber. We will combine. We will put a value upon each one of these properties and we will put them all into one organization upon that valuation. And we won't be very particular about the valuation. We admit that there are mills among these twenty that haven't been brought up to the standards of modern business. There are plants among these that haven't been so assembled that the manufacturing process is economic. There are plants which are old fashioned and haven't been renewed in eight or ten or fifteen years. In other words, there are some factories that, if we really competed with each other, would be put out of business. But they cost us something and we are going to put them into this combination for a little more than they cost us; for a good deal more than they cost us; for anything that you will allow us to put them in for. Then we are going to express our joint capital in the terms of these inflated values and we are going to sell stock on that basis and make the public assist us in advancing those inflated enterprises. Then what are we going to do? We are going to shut up the mills that are not efficient, and when we sell the goods we are going to make the people pay for the enterprises that are shut up. They have got to pay us enough to pay for the factories that we have put out of business, as well as for the factories that we have kept in business."

There is a pretty situation. Competition! Prices brought down by the demand of the market! Why, it is nothing of the kind. The prices are managed at their pleasure and lifted upon any floating capital that they choose to lift them upon, because they are safe against the wages and competition and ingenuity of every foreign manufacturer.

Do you like that picture? Do you like being imposed upon by yourselves? Do you like this picture? That American efficiency has been going down in the scale instead of going up in the scale as it used to do in the old days, the old, handsomer days, when men had to flourish by their skill or the economy of their manufacturing process?

Why is it that, in spite of these things, there are certain classes of goods that the foreigner makes better than we do and makes so cheaply at the same time that he can bring them into our markets and undersell us? And why is it that our manufacturers, in respect to those goods that are in demand in foreign markets, can sell them at one-third less than they sell them in America? There are great manufacturing combinations in this country that make so much out of us that they can afford to give their surplus product away. They can afford to sell them for anything that they will fetch in a foreign market as against the competition of those whose competition is shut out of this country and doesn't assist us in bringing down the cost of living.

That is the real operation of the tariff. Have you noticed the terms of the last Republican platform with regard to the tariff? The cat is out of the bag there. It's the first time the whole thing has been stated frankly, and I congratulate the gentlemen who drew that platform for their frankness. They say that they will revise the tariff—the word "downward" wasn't used in that platform—they promised to revise the tariff upon the basis of the difference of the cost of production in this country, as compared with that of other countries with which we compete. But they didn't stop there. If they had, that would be the old fashioned doctrine of protection. No, they go on and they say, Plus a reasonable profit. And that's the cat out of the bag. They actually guarantee to the American manufacturer that, in spite of any economic basis that might be the reasonable reckoning of his advantage or disadvantage, they are going to see to it that he makes money out of his business. They are going to see to it that, whether his skill exceeds the skill of the foreigner or not, he is going to have a reasonable profit. Well, he has had a most unreasonable profit, and we have paid the bills. And we have gone about complacently saying that we are taking charge, we are taking care of the business of this country; whereas, the fact is that the business of this country has been taking care of us.

I wish everybody in America would read in the Congressional Record a debate which took place in the Senate of the United States on the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act.

The interesting thing about those debates is that Senators of the United States were unable to extract from the Finance Committee of the Senate any adequate explanation of the schedules of that tariff. And for a very good reason: that, if Mr. Aldrich had told the Senate of the United States of the private arrangements he had made with particular interests, they couldn't have passed the bill. Because you can't tell the Senate out loud without being overheard by the American people. And inasmuch as it is inadvisable to let the American people know the real basis of the schedules of that tariff, it is impossible that the Senate of the United States should be permitted to know them, because there are gentlemen in that chamber who will talk out of school.

I believe,—for I should not like to be unjust,—I believe the majority, a very considerable majority of the members of the Senate of the United States to be honorable and, with enlightenment, that they would represent the people of the states from which they come. But there is a minority which does not.

Remedies

These are the facts, of which we must take cognizance. Now, what is the remedy there? The remedy about the tariff is to study the tariff and find out really what it contains and the remedy concerning the Senate is popular election of senators. For, after all, the curative processes of our politics are the processes which come from the assertion of the mind and the will of the average rank and file of American citizens.

I have had a great deal to do, first and last, with men engaged in a large way of business in this country, and I have had a great deal to do with men of the rank and file, who were employees, who were carrying on the work of the day, without having command of the industry in any way; and I want to render this testimony: That the latter class of men understands America better than the first class.

I don't wonder at it. The man who is conducting the affairs of a great modern corporation is necessarily so absorbed in the business, every energy, every thought, is so engrossed in that great enterprise that he doesn't know what is going on in the rest of the business of the country or what is going on in the minds of the country at all.

Again and again in America we have witnessed this spectacle of men converted to things that they have fought as they would have fought ruin. You know that the State of Wisconsin was one of the first states to appoint a commission that had large and drastic powers of control over public service corporations, and you know that the famous Wisconsin public service act was fought by the railways in Wisconsin as if they were fighting for their lives. Well, what has been the result? I was talking the other day with a gentleman who occupied an extremely important place in the great railway systems that touch the State of Wisconsin, and he confessed himself absolutely converted to the policy of the Act. He said that it was the best thing that ever had happened for the railways that he was connected with. In other words, a railway man at the outset didn't know what the operation of an Act concerning the railways would be. He didn't understand modern economic circumstances or modern industry or modern common carriers well enough to see the actual relations of the railways to the communities which they were serving.

Now, that is the thing that we must insist upon. We must insist upon it that the men who are engaged in big business shall understand what big business means to the communities they are serving. I thank God there are a great many of them who are beginning to understand it. And when they begin to understand it, there will be a new era in this country, for you know just as well as I do, that the men who rise to the high places in these great corporations are, generally, men of no mean capacity; and if those men will once put their brains at the service of the states in which they are living, our difficulties will have passed away.

A stand-patter is a man who refuses to see. He is like Lord Nelson in one of the great battles, the Battle of Copenhagen, I believe. He was second in command. He was put in the most difficult part of the fight and the most perilous,—attacking the land battery. At a certain point of the fight his superior, Lord Vincent, thought that he was getting the worst of it and signaled him to draw off. His flag lieutenant said to him, "The Commander in Chief's signals are flying for us to draw off." Nelson took his glass, the single glass, and put it to his blind eye and said, "I am damned if I can see it."

Now, the stand-patter, under less handsome circumstances, shuts his eyes and says, "I hear you talking about all these things, but I am damned if I can see it." Very well. He will wake up; but in the meantime what we want to do is to make a very severe requirement of every community. Let us say, Here is a line. Let everybody who sees anything get on that side. Let everybody who can't see anything get on that side. And then, ignoring these incapacitated people, let us turn to the other crowd and say, Now, gentlemen, let us get down to business, for the time has come when we must get down to business and there is only one way to get down to business, and that is to get together. Let us make up our minds that we are not fighting anybody; that we are the friends of every class, but not as against any other class, and that the task awaiting us is a common understanding with regard to the common interest. Then, when we have agreed what the common interest requires,—not upon a great, ambitious program, for we are not wise enough to go that far, but item by item, as we see it,—then let us put our shoulders together and move forward with irresistible force to get that thing.

We have got a program. We have got a program sufficient to amuse us for a generation. Now, let us get our shoulders together and accomplish that program and so recover that prerogative of America, the prerogative of showing mankind the way to liberty. For it is not in a mere figurative sense that Americans have typified the westward movement in their politics, as well as in their material achievements. The characteristic of America is that she has been blazing trails from the time she left the Atlantic until the time she reached the Pacific.

We have reached a time of reconstruction. And unless we have equal independence of judgment, unless we have equal strength of will, unless we have equal genius of device, unless we can make institutions or remake them, we shall not be the stature of those who have gone before us; we shall have lost the heritage of America.

But we have not lost it. There is leaping to a thousand and a million minds of this country at this very time the purpose which kindled all the great enterprises of the period of the revolution; and I, for my part, thank God that I am permitted to live in an age which challenges the blood of men with red corpuscles in their veins, and I take happiness and I take pride to say to a great people, "You know your own duties. You know your own purposes. Come, let us serve one another and enter upon another day of achievement and of distinction."

Real Estate Mortgages

THE safest form of investment is a real estate mortgage on improved business or residence property in cities, provided it be selected with care and judgment. Such loans pay interest at the rate of six, seven or eight per cent, varying somewhat according to the amount loaned.

I make a specialty of securing such loans for my clients. My experience in building and knowledge of real estate values assure reliable appraisements and safe investments. I attend to drawing all papers, securing certificates of title, insurnce policies and the collection of interest without expense to the investor, the borrower paying all charges.

I will accept the care of large or small amounts and promptly invest the same in safe mortgages, forwarding to you the papers as soon as they are complete. Money can be sent to me by mail with instructions as to the term of the loan, or brought to me in person at my office, in which event it would be advisable to arrange an appointment by mail or telephone.

Tells of National Political Situation

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

Chester H. Rowell, editor of the Fresno Republican, has returned from a month's trip East, where he studied the political situation, particularly with respect to the nomination for the Presidency. Mr. Rowell had occasion to meet many of the leading public men in the East, who are interested in the recent revolution in California politics and in movements to bring about similar results elsewhere. He met Theodore Roosevelt in New York and had a long talk with President Taft at the White House. As "The Watchman" remarked last week:

"There is no question that Mr. Rowell informed the President as to things political in this State, without ifs or ands to qualify them—something he seriously needed. Among other things, it may be surmised, Mr. Rowell told the President that he could not make sure of keeping California in the Republican column by distributing political plums, share and share alike, with standpat Perkins and progressive Works, for the Republican party in California can no more endure half standpat and half progressive than the nation could have endured half slave and half free."

The results of Mr. Rowell's observations will be found elsewhere in this issue.

A Way Out

BOSS COX OF CINCINNATI is about to retire from political life that he may devote the rest of his days to business and to his own pleasure. That is, he is to retire again, the third and charmed time. He says so himself, not merely colloquially, but in black-faced type over his own signature. What has enabled him to retire with dignity, not to say eclat, is that one of his seventeen or eighteen judges of the common pleas of Hamilton county, Ohio, has found a way out for him from the toils of the law. They were much put to it to do it, but the deed was done. To be sure Cox perjured himself when he testified before the grand jury that he had not paid the treasurer of Cincinnati any money when he had, but then he had, in so testifying, set a trap for himself and gotten into it himself and caught a big rascal, a thing that no big rascal can lawfully do inasmuch as, by walking into a trap of his own setting, the big rascal invaded his own constitutional rights, all of which is abhorrent to the law. Under the law concerning big rascals constitutional rights cannot be invaded. They can only be evaded. With little rascals it is different, unless the little rascals are in the employ of big rascals, in which case it is different, too. It is seldom that any court cannot find a way out for a friend if that is what such court is looking for.

Dictation by the Executive

THE SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE trembles for the future of this republic unless its chief executives do refrain from having legislative policies and trying to put those policies through. Cold shivers and hot are equally fitting to the occasion. It is a tendency that should not be called upon to exist, but when a legislative body refuses to obey the behests of the popular will what is the general public to do except to appeal to the chief executive to force the legislative body to "get a wiggle" on it? Not one departure from traditional and historic procedures in legislation would be taken were it not that untoward and selfish interests have set the brakes, blocked the wheels and sidetracked the old machine. A nation, growing as this one is, cannot sit and do nothing. If one tool will not do the work required of it the nation must make some other tool do that tool's work. There is no other way. Therefore, until further notice, executive policies will be legislative as well as administrative. The bow-wows may get us if we go that way, but if we sit still and do nothing they are sure to.

Exhibit "A"

THE AFFIRMATION that Senator Works will neither traffic nor log-roll in the interests of protective tariffs for California industries, in part for the reason that that is not the way to do anyhow and partly for the further reason that such a policy makes more enemies to our industries than friends for them, constitutes a refreshing bit of statesmanship. All that California Congressmen need, in order to convince the American public of the justice of protection in California's case, is to introduce in evidence a map of the United States with the well known form of California clearly delineated thereon and mark it Exhibit "A." If the 2,000 miles of near-desert and mountain that intervenes between California's special products and the threshold of the nation's market for them, all of which have to be trucked over and across, do not constitute a convincing argument for a reasonably protective tariff on those commodities then is our contention untenable and our claim to protection unjust. Our representatives should have taken their stand on that map and should have been no party to any tariff scrimmage elsewhere. They would have been in an unassailable position and, sooner or later, must have convinced the country of that truth.

No Embargo on Resources

A DECISION of the Supreme Court of the United States, scarcely less important than that in the Standard Oil case, was the one annulling the Kansas statute which prohibited the piping of Kansas gas into Oklahoma. It affirmed that no state can impose an embargo upon the shipment of its resources, once they passed into private hands, into any other state. If the principle were generally applied it would not only restrain trade between the states, but might annul it. The contention of the court appears to be valid and—Why may not courts apply it to California counties that refuse franchises for the transmission of electric energy generated within their borders to other counties in the State?

Congressional Urbanities

THAT QUEER MAN, Congressman Kent of California, is a flockmaster and shears something like 30,000 sheep. He is conspiring with the Democratic members of Congress to have the tariff on wool, his wool. cut in half, whereat Representative Needham, on the Ways and Means Committee, alarmed at Mr. Kent's suicidal tendencies, out of that abundance of Congressional urbanity which so constantly characterizes him, flies to the rescue of Mr. Kent and his woolly thousands and insists that the tariff on wool must not be cut off, that Kent and his sheep really cannot stand it, that it would be the death of them, at least must the date of the fatal experiment be put off until the tariff board can hold an inquest, inquests being preferably held before the corpus delicti is defuncto than thereafter. The melee is inspiring, Kent trying to cut away half the protection from his own sheep and Needham striving to take the shears out of his hands or restrain his sanguinary arm.

Where We Are "At"

THE CALIFORNIA OUTLOOK has been tardy in commenting upon the Standard Oil decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Possibly it had been better if other periodicals, as well as many statesmen, had given themselves time to think things out before committing themselves to public declaration regarding it. Let us look at the subject as dispassionately as we may.

The acquisitive ambitions of the men of our day have outrun precedent, their greed for gain transcends all other interests. Nothing can stand before it. Those indomitable minds that, in other ages, would have entered upon world politics have, in our age, devoted themselves to world-industry, world-commerce and the exploitation, rather than the development, of the resources of continents. They would, if they could, cash in the earth and the fullness thereof, cut the "melon," divide it and die for want of anything else worth while to do. Getting, not begetting, is the master passion of our age.

These mighty men of greedy enterprise found that in union of their own kind there was not only strength but power, and love of power is the sum of all loves in the human heart, the thing for which the getting is pursued. The corporation, and especially the holding corporation, has proven an adequate instrument for union. It conserved power in two ways: by effecting economies in management and operation, and by equipping the newly created artificial giant with irresistible instruments for wholesale extortion practiced at the cost of the consuming mass. The second of these purposes is immeasurably the more consequential to the "interests."

The American people grew restless under the domination of this new giant of industrial combination, which could in no wise content itself to live and let live, but must conquer or crush whoever stood in its way. To curb this giant the American congress enacted what is commonly known as the Sherman anti-trust law. Its purpose was obvious, and yet, since the judiciary of this country undertook to find out what the statute does not mean babes have been born and grown to manhood and womanhood. The problem has only partially been worked out by this decision, but in so far as it has been worked out it has reached this sedate, this august, this profound, this subtle, irrevocable conclusion: Combinations of corporations may be effected of any conceivable size so long as their purpose can be shown to be merely to intensify efficiency and to promote economy of administration and production; but if the purpose be to extort, to exploit, to monopolize, to plunder, then, and in that case, in order to fetch those activities under the protection of the law, the subordinated and affiliated corporations must surrender their separate existences and merge themselves into a single, gigantic owning and operating corporation, holding the properties directly and conducting the business as a single, unified personality with all the rights that any person has. It is as if, in order to become an all conquering nation, the people of the United States should resolve to surrender their state or-

[illegible]izations and merge themselves directly into the general government.

That is where we are "at" as a result of two decades of judicial tinkering with a statute that any newspaper reader would unerringly comprehend! Much learning hath made our jurists mad.

Therefore the way has been opened for the formation of corporations as much bigger than the United States Steel corporation now is as the Lusitania is bigger than the old Eastern, so big in its day that not until a cable ship was wanted could any use be found for it, and mere bigness is a problem that not even the most advanced guard of progressive statesmanship has dared to attack. The Standard Oil Company, over whose dissolution there was so much ill-advised rejoicing, will emerge from its victorious conflict with our national government, not a confederacy of nineteen subsidiary companies, but as a single giant personality owning all that all the subsidiary corporations own and with stock-issuing facilities sufficient for more than doubling its present investment, perhaps big enough to own all the oil-bearing territory as well as all pipe lines, railroads and tank ships needful for developing and marketing, at its own price and in its own good time, the entire oleaginous wealth of the nation.

The nation laughed, a score of years ago, at the sad bull an Irishman perpetrated when he declared himself in favor of repealing the law of supply and demand. We have seen that law repealed in a hundred instances. We have been assured by savants that competition is a fundamental law of our being, that it lies at the foundation of all human progress, that without competition enterprise stagnates and dry rot attacks and disintegrates the fibre and eats out the heart of mankind. Our modern giants of acquisitive greed have had the hardihood to lay siege to the law of competition with intent to overthrow and annul it, and the working out of that conflict seems likely to possess the stage of action during the remainder of the twentieth century.

A. J. P.

Mr. Taft's Opportunity

IF MR. TAFT chooses to run again for President on the Republican ticket, it is reasonably certain that he can do so. This will not be, however, because he is the choice of a majority or even a large minority of the rank and file of the party membership. Nomination does not come, unfortunately, by any form of direct vote but by a majority of delegates of a national convention. Under the present apportionment, states that are regularly and safely in the Democratic column cast over one-third of the total. These votes go to the incumbent by a sort of automatic process without any work and without any merit on his part, simply because he is known to the delegates as the dispenser of the patronage. This leaves a gap of only 125 votes to fill, which New York and Pennsylvania, both absolutely under the control of reactionary machines, can just about fill in.

Of course that is not all of it. There are other states where the machine is still in the saddle, and there are states of the bandwagon variety, that will be for the man with the best prospect of winning, whoever he is, and in this case it evidently will be Taft.

Thus the nomination is apparently within his grasp; and yet it will be the culminating mistake of a career that of late has been largely made up of mistakes, if he takes the honor. If he is wise he will retire from the contest now, before the real campaign has begun.

If his nomination depended on the doubtful states, on the states he must win in order to be elected, it would never be made. Even New York, which will give him her convention vote, is very likely to go Democratic. As for states like Maine, New Hampshire and Massachusetts in New England, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa and Minnesota in the Middle West, Kansas and Nebraska, California, Oregon and Washington in the West, each and all of which he must have to win, what certainty has he on any of them? Through more than half of that list—not to mention other doubtful ones—the chances would be all in favor of any good Democrat against Mr. Taft.

Those who are urging Taft's nomination are not unconscious of this. They know perfectly well that as the case stands he could not be elected. Their whole case is predicated on the theory that the Democrats will make some wild break that will put them out of favor with the public.

In warfare and politics we always allow a slight margin for the other fellow's mistake, but no commander of sense and experience expects to win on that alone.

When Mr. Taft took the presidency the Republican party had been put in an almost impregnable position by Mr. Roosevelt. Beneath the surface there were two sides or factions in the party—as there often are in parties. One of these was the right side, the side of progress and of human rights, the side of Theodore Roosevelt. The other was the wrong side, the side of reaction and property rights, led by Aldrich and Cannon. Deliberately, with every appearance of knowing what he was about, the new President chose the wrong instead of the right, and supported it blindly, persistently and with an angry, uncompromising spirit. That continued for eighteen months; and then when the people rose and defeated his faction in the party, and, where the machine was too strong for that, defeated the party itself, and inflicted upon him the severest and most pointed rebuke administered since the days of Andrew Johnson, then he adopted a policy even more ignoble, that of attempting to please first one side and then the other.

By this wrong-headed and wabbling course, topped off by a series of incredible blunders of speech and letter, he has managed to reduce the Republican party to a state of almost hopeless internal anarchy, and if he stays with the process long enough, it will be ground to powder and blown to the four winds of heaven. Nobody knows any longer what its policy is or is going to be. No one can name its leaders without vehement protest from one side or the other. Even Ex-President Roosevelt, whose party and official career might seem to give him standing, is furiously repudiated by all the reactionary captains that are urging the Taft nomination. A handsome state of affairs, forsooth, that must give pride to the one most responsible for its existence!

In spite of this sad record of blunder and wrong affiliation, we can still credit Mr. Taft with a large volume of good intentions. Little or nothing can be offered in his defense as a party leader, but as a President he has done some notably good things. Let him now do one more. None of our presidents ever had a greater opportunity to retrieve all past error and gain forgiveness and general amity by a single stroke. Let him announce that he will not be a candidate for re-election, and give the Republican party a fighting chance for its life.

C. D. W.

A Political State

"FOR THE PEOPLE THAT LIKE THAT SORT OF THING," said Lincoln, "why that's just the sort of thing they would like." This ring-around and dovetail form of speech seems admirably to describe the Legislative scandal of Ohio and its relation to the people of that State.

There is no reason at all why we should square off with uplifted hands and exclaim "oh" and "ah" and "What do you think of that!" over the revelations at Columbus. To the man who knows anything about politics in general and Ohio politics in particular, there is only one style of remark that fits the situation, and that is: "Of course," "To be sure," and "Well, what did you expect?"

Ohio shares with Indiana the distinction of being about the most political State in the Union. Abe Martin says about Indiana that nobody in that State ever quits doing politics until his wife "won't sign anything more."

During the long period when their local elections preceded by a few weeks the national elections, these States got the political habit. Now, under the new system advocated, or fomented, by us reformers, faddists and cranks, wherein politics means the welfare of the people, irrespective of party, the political habit is commendable in the citizen; but under the old scheme of things, which still prevails in Ohio, politics means merely the winning of partisan advantage for this or that Grand Old Whatyoumaycallit, the people to take their chances on what is left over after the fight. Wisconsin is the best example of the new system, with Iowa and California close seconds. Pennsylvania on the other hand, represents the ashes of politics. It is a conquered satrapy where order reigns as at Warsaw—a veritable moon of the political firmament, burnt out, fireless and waterless, degenerate and horrible. "Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant," says Tacitus. "They make a desert and they call it peace"; which we may paraphrase: Special interest triumphs and gives us a civic ruin.

But to return to our muttons, or human sheep, of Ohio. Recalling the days of Chase and Giddings and Corwin and of Oberlin and the slave hunts, we are minded that there was an Ohio once that would, as Cassius puts it,

"Have brooked
The eternal devil to keep his state" in their house of law-making, as easily as the collection of cheap crooks they now maintain there. In the decade before the civil war, Ohio was the Wisconsin of the West, and Chase was the La Follette that led its people out from the bondage of a time-serving Democracy into the new party that stood for the principle of human freedom. But the old leaders passed, and in their place came Hanna and Foraker and Dick and Cox. The Democrats have reformed, but even now their chief in the State is the reactionary Harmon. Politics to the people of Ohio no longer spells principle and patriotism. It is partisanship, pure and simple—no, let us say, corrupt and sophisticated. The only moral issue showing above the horizon is the prohibition of the liquor traffic, which cuts a cross section through both parties and creates a momentary diversion of no political significance.

What does it really matter to a people still under the obsession of partisanship how much graft flows annually through the halls of legislation? To be sure, they may express surprise and horror, but how sincere is it? What we really want, say the fellows on top, the fellows that run things, is prosperity, good business, a chance to make money, a chance for us to make money. For that we must have protection, high tariff and other forms of privilege. To get our share in the divide-up we must stand in with the existing order of things, the system. The visible exponent of the system is the party, both parties. None of these fads of direct legislation, direct primaries, the recall and all that, for us. Graft is bad but it is a thousand times better than the smash-up that might follow any effort at change. So, on with the machine! Let crooks be unconfined!

But underneath the surface, not among the leaders, but in the people themselves, there is everywhere, even in Ohio, the spirit of political progress, the sentiment of a patriotism that knows no party. And in time it will triumph, even in Ohio. Yes, for that matter even in Pennsylvania.

The Woman's Campaign

IN SOMETHING OVER four months the men folk of California will take a vote as to whether they are willing to allow the women folk to help in the political and civic duties of the citizen. In the meantime, there will be a campaign carried on for and against the votes-for-women idea, and in this campaign women will themselves play a large part. While men will assist to some extent, the real work of carrying the amendment will fall on those who are regarded as its most direct beneficiaries.

This is as it should be. Booker Washington tells the black people that liberty is a conquest, not a heritage. If woman is to win the right to vote, she must earn it by work. The work she is called upon to do serves the double purpose of proving her fitness for the voting privilege and of qualifying her the better for its exercise.

The problem before these campaigners is two-fold: first to convince a majority of the women of the State that they desire the ballot, and second to convince a majority of the men that they should have it. When the amendment was under debate in the Legislature, it was several times suggested that a vote of the women on this issue should precede that of the men. This paper in fact advocated that plan. But the campaign itself will automatically produce the exact effect of such a vote. If a majority of the women of this State are opposed to the amendment, it cannot possibly carry. Every man, whether married or single, meets and knows and is more or less influenced in his life by a group of women. If he finds these women favor suffrage to a marked degree, he is likely to vote for it, but by no means certain. If he finds them opposed, he is sure to vote against it. Thus by a process of mathematical reasoning we get the law: that not only a majority but a very considerable majority of favorable votes—or opinions—are needed from the women before the favorable vote of the men can be secured.

Suppose that for the purposes of this consideration we divide the women of this State roughly and impolitely into four classes: first the parasites or "society" women, second the club women, third the plain home women, and fourth the working women. Now, now, ladies, do not get excited. We recognize, of course, that club women are just as devoted to their homes as any, and that home women work just as hard as working women, and that not all women who are prominent in what the newspapers call society are parasites. We admit the classification is rough, that these classes overlap and shade out at the edges; but it will serve our purposes. The distinction between the second and third class is between women who have read and studied and mingled with the world outside the home enough to have independent ways of thought and action, and the women whose sole interest in life is husband and children and housekeeping.

The woman of the parasite class, who lives at a "swell" hotel and parades her gorgeous raiment and hideous hats, her jewelry and the care that makes her so agreeable to the eye of the male, the woman who earns her living, let us say, by the mere fact of her being a woman, is not likely to favor the suffrage idea—or any other idea for that matter. The less thinking and the more pretty posing she does the better she pleases Mr. Goodthing Man, and you had better believe she knows it. Her gray matter extends just that far. The club woman is for suffrage by a unanimous majority. She and the parasite just about offset each other for numbers, but with this material distinction: that the club woman is a thoroughbred organizer. She is the drill master and commanding spirit that will take charge of this campaign and, in our judgment, will win it.

The working women will be for suffrage, partly because they think it will help their class, and partly because they, like the club members, have learned to think, and to forget the fact that they are nothing but women. While their social and personal influence may be small, as they are for the most part young and unmarried, their adherence has great political possibilities for it is likely to bring the vote of the union labor people and the hand-workers generally.

But after all the casting vote lies with the home women who probably outnumber all other classes put together. If it be true, as the anti-suffragists assert, that on the morning of October 10th, the majority of the wives and mothers of the State will say to their husbands and sons, "We do not wish to be burdened with the duty of the ballot," there is not the slightest chance that it will carry.

There is no way to know, until the vote itself reveals it, how these women stand on this issue. But here is the quarter where the work must be done. The fact that the churches and the W. C. T. U. throw their influence for suffrage will count strongly in its favor, and good precinct organization will do the rest. All that is needed is that these women should understand. But that means a world of hard work.

Senatorial Cloture

RENEWED EFFORTS are making to induce the United States Senate to adopt some rule for shutting off debate, when clearly dilatory in intent, that business may be transacted upon the responsibility of the majority for whatever is done. That would be in the line of progress unless the medicine now sought to be given to the House of Lords in England be applied to our house of magnates in America, which is to cut off their veto power on legislation by the Commons and then let the old duffers talk as long as any of them can stomach it to listen to the "ozzers."

Derision

COLONEL ROOSEVELT has declared that, "Among private individuals, the man who, if his wife has her face slapped, will go to law about it instead of forthwith punishing the offender, would be regarded with derision." No doubt of it, but how would society regard the outraged husband if, in undertaking to administer the punishment, he found himself knocked down, dragged out and scattered around where the automobiles might frolic over his remains? There are instances in which the injured must either go to law, forgive or do murder.

Another Loop Hole Stopped Up

THE SUPREME COURT of the United States lately decided that the fact that the production in court of the books of a corporation would tend to incriminate an official of that corporation, cannot be pleaded in defense of contempt of court for not producing the books. Good decision! Gradually corporation corruptionists are getting rounded up whether the ropes are ever gotten on them or not.

The Downfall of Assessor Dalton The sensation of the week in the Bay district of California was the arrest and indictment of Assessor Henry P. Dalton on a charge of soliciting and accepting a bribe from the Spring Valley Water Company. The story is that Dalton approached Secretary Behan of that corporation and agreed, for a consideration of $25,000, of which $5,000 was to be paid in hand, $7,500 in July and the remainder after the equalization of the assessment roll, to reduce the assessment of that corporation $2,500,000 on its holdings in Alameda County. This he could do with some show of right inasmuch as those holdings owe a great part of their value to the riparian rights which they possess, the lands and cachment areas, apart from such rights, being very much less valuable. The proposal was communicated to District Attorney W. H. Donahue and the district attorney, working in conjunction with Secretary Behan and Vice-President Eastman of the Spring Valley, laid plans for trapping Dalton. The plans worked to a charm. The $5,000 was paid to Dalton in a rear room in an Oakland restaurant from which Dalton walked into the arms of the District Attorney and detectives, was arrested on Broadway in Oakland, was at once searched and the money, in bills whose numbers had previously been taken and confidentially marked, were found on his person.

"Political Plot" Declares Dalton Mr. Dalton asks his friends (and no man in Oakland has more of them), to suspend judgment until his case is heard in court. They will wish to do this but there are limits beyond which human judgment cannot be held in suspense. The only hope his warmest friends can entertain for him is that by some miracle, by some explanation at once perfectly simple and yet completely obscure to the uninitiated, he may be able to clear himself, but as the case stands, with evidence in on only one side, there seems no room for a doubt that can be regarded as possessing any element of reasonableness.

"A political plot" is the only explanation Dalton has thus far vouchsafed. It may be. His political downfall has long been desired, but if it be a plot it seems to have worked out admirably. If it be true that a trap was set for him with malicious design, at least the conspiracy had the merit of catching what it went after.

For, to doubt the verity of the whole allegation, we must assume that the officials of the Spring Valley Water Company conspired with the District Attorney to fabricate a story made out of whole cloth, that there was no money passed from Eastman to Dalton, that the whole thing was a pantomime and slight of hand performance, that the detective who purported to take a roll of bills from Dalton's pocket in fact took it from up his own sleeve. Two facts, at least, make any such contention preposterous. One is the known probity of character of District Attorney Donahue and the other the sterling uprightness of Warren Olney, Jr., one of the attorneys for Spring Valley. Neither of these men knowingly could be party to any conspiracy to inflict an injury and neither of them is of such plastic material as to be unknowingly used to any such end. No, Dalton got the money, he got it from Eastman, it was found on him. It would seem that the only possible plea for Dalton to make, except a plea of guilty, is that the money was a friendly loan, made without security of any sort, in a most unnatural way, in a most unnatural place to make such a loan, and that story will not go down the throats of any jury not biased and will satisfy neither Dalton's friends nor the public. It would puzzle Conan Doyle to get his hero out of such a predicament as Dalton is in and it will puzzle Dalton and his attorneys. If the judgment of any man is suspended that judgment is hair hung and breeze shaken. Dalton is in a tight box.

Career of Dalton Henry P. Dalton is no ordinary man. He is upstanding, courageous, clear-headed, kindly, generous to a fault and a good fighter. For seventeen years he has been assessor of Alameda county and had been elected for four more. He had played a political lone hand rather than otherwise, his popularity among the common people making it possible for him to do so, and yet he had trained mainly with the better element. Not exactly with the out-and-out reformers, and yet not with the court house crowd of dubious reputation. His hold upon his following was strong and it was not a following that a downright political push is made of; it did not consist mainly in saloon and tenderloin votes. A splendid hand to hand mixer, spending money freely and serving his supporters good turns when he could, Dalton gained public confidence during the first years of his official life through resolutely forcing corporations and large property owners to stand assessments of their property much as other property of similar character was assessed, and the fact that all the big interests were against him disposed the common people to be favorable to him and to believe in him.

And yet he has at all times been a questionable man. He has nearly always been involved in litigation relative to fees or perquisites of his office. He won his contentions sometimes and sometimes lost them and was forced to make restitution to the county treasury. For some years he has been more at peace with the big interests, whether because they had learned to submit to the inevitable, or whether he had himself become more tractable to them, has been subject for conjecture. He has been quite generally doubted and yet again and again elected, not however without putting forth his greatest strength and spending money copiously.

Current report has it that he attributed his need for money to the fact that the last legislature reduced the income of his office from $25,000 a year to $7,000 and he felt that he had a right to get even with the people if he could. It is not difficult for most of us to make it seem right for us to do the thing that we want to do and that process of reasoning may have been the immediate cause of the downfall of Dalton, if he fell, but men do not often so fall for a first time after they have passed the meridian of life and Dalton did not. If he fell this time it was because he had stumbled similarly before. What if he should throw himself upon the mercy of the court and tell all? It might precipitate another earthquake!

"Gwan Away" Portland Oregonian

Attorney Donahue Here is a man who has made good when not all expected that he would. He has, throughout his political career, trained with the "organization" crowd and what political preferment came to him came from that source, and yet he has so grown in favor by his uprightness in office and fearlessness of character that even reformers who have fought the old organization to a standstill have not fought Donahue. The race-track men were not able to influence him and the prize-fight men were not able to pull him down. Upon every occasion where duty and courage were demanded of him he has made good. If he lives more will be heard of him.

Oakland's Bonds Voted Before passing from Oakland affairs to others it may be well to note that, after the Socialist-courthouse combination was defeated in the city elections, the pending improvement bonds were promptly carried, whereas, in Berkeley, after the Socialist-Old Guard combination carried the city election the pending improvement bonds, almost precisely similar in character to those of Oakland and as urgently needed, were as promptly voted down, every single proposition of them. The contrasted coincidencies do a tale unfold.

Woodrow Wilson The impression left by Governor Woodrow Wilson in the Bay district of California was extremely favorable. The people took to him. At the banquet tendered him in San Francisco he blurted out plain truths that hit some folks hard, but they took it with what grace they could. Had he visited San Francisco at the time the President visited it, and as president, with the city in the throes of a struggle against successful rascality, he would have said the word that was needed to be said to lend encouragement to the right and would not have gone his way, as President Taft did go, without "letting on" that he knew what was going on. Woodrow Wilson dares.

His Phi Beta Kappa address at the University, with the Greek theatre well filled, had for its theme "corporations" and it made a telling hit. And all the while they were listening to what he said, hundreds of men were there primarily to size the man up, take his dimensions and to sound him to see if there be any dead timber in him. They went to find, if happily they might, if he be the man the country is looking for to lead the hosts of progress. It is not too much to say that they went away reassured if not exactly boiling with enthusiasm. They said in their hearts, "He'll do." A scholar and yet a doer, "wise to know and bold to perform," not impetuous like Roosevelt, not seeking a sheltered nook for a siesta like Taft; reserved, self-mastered, taking things as they come without being upset or even jarred by them, Woodrow Wilson has made the utmost of the material there is in him out of which to form a statesman. But is he great?

Is He Great? Woodrow Wilson, as a presidential possibility, merits all the dissection and analysis that can be applied to him. Manifestly, he has the sympathies and sentiments of a Bryan or a Roosevelt with a far profounder knowledge than Bryan ever possessed and, probably, a more discriminating scholarship than that of Roosevelt. Bryan's limitation always has been that he does not know very much, having the general information of a news gatherer rather than the exact knowledge of a trained investigator. Roosevelt's one drawback was the fear that has ever haunted the public mind that, some time, perhaps at some supremely crucial moment, his impetuosity may cause him to do that which he would not have done in a season of tranquil sobriety and, perhaps, something that cannot be undone. It is a fear akin to that which haunts Europe relative to the Kaiser and nothing that either Kaiser or Roosevelt can do can wholly remove that fear from the public mind. Woodrow Wilson will not suffer from that limitation. A conservative progressive, he will be more like Lincoln, able to contain himself and pursue his even tenor to his goal, content to be, as Lincoln was most of the time, about three weeks behind the advance guard of reform but carrying the main body along with him. The Great Republic needs its greatest men in its greatest office. Is Woodrow Wilson great? Frankly, he did not so impress The Watchman. Roosevelt impressed him as being an irresistible human force, Taft as a great judge, Bryan as a personification of enthusiasm, Woodrow Wilson as an exceptional man, fine in quality, cultivated and self-trained to the last degree, but neither an irresistible force, a personified enthusiast nor profoundly judicial minded. He would make a safe president, but can he rally all the progressives from all parties to his standard, complete the work of political "identification" as he calls it? It may be doubted. Roosevelt, if he were free from the third term incubus, could do it, but he is not free from that incubus and nothing can free him from it. Look we for another?

Where Wilson Was Wrong In his address upon corporations Governor Wilson was perfectly intelligible if not always perfectly convincing. He took the broad ground that corporations are our own creations, that they are all public and not private and that the public has an unalienable right to know what they do and who conducts them; that the men who conduct them are the ones to hold responsible for how they are conducted. In other words, the corporation officials and not the stockholders are the responsible parties. He likened a corporation to an automobile that runs some person down. It would be unintelligent to smash the automobile, and it would be to destroy the corporation. The owner (stockholders) is not the person to arrest and punish, but the chauffeur who sits at the wheel, he is the fellow. So with the corporate officer who orders an unlawful act, he should be put into the penitentiary and if he be only a dummy officer, put him in anyhow. It will discourage the pernicious habit of being dummy officials of corporations.

Dr. Wilson was right and also wrong. The chauffeur needs punishment, but so also does the automobile owner who concerns himself with nothing the chauffeur does so he "gets there." That is the attitude of the stockholder in a corporation. He demands certain results in the shape of dividends and asks not how they are produced so they are produced, a species of absentee landlordism. It is this that makes corporations soulless. The corporate stockholder, at best, occupies a relation toward his corporation commensurate with that which the qualified elector bears to the government of his state or city. He has a duty to perform. It is his business to see to it, so far as he may, that only law-abiding officials are elected. He has no right to accept results regardless of how they are obtained, and a good, stiff mulct upon a law-defying corporation, added to a prison term for the lawless official, will doubly insure the public against extortion and rebating, against buying special privilege and against unlawful exploitation by corporations. Governor Wilson was wrong in his plea for the exemption of stockholders in corporations from responsibility, and his being in the wrong brings his statesmanship into some question. Let us apply both remedies. They will not prove too effectual.

La Follette and Hearst About the most preposterous canard yet sent out from awayback is the one that Senator La Follette and William Randolph Hearst have entered into offensive and defensive relations. Some enemy of La Follette's hath done this. Mr. Hearst has boxed the compass of political absurdities and his influence, either in national affairs or local, is so nearly negligible as to be reckoned as a liability rather than an asset and Senator La Follette is too acute a man to load himself with that incubus. Mr. Hearst evaporated with the doodle-dees.

Mr. Bryan's Tariff Views Mr. Bryan's title to a dyed-in-the-wool democracy has been further legitimatized in his Commoner by the declaration that, "Protection is protection, no matter whether it is asked for the benefit of manufacturers or for the benefit of farmers, and any man who believes in protection is worse than worthless as a tariff reformer," Mr. Bryan's inability to learn anything, or to forget anything he once learned, whether so or not so, enables all to read his title clear to mansions among bourbons. The tariff reformer who does not believe in protection, "all the protection that is needed but not a dollar for monopoly," will prove worse than useless as a tariff reformer. He cannot, though he have the eloquence of a Bryan, command a hearing from any living soul conscious of being answerable for how he spends his time. The questions before tariff reformers who can reform are: "What needs protection?" "Will it do any ultimate good to protect it?" "How much?" To the man who knows something of these issues the American people will listen, but not to academic discussions of protection vs. free trade, or even tariff for revenue only. That issue has gone to keep company with, "fire or water, which hath the greater damage done?"

Governor Wilson's Joke on the Artful Reactionaries

"Those jolly reactionaries who tried to kidnap Governor Wilson of New Jersey and hold him incommunicado, so that the progressives of California could not get near him, found a very lively prisoner on their hands at the dinner last night when the guest of the evening, with great good humor, figuratively booted his captors around the room," says the San Francisco Bulletin. "It was a highly comical finish to an amusing episode.

"Woodrow Wilson is one of the most advanced progressives in the country. His admirers hereabouts were amazed, therefore, when they discovered that the Yale, Harvard and Princeton clubs had appointed to entertain him a committee composed of the most extreme reactionaries in this community. The seat-cards were sent out in stamped envelopes of the United Railroads, whose manager, Mr. Black, was the chairman of the committee. Mr. McEnerney, chief counsel for Patrick Calhoun, was the toastmaster, and William H. Crocker, the banker, was one of the speakers. Theodore Bell . . was also on the list of speakers, but there was no speaker to represent the progressive Democrats, and Hiram W. Johnson, the progressive Republican Governor of California, was not invited to make an address at the dinner. In short, artful was the word, and the reactionaries who thought they had lassoed Governor Wilson chuckled mightily.

"Standing on the outside, the progressives of both parties were forced to console themselves with satirical reflections on the spectacle of a group of conspicuous reactionaries basking in the presence of one of the foremost progressives. They did not find fault with Governor Wilson, for they were aware that he did not know the sheep from the goats in California; but they wondered why the reactionaries, if they are sincere, should take delight in honoring a man whose political principles they profess to abhor and whose political actions they denounce as unconstitutional, un-American and destructive of the sacred rights of property.

"But the progressives on the outside of the banquet hall, with their noses flattened against the panes, got a treat more comforting than food and drink. Perceiving the peculiar situation into which he had been decoyed by his old college friends, Governor Wilson discarded the speech which he had intended to make, advance copies of which had been given to the Associated Press, and addressed a few direct remarks to his hosts. He denounced the wealthy reactionaries and the special interests who coerced men in public life by threatening them with a financial boycott and social ostracism. He spoke of the banker who withdraws accommodations from a customer as a punishment for not being sufficiently servile to the special interests. In short, Governor Wilson raked his friends, the enemy, fore and aft; and when they applauded, as they did, he pointed the application by saying:

"'But it is a hopeful sign that I can say such things even in the company of men who do such things and not only not be put out of the room, but receive generous applause.'

"Governor Wilson did not mention William H. Crocker in his remarks, but that banker, who followed Wilson on the list of speakers, deemed it necessary to commence by pleading not guilty. The plea provoked a general laugh; but Mr. Crocker did not explain why he had put on the cap if it did not fit him.

"The whole affair was good-humored, but Governor Wilson, without taking the matter too seriously, performed a public service in preventing his reactionary friends from getting the best of the situation. Those clever gentlemen who had planned to use Governor Wilson as a bit of stage property in a reactionary exhibition were compelled, instead, to pay for the promulgation of sound progressive doctrine. No wonder the town is in a broad grin."

The National Political Situation

CHESTER H. ROWELL

In the Fresno Republican

The political situation is everywhere in a state of absolute confusion. I only hope it is like the new wine, which is most turbid just before it begins to clarify. Democrats and Republicans, Progressives and Standpatters, are as yet without either a definite plan, or any means of agreeing on one.

Most Republicans presume that Woodrow Wilson will be the Democratic nominee and agree that he would be a very formidable one. He is a very brilliant, very magnetic, very popular man, and has espoused as much of the Progressive cause as a traditional Democrat can without breaking with his party. Personally, he would doubtless prefer a new party alignment, and if such an alignment were possible he would be a formidable candidate for the Progressive nomination. But Republican blunders last fall gave the Democratic party a temporary and factitious strength which prevents new alignment, and Republicans are assuming that the Democrats will have intelligence enough to take advantage of this situation and, by nominating Wilson, take to themselves at least part of the Progressive strength.

But characteristically enough, the Democrats do not see the opening so clearly, and it is by no means a certainty that Wilson can be nominated. Champ Clark started out to conduct himself in the House with an intelligence which nobody thinks him capable of originating, and there is one fairly accredited rumor that Bryan was the brain behind the chair. Others attribute the brains to Chairman Underwood of the Committee on Ways and Means. At any rate, there is a real Champ Clark movement, and the Bryanites, if not Bryan, are active in it.

Harmon Boom

The Harmon boom has also gone much further than Western impression would credit. Harmon is beating no tom-toms, but he has men out on a still-hunt, working in a way that hespeaks organization and money. This is the way to get delegates, if experience counts for anything. It is to be remembered that there is no direct primary for president, and that it takes two-thirds to nominate in a Democratic convention, so the old game still goes. There is also a well-organized movement in New Jersey to deprive Wilson of the delegation from his own state. The people of New Jersey are of course for Wilson, but these politicians do not reckon with the people, and perhaps, for purposes of putting up delegations, it is not necessary for them to do so. * *

No man can be President alone. He must have a cabinet and a Congress behind him. Wilson, as a Democrat, would have to choose his cabinet from such material as past Democratic currents have brought to the surface, and he would have to reckon with a Congress dominated by traditional Southern Democrats. He is himself a Democrat in the old pre-Bryan sense—a states' rights man, a strict constitutionalist, and an individualist. * * *

No party bound to individualism and states' rights can be anything but helpless in the face of modern problems. * * * Moreover, no distinctly Democratic administration can avoid reopening the tariff question on the old lines, with resultant financial disaster, and the inevitable reaction to some advance agent of prosperity of the McKinley type and the obscuration of the newer issues.

But with all this hopelessness of tangible achievement, a Wilson administration might be just popular enough to prevent for some time any more hopeful outlet for the progressive movement. Wilson would be liked personally, and he would preach well. * * *

Republican Situation

On the Republican side, the present tendency is to split into two camps, with President Taft unsafely in the middle. It is easily possible that the final result may be Taft's renomination by default without opposition, but the present feeling on both sides is one of fear that he could not be elected if nominated.

The "old guard" has definitely broken with the President—a rupture in which, regardless of consequences, he must take a great deal of personal satisfaction. President Taft never did deserve to be ranked with that bunch, and it is to his credit, whether it is to his benefit or not, that they have gone off the reservation. Barnes in New York has started what he pretends is a Sherman boom, and seems to have got Vice President Sherman to take it seriously. Of course nobody else takes the Sherman part of it seriously, but the movement itself, whoever its final candidate, is serious enough.

The fight over the chairmanship of the New York county committee was really a Taft-Sherman fight, in which Taft won. When Lloyd Griscom, a Roosevelt man resigned, the comparatively progressive element—progressive as things go in New York—was for Koenig, a Taft man, while Barnes insisted on an anti-Taft man of the Sherman old guard. Besides being a Progressive (up to the Taft mark) Koenig is a Jew, and is counted on to hold the East Side vote. Wherein the New York politician shows his ignorance of his own people. Your typical East Side Jewish leader is no mild Progressive. He is a radical. He reads the New York American and the Yiddish Vorwaerts. But the leaders try out public sentiment by talking among their own business class, and they concluded that Roosevelt and Griscom were too strong a diet for New York. They got Taft and Koenig, and now Barnes is conspiring to dead-lock the state for a trading delegation ostensibly for Sherman.

Reaction Spreads

This same reactionary movement has spread to at least two other states—Pennsylvania and Illinois. "Uncle Joe" Cannon is so angry at President Taft that he will not speak to him, and he has joined the Lorimer forces to deliver Illinois to whatever scheme Sherman is the present dummy for. Penrose is working the same game in Pennsylvania. How far it has spread to other states I had no means of learning.

At the other end are the out-and-out Insurgents. Among these, everywhere except in Congress, there is an increasing degree of personal confidence in President Taft, but apparently no confidence in his sagacity as a political leader. Everywhere except in Congress the Insurgents are for Canadian reciprocity, and for the arbitration treaty with England. * * *

In one respect, however, the President is demonstrating the sincerity of his logic. When Congress was in control of the reactionaries, he dealt with them, without being a reactionary. Now that it is in control of Democrats, he deals with them without being a Democrat. His policies are his own, and these elements are merely the channels through which they must go. His most important recent appointments—the two to his cabinet—have been pronounced progressives. If this whole mix-up were merely an internal quarrel, Taft would be the ideal pacificator. His weakness is in not seeing that it goes deeper. But he may nevertheless succeed in patching up at least a superficial peace, though personally I doubt it.

La Follette Campaign

In Congress the Insurgents are positively anti-Taft, and the question whom they shall choose for Progressive candidate is rapidly crystallizing around Senator La Follette. The practical campaign for La Follette delegates is not yet organized, though the time is fast approaching when, if ever, it must be. But the La Follette boom, among the people in the more radical states, is already moving of its own force. In the East, I found a more general preference, among Progressives, for Roosevelt, if by any means he could be induced to accept the nomination.

LaFollette himself has grown immensely since I first knew him as a "freshman" in Congress, some twenty-five years ago. His leadership is not one of spectacular radicalism, but of sound statesmanship, genuine accomplishments and real ability. Speaking of him in the Outlook office, one day, Sydney Brooke gave him the highest compliment I ever heard a pessimistic Englishman give any American. He said: "I regard LaFollette as the author of the only real contribution which the American republic has made to the science of government in the world—his method of state regulation of corporations." Roosevelt, too, who was once skeptical of LaFollette's radicalism, has come to trust and admire him. The conservative way in which the people of Wisconsin, under La Follette's leadership, have used their radical political powers, was a revelation to Colonel Roosevelt, and he does not hesitate to say so.

Unquestionably the present tendency is for the Progressive movement to crystallize about LaFollette. But the movement lacks national organization. It is organized in many states and victorious in some, but these state organizations have no central national organization, and are therefore tempted, each for itself, to make the state fight paramount. The National Progressive League is doing good propaganda work for progressive legislative policies, but it has so far adhered to its announced intention to keep out of practical politics. Either it must alter that policy or there must be another organization avowedly political.

Convention Forecast.

Who the next Republican nominee is to be, no prophet can more than guess. But let me guess that there will be on the first ballot of the next convention a middle-of-the-road plurality for Taft, bulwarked on the Southern delegations, a large minority from the progressive states (including California) for La Follette, and another minority of trading delegations from the old guard organizations. Then the nomination will be determined in convention, by whatever will break that deadlock.

The disturbing element in all calculations is the vote of the Southern delegations, who represent states where there is no Republican party and from which there is no possibility of a Republican electoral vote. One-third of the Republican convention thus represents nothing but Federal patronage. Any postmaster-general can deliver the whole South if he wishes—and Frank Hitchcock is that kind of a politician.

Two things prevent all efforts to develop a Republican party in the South. One is the satisfaction of the Federal office-holders with the present situation. If there were a Republican party, it might develop rivals for their jobs. The other is the difficulty of getting delegates from a "Lily White" Republican party accepted by the national convention. If One Republican state convention were to exclude negroes, the negroes would hold another and both delegations would present themselves to the national convention.

Nothing would be lost or gained in South Carolina, for instance, by accepting or rejecting either delegation, since the state is hopeless, anyway. But if a Republican national convention were to reject a negro delegation from the South, the negro vote would be pretty sure to make Indiana Democratic and Ohio doubtful. So the negro balance of power in two Northern states practically controlls all the Southern delegates to the national convention. The remedy, of course, is to make the representation in the national conventions like that in state conventions—proportional to the Republican vote cast, instead of the total population. That would make it to the interest of the Republican politicians of the South to try to develop a Republican party there.

I was talking to the Republican boss of one of the Southern states—he would probably not wish me to mention his name or his state. He very earnestly denied the charge that he and his kind did not wish to develop a Republican party in the South, and, to prove his contention, announced his purpose to form a popular Republican party in his own state, to consist of at least one man in each county, to be appointed by himself. One man to a county, all selected by the same boss—that was his conception of a popular democracy! It may be added that this same man's conception of Progressive Republicanism was that it is a "new game," used to win with, wherever it pays more than the old game.

Progressive States.

"Among state progressive movements, those in New Hampshire and Illinois most resemble the California one, though none have gone so far as we have.

New Hampshire is a small state, but it had precisely the same issue of railroad domination that California had, and under the leadership of Governor Bass and the political management of George Ruhlee and others, it won the fight in the same way.

In Illinois the issue is not so simple, but the organization is the best I have seen. I met many of the Illinois Progressive leaders both times I stopped in Chicago, and I spoke at the banquet at the Auditorium where they launched the state fight. They have, in Chicago, an organization that reaches every precinct, and is so enthusiastic that it does not cost them one cent for precinct watchers. They carried the last primaries for Merriam as Republican candidate for mayor, but Chicago is a Democratic city naturally, and that fact, together with the saloon vote and other forces, elected Carter Harrison, Jr., the Democratic candidate. The Progressives are well organized in other parts of the state, and are in control of the state Senate, under the leadership of Senator E. Clyde Jones, a man from whom the country is likely to hear further. Under the absurd system of minority representation, which insures the election of all the nominees of both parties and gives the people no choice, the Progressives have not yet been able to control the lower house of the legislature, but by organizing for the primaries they hope to be able to do even that next time. Progressive states radiate from Illinois—Missouri Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Indiana —and it is likely that Illinois, after the next election, will be as definitely Progressive as California is. Governor Deneen has so far pretty successfully played with both sides, but I doubt if he can play that game much longer.

THE DAY AT SAN FRANCISCO

By Franklin Hichborn

Local patriots who climbed aboard the Progressive band wagon at the last moment in anticipation of jobs are finding the new order not to their liking.

There are plenty of jobs; more jobs, by far, than competent men to fill them. Application is met with that word competent with an "are you" before it. And the combination disposes of the hopes and aspirations of most patriots of the band wagon variety.

Governor Johnson stated in his inaugural message, "The State is entitled to the highest efficiency in our public service, and that efficiency I shall endeavor at all times to give."

The sentence followed Johnson's epoch-making statement of policy, namely, "I take it, therefore, that the first duty that is mine to perform is to eliminate every private interest from the government, and to make the public service of the State responsive solely to the people."

The fierce joy with which certain patriots received this announcement of policy, had behind it contemplation of the large number of places that such a course would leave vacant. The overwhelming joy of it prevented the patriotic listeners sensing the next sentence regarding the "highest efficiency," which was quite as important, not a few are finding, as the first.

The Governor is not only cleaning away the parasites, whom the Southern Pacific machine put in office, but is seeing to it that no parasites take their places.

Hence the gloom.

No department of the State shows this in more marked degree than the San Francisco water front.

The San Francisco water front had long been the dumping ground for those to whom the machine found it necessary to give jobs, but who were utterly incapable of holding a position.

Before the Legislature had adjourned, however, Governor Johnson had appointed a competent Board of Harbor Commissioners for San Francisco, and these commissioners fell to the task of cleaning out the Southern Pacific parasites and putting competent men in their places.

But, as has been said, the job-wanters failed to take that word competent into consideration. One State Senator, for example, whose principal qualification seemed to be that he voted against most anti-machine measures at the 1909 session, and for most anti-machine measures at the session of 1911, wanted to be chief wharfinger, a job which pays a good salary. He didn't get the job. The Senator's face must have been a study in green when he received word of his failure. And so announcement of the awarding of places went right down the line. Men were selected for their ability to do the work for which the State pays them, rather than for work done as State Senator, Assemblyman, precinct boss or ward heeler.

The situation on the San Francisco water front was well illustrated during the last campaign. A collection —the usual collection—was started down there for "the ticket." Chairman Meyer Lissner of the State Central Committee heard about it.

Lissner promptly notified the Chairman of the Board of Harbor Commissioners that no such collection was required or expected or would be accepted.

The instructions must have come as a shock to the water front.

The Johnson-appointed Board of Harbor Commissioners hasn't been long on the job, but it has uncovered enough rottenness to damn those responsible for it, as well as those who permitted it to be covered up. For example, the Commissioners have discovered that certain of the modern concrete docks, of which the reports of former commissioners have boasted so loudly, are, to use the words of the head-liner, "dangling in mid-air," the "concrete pillars" supporting them being mere rotten shells.

The discovery is not at all surprising or even news to those in touch with conditions at San Francisco.

Fully a year ago, for example, a boatman attempting to land near one of these concrete docks, to steady his boat, pressed his oar against one of the "solid concrete pillars" supporting the structure.

To his astonishment, the oar went right through the pillar. Investigation developed the fact that the pillar, supposed to be concrete, the State having paid for that material, was a mere wooden shell fast rotting away. Further investigation showed many such "solid concrete pillars."

There was something of a newspaper flare-up, and then the fraud was forgotten by the general public.

According to the reports published at the time, the engineer-inspector who passed upon that particular bit of concrete construction was a shoemaker by trade who had secured election to the Legislature. It was found necessary to "reward" this shoemaker for his work as a legislator, so he was made engineer-inspector of concrete work along the San Francisco water front. The writer is unfamiliar with the shoe-maker-Legislator-engineer-inspector's legislative record, but will wager that the record was as rotten as the concrete pillars, and that the legislative vote or votes which got him his job cost Californians more dearly than the fraudulent concrete construction.

Incidentally, the writer learns that Southern Pacific officials are about to announce that the Southern Pacific Company will no longer engage in crooked politics, that hereafter that corporation proposes to be a model member of California society.

This is as interesting a resolution as that famous one of the Devil upon finding himself seriously indisposed. But, as earnest of good intention, the Southern Pacific might, at its own expense, proceed to restore the San Francisco docks, for it is more or less directly due to the political methods forced upon the State by the Southern Pacific Company that the docks are in the condition in which they are found.

When Johnson's election was announced, local Big Business, to hold to the old conditions, clutched at everything in sight much as a protesting cat that is being dragged across a carpet by the tail. But the institution that Big Business clutched at the hardest to save for its own, was the San Francisco water front.

Delegations of business men are reported to have gone to the Governor-elect to beg him, bully him, bluff him into leaving the San Francisco water front in the condition of putrid stagnation in which he found it. The virtues of the existing Board of Commissioners were extolled to the skies; their abilities dwelt upon; the inadvisability of making a change emphasized.

And Johnson, with an eye to the best interest of California, of San Francisco and San Francisco's water front, proceeded to get rid of those commissioners as soon as the law allowed.

It is not charged that the commissioners whom Johnson found in office had any part in the construction of the rotten pillars on the water front. Indeed, the work was done before the commissioners in question took office. But they did not go to any pains to let the public know of the condition of the State's water-front properties.

Harbor Commissioner Hill, recently appointed by Governor Johnson, who is conducting the present investigation, in dealing with this phase of it, stated in a recent interview, "The only complaint I have against the Gillett board is that the Commissioners did not let the public know of the condition of the State property when they assumed control."

Evidently, Commissioner Hill is not familiar with the ethics of machine politics.

It used to be said of the Gillett Commission that it was the best Harbor Commission the State ever had at San Francisco.

I asked a water front newspaper reporter one day to tell me how this was.

"Well," he said, "formerly, when George Hatton, or Jere Burke, or Walter Parker sent a man to the Commissioners for a job he was given a job and held it whether he could work or not.

"Under the Gillett Commission," the reporter went on, "anybody whom Hatton, or Burke, or Parker sends to the water front gets a job, but he must show his ability to hold it or he is discharged."

It might be added that under the Johnson Commission, Hatton, Burke, Parker et al. are not sending men to the water front for jobs.

After the Johnson Board of Commissioners has located all the rotten pillars of the concrete docks, the writer trusts they will have time to look into the meaning of some of the leases to State properties on the San Francisco water front which certain railroads have secured.

These leases may be all right and profitable to the whole people. But the fact remains that, previous to the opening of the Panama canal, the large railroads are leaving no trick unturned by which they may secure control of California harbors. If the large transportation companies can get control of the water fronts of California, the opening of the canal won't benefit California producers and shippers in the least. The old robber transportation rates will continue on the basis of all. the traffic will bear, for the transportation companies will have bottled up water competition.

In view of this, therefore, it is interesting to note that the Southern Pacific and the Western Paeific have been leasing water front property at San Francisco.

The Southern Pacific Company has, for example, leased seawall Lot No. 23, with 88,577 square feet, for which rental of $434,400 is paid for the "term of the lease." The writer does not know what the "term of the lease" is.

Do you?

Did you know that such a lease had been made within two years?

Did you know that the State had any such property to lease?

And yet, upon the proper disposition of this property and similar State holdings, depends the industrial well-being of the entire State, your well-being being inseparably wrapped up with the well-being of the whole people.

The Western Pacific is also "in on it." The corporation has leased Seawall Lot 21, with 14,625 square feet of area, for a term of twenty-five years, the rental price being $84,067.80, also Lot 22, with 97,794 square feet of area, for a rental of $454,406, the term of the lease not being stated in the data which the writer has at hand.

The leases may, of course, have been made for the best interests of the people of California.

On the other hand, if they cover strategic positions on the San Francisco water front, their leasing to a transportation company for a long term of years had perhaps better not have been made at all.

All of which the Johnson Board of Harbor Commissioners might very properly sift to the bottom, find out, and let the interested people know the facts.

LADIES' DAY AT THE COMMONWEALTH CLUB

Today, Saturday, is Ladies' Day at the San Francisco Commonwealth Club luncheon. Prof. M. E. Jaffa, Director of the State Food and Drug Laboratory, will speak on "The Adulteration of Our Daily Food."

J. B. LIPPINCOTT ADDRESSES LOS ANGELES CITY CLUB TODAY

The City Club of Los Angeles will be addressed at its regular weekly luncheon today (Saturday) by J. B. Lippincott, assistant chief engineer of the Los Angeles Aqueduct. Mr. Lippincott, who is a member of the Park Commission, will take for his subject, "Parks and Parkways, Here and Elsewhere." The talk will be illustrated with stereopticon views.

The Significance of Today's Political and Civic Conditions

By BENJAMIN FAY MILLS

The City Club of Los Angeles was addressed at last Saturday's luncheon by Benjamin Fay Mills, former pastor of the Los Angeles Fellowship and now a resident of Chicago. His subject was "The Present Political and Civic Conditions and Their Significance." During the past three years Mr. Mills has traveled widely among the cities of the nation, and his address was in the nature of a survey of the field by an experienced and penetrating observer.

"A return to California is always a novel experience," declared Mr. Mills. "We can say of our beloved State: 'Thy mercies are new every morning and repeated every evening.' I return to find things changed. I left Los Angeles in the hands of greed and graft. Vice was flowing down the streets. The police force was demoralized. The law was openly disregarded. I return to find that a revolution has taken place. The city is moved by a noble civic impulse. I find a mayor and council of unimpeachable character. Far-reaching civic and municipal reforms are being carried out. I find the almost fabulous material prosperity of former years, to which is added a moral and spiritual prosperity. You have achieved great things, and I believe you will realize even greater advances in the near future. As for California, I can hardly yet credit that of which I have heard from afar and now behold with my own eyes. Our State is freed from the stranglehold of the tentacles of the worst of all the corporate devilfishes of the recent noxious brood. We have a California legislature representing the people, the whole people and nothing but the people. In one short session it enacted laws of the most enlightened type, accomplishing ten times more for the public good than all the legislatures of the preceding ten years.

"In all this and more you have not only written a legislative record for California, but so far as I am aware, the record for any modern state. With it all you have elected and sustain a governor who represents in California our highest ideals of early America, and the noblest purpose of the larger knowledge and vision of the present day.

"The history of mankind is explained only by the fundamental fact of unity coming to expression in consciousness and practice. Whoever has fallen on this stone has been broken and upon whomsoever it has fallen has been ground to powder. All revolutions are explicable by this and this alone, but the impending revolution differs from all others in this: that the enlightened men of today perceive this principle and are testing our institutions by it.

"All our trouble arises from the deadly hypnotization of the antagonism of interest. Socially we are one and there can be no antagonism. The hope of deliverance from all the problems and confusions that now perplex us is a recognition of the fundamental unity of all classes and all men. All progressive movements are more or less successful efforts to dehypnotize the people. This is shown by the character of municipal progress.

"No one method is a cure-all. All methods are good and effective in so far as they express the fundamental fact of democracy, which is the principle of unity applied to governmental institutions. An illustration of this practical application of democracy is the commission form of city government.

"The essential features of this newly devised municipal organization are:

1. "Few men are elected. The people choose men they know and the responsibility is definite and clearly placed.

2. "The city government is clothed with full legislative and executive powers and to a certain extent with judicial powers also. Not only do we hold our public servants responsible for the efficient performance of their duties, but we give them a free hand, holding them responsible more for results than for methods.

3. "The commissioners represent the city as a whole, instead of sections or wards, thus putting away with the log-rolling and compromises that were the scandal of the old form of government.

Benjamin Fay Mills

4. "The recall provision holds the commissioners absolutely subject to the people's will. In this connection it may be mentioned that Los Angeles has given the whole nation a practical demonstration of the effectiveness of the recall, and the Los Angeles victory silences every carping critic who asserts that the recall cannot be effectively used in large cities.

"The commission form of government rests upon the principle that our public servants are to serve the public and not to govern us. They are the agents of the people. I hope in time to see our American cities adopt the German custom of engaging their public officials solely on the merit of efficiency, not limiting the choice to the citizens of the community but sending for the most efficient mayors and public officials wherever they may be found. European cities are teaching us that cities can speculate in their own prosperity. Birmingham, England, affords us a convincing illustration. Thirty-five years ago when Joseph Chamberlain was mayor thirty acres of slums were condemned for hygienic reasons. This ground was rented under ninety-nine year lease. The income has enabled the city to maintain a sinking fund that has almost paid the original cost, and the income has been so great that it is believed the revenue will be sufficient to abolish taxes to the end of time, provide free schools, free heat, free light, free water and free transportation and then have a surplus for other public concerns."

Chicago Election

Speaking of the Chicago election Mr. Mills said: "There is great curiosity as to why Merriam, the Republican candidate, was defeated. It was partly because Chicago was too cosmopolitan a city, partly because of the influence of the great interests which he defeated in the primaries, partly because he offended the temperance people by throwing sops to the liquor interests, and yet did not throw them enough to satisfy their capacious desires, but in my opinion his defeat was largely due to the fact that he was not advanced enough along progressive lines. If he had declared in favor of the municipal ownership of public utilities and the tackling and solving of the housing problem, and similar modern progressive movements, he would have won the support of the wage earners whose intelligence along these lines is much underestimated by the politicians. He was too progressive for the reactionaries and too conservative for the progressives.

What Milwaukee Is Doing

"The city most successful in demonstrating what can be done by an administration wholly devoted to the interests of the citizens is Milwaukee. The laws have not yet permitted the Socialists to fulfil their desires along socialistic lines, but they have accomplished more than any other American municipal administration in behalf of the public welfare. Every civic department has felt the helpful influence of the public spirit of the administration. They have improved the health department, promoted education, cultivated a desire for the city beautiful, extended the park system, sought to improve the housing of the poor, brought about the control of the monopolies, negotiated a model franchise with a new street-car system which has brought the old system to terms, made the great public utility corporations disgorge tens of thousands of dollars of which they had been illegally robbing the people, incorporated in the city hall a department of the university extension work from the state university, and employed a well-known social expert to promote democratic sociability among the people. These are a few of the beneficial effects of the administration.

The Administration of Law

"The whole tendency of today is toward a simpler and more direct court procedure. The municipal court of Chicago is an illustration. The 'golden rule' methods of Chief of Police Kohler of Cleveland have been so successful that they have been adopted by cities all over the country. While Cleveland has grown greatly, arrests have decreased in four years from thirty thousand to six thousand per annum, and are still decreasing, while the number of convictions for felonies has increased.

"John L. Whitman of the Chicago Bridewell, Warden Sanders of the Iowa Penitentiary and Warden Hoyle of San Quentin, are demonstrating the new spirit in dealing with prisoners. In the treatment of our lawbreakers I believe we need the extension of the probation system, the organization of our prisons as crime hospitals with the elimination of any idea of social vengeance and instead an earnest effort to deliver the bondsmen by manual, mental and moral training, rather than by our present vindictive damnation; there should be a rapid development of the parole system, with a systematic supervision of the paroled men designed to assist them in their attempt to live a new life.

Economic Co-operation

"In the economic world we are still trying the insane experiment to find out what happens when an irresistible force strikes an immovable body. Our competitions and business rivalries are irrational and uncivilized. Some still play the old game with the old rule. Some say, 'let us play the old game but revise the rules.' A vanguard of the more enlightened say, 'let us play a new kind of game.' It is my opinion that these latter are to prevail. Our world will see that political democracy cannot abide with an economic despotism.

"The season is overdue for the substitution of co-operation for competition. The land must be occupied by those who will use it for human welfare, and industry and commerce must be reorganized on brotherly principles, 'one for all and all for one.'

"In my opinion nothing of any great value will be accomplished by the freeing or conviction of the men now in your jail charged with an atrocious crime. The issue lies deeper. The wise Emerson says, 'Fear is an instructor of great sagacity, and the herald of all revolutions. One thing he always teaches, that there is rottenness where he appears. That obscene bird is not there for nothing. He indicates great wrongs that must be revised.' The important question is not whether any particular structure may have been destroyed by the bomb of a dynamiter or by the spontaneous combustion of material or moral sewer gas. The foul bird, fear, is not there for nothing; he indicates great wrongs that must be redressed. This can only be done by the absolute elimination of all antagonism of interest, and the reorganization of society on a basis of brotherhood.

The Political Outlook

"As to the present political outlook, no reactionary is to be elected president of the United States. The people are losing some of their antipathy to President Taft, through his advocacy of unlimited arbitration, and of Canadian reciprocity, and through his recent selection of two progressive members of his cabinet. But his convictions and temperament are too essentially undemocratic to meet the demands of the awakening intelligence and conscience of the American people. In my judgment four-fifths of the people of America would welcome the opportunity to seat the leading democrat of America in the presidential chair. His name is Robert M. La Follette.

The Extension of Democracy

"The desirability of democracy is born from the knowledge of the divinity of man. Mazzini well says, 'that the man who first makes a religion of democracy will be the savior of the world.' The increasing acknowledgment and realization of this mighty truth is the brightest sign on our political horizon. The infinitude of the private man which is the basis of all civilization and progress, necessitates the pursuit of every method that will lead to the largest responsibility of the greatest number and the willing service of all by all.

"Let us organize the world. There is no true statesmanship that does not exalt the larger patriotism that says, 'My true country is the world.' We must abolish war by arbitration and abolish arbitration by universal brotherhood. The barrier builder is the world's enemy. The unifier of humanity will be the world's deliverer."

Is This An Attempt to Deceive? A former City Auditor of Los Angeles who is a perennial candidate for mayor, goes about telling improvement associations that the last city council (S. P. machine) made a better financial record than the present body (Good Government), because the last council reduced the rate of taxation from one dollar down to eighty-five cents, and the present council has put back the dollar rate. No one knows better than this man that the reduction from one dollar to eighty-five cents was caused by the Board of Education transferring the expense of the schools, which amounted to fifteen per cent of the city's total, over to the county. The reduction was then automatic and not to anybody's credit. The removal, by the way, was to the auditor's discredit, because in order to curry favor with a local newspaper whose proprietor "had it in for" the Superintendent of Schools, he got up a fight with the Board of Education and harassed them until they went over to the county. As to the return to the dollar rate, that as everybody knows was occasioned by the great reduction of city revenues caused by Amendment Number One, which transferred the taxation of corporations from city to state. The present city administration had nothing to do with that, except that they protested against the adoption of this amendment by the people of the State. If it had been the average uninformed citizen that had made the statements quoted above, it might rank as a mistake; but when it comes from a former City Auditor who is an expert accountant, it has the appearance of an attempt to deceive.

Judges in Cincinnati: They have the recall of judges in Cincinnati and it must be admitted it does not work well. Unfortunately, however, the recall there is not arranged to be operated by the people but by one George Cox, the political boss. That is different. Cox put these judges in their places, and at the end of their term can recall them. They are so absolutely in his power that some of them in a recent investigation admitted under oath that they reported to him from time to time and got instructions as to how they were to decide cases. This, of course, is very "raw" work. It is usually not an individual but a party machine that gives the judge his place, and his orders do not come in the form of written or spoken words but in his knowledge of the fact that back of the machine lies a corporation or group of corporations. Now they are endeavoring to bring Cox to justice for swearing to a falsehood in denying that he took gratuities from banks for giving them millions of city money to hold without interest. There was only one judge in the county not owned by Cox, and a change of venue saved him from the grip of that one. All the others find technicalities—flaws of one kind or another somewhere in the proceedings. He will undoubtedly go free.

Dust and Oil and Sore Eyes: Objection was made in some parts of France to the use of tar and oils in the making of roads on the ground that the dust arising from roads thus treated is especially injurious to the eye. A long series of experiments carried on with rabbits by scientific French investigators seems to establish the fact that oiled dust is a little worse on the eye than dust without the oil, but neither in ordinary quantities produces any serious result. The fact that an oiled road makes much less dust than an ordinary road is reckoned to be more than an offset to the greater irritation produced by the oiled dust.

Progressive Houston: Since Houston, Texas, came under the commission plan it has been progressive in almost every sense of the term. It publishes a handsome illustrated weekly paper to tell its citizens and the world generally of the work done by the municipality. Now Houston proposes to enter upon a vigorous campaign for civic beauty, and the Chamber of Commerce has pledged its aid to the city toward the carrying of bonds that may be needed. A city forester has been appointed to inaugurate the systematic planting of shade trees.

Information and Complaint: President McAneny of the Borough of New York recommends the establishment of a Bureau of Information and complaint where citizens may go to get accurate knowledge of the city's business and where all complaints may be filed. Such an institution is needed in every city of size. A great deal of time, both of citizens and of city officials and employees, is wasted in complaints that start in the wrong place and are batted about from one department to another and perhaps in the end lost or ignored.

Not a Silk-Stocking Vote: On the day when Carter Harrison beat Merriam in Chicago there were heavy rains all day long. The popular interpretation of Merriam's defeat was that the "silk stockings" did not turn out in the wet. The Springfield Republican, however, analyzes the vote by wards and precincts and shows that Merriam made great gains as against the national election vote in the best residence districts. It was the Lorimer reactionary Republican vote for Harrison that defeated Merriam.

Extraordinary Demand for Speech: It is reported that the speech of Senator Jonathan Bourne of Oregon on the initiative and referendum has been circulated to a total of 3,100,000, an amount that is quite unprecedented. It shows the tremendous amount of interest taken in the question of the rule of the people by the people themselves. Politicians, however, as a rule, scarcely know what these terms mean, and regard them as fads and crank notions.

The Light That Failed: The people of Emporia, Kansas, where William Allen White lives, seem to have grown tired of their experiment with municipal lighting, for they voted to lease the plant to a syndicate on a five per cent rental. This matter and the granting of a franchise to the same syndicate to run a street railway in the town for 20 years were submitted to popular vote and carried after a spirited contest by 500 majority.

Fire Prevention Bureau: The people of New York City have been so deeply moved by the disaster in the Triangle Building, where 143 girls were burned, that they have established by private subscription a Fire Prevention Bureau with a central office and a permanent corps of assistants. Its object is to gather exact information as to conditions, make the facts public and work for systematic improvement.

Cement Lighting Posts: A new design for a concrete lamp post has been worked out by the municipal light department of Pasadena, and fourteen of these posts have been placed in the grounds of the public library of that city. The post is made in two pieces with a light standard fitting into a heavier base and cemented in place. This makes it much more convenient to transport and handle.

A Splendid Gift to a City: San Antonio, Texas, has received from one of its citizens, F. F. Collins, a public playground and park a mile in length and 200 feet wide, bordered on each side with several rows of shade trees, containing long stretches of flowerbeds, a large swimming pool and two bath houses. Mr. Collins has spent over $50,000 in getting this piece of land put in shape to give to the people.

The Commission System: Two of the chief cities of Alabama are under the commission system, Birmingham and Montgomery. Marshalltown, Iowa, has just entered upon this system. Commission charters were defeated recently by Winston and Raleigh, North Carolina; Paola, Kansas, and Taylor, Texas. The commission system carried at Faribault, Minnesota, and Parkersburg, West Virginia.

Low Cost of Auto: The Fire Chief of Middleton, Connecticut, reports that the entire cost of maintenance of an auto-chemical machine for one year was $39.61. The cost for the preceding year, when horses were used, was $350.02, which leaves an apparent balance of $310.41 in favor of the machine as against the animals.

Important Line of Work: The National Bureau of Municipal Research, which came into existence first by a gift of $25,000 from Ex-Comptroller Metz of New York, has organized with U. L. Leonhauser in charge of the work, which will, for the present, consist chiefly in making available to American cities the best principles and practice worked out in municipal accounting and reporting.

DEVELOPMENT OF NATURAL RESOURCES OF CALIFORNIA

By Lewis E. Aubury, State Mineralogist

An Address Delivered Before the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, May 20

In speaking of the development of the natural resources of California, I shall deal mainly with those of a mineral character.

It was not such a great while ago that gold was considered the only mineral product for which our state has been noted. As development progressed year by year, some additional minerals have been added to the list of those of importance, until at the present time, California produces not less than fifty different mineral substances of economic importance, and of an aggregate value of about $85,000,000 annually. It is my opinion that this amount will be increased during the next three years to an annual production of $100,000,000.

For several years, our gold product declined, and we were rated second in production, but with the advent of the gold dredge, production increased so that we now rank first.

But it is not to gold alone that we owe so much of our mineral prosperity. Petroleum has taken the lead, and will continue to maintain it. We are now in a position where we are enabled to more materially aid all other branches of industry, and with the aid of hydro-electric energy guarantee the greatest economy to the manufacturer, in supplying him with the necessary power.

With an abundance of raw material of different classes available, and with the aforesaid cheap power, there is no reason why California should not soon take precedence over any other state in the Union in the matter of manufactures.

It is true that we are not so situated that at the present time we could hope to dispose of such manufactures over a very large area, as transportation rates in some directions preclude such a possibility, but with a cheap water transportation we will soon be able to compete with the eastern producers.

To enumerate the possibilities of development of all our different mineral products would take a much longer time than could be allowed to the subject at this time. However, I shall endeavor to select a few of the more important ones, and will commence with asphalt. The asphalt production in 1909 was over 136,000 tons, valued at about $1,707,000.

Asphalt

This mineral is now produced as a by-product in the refining of petroleum. With almost prohibitive railroad rates, we are competing in the East with imported asphalt from Trinidad and other foreign sources. Our product is rated as A-1, but owing to the lack of a proper protective tariff, and high railroad rates, we are just about able to hold our own in the eastern States. With a greater market, every oil field in the State will be affected, and better prices will be obtained by the producer of petroleum. The "Good Roads Movement" throughout the country is creating an increased demand for asphalt, and California will be called upon to supply the major portion of it.

Borax

Then we have borax, which is indispensable. So far as I know, no other state in the Union produces borax in commercial quantities, therefore giving us a monopoly of this substance. We produce annually about 16,600 tons of crude borax, valued at say $1,160,000. The greater portion of the crude product is shipped to New Jersey, where it is refined and distributed. It is produced wholly in Southern California and principally from the desert regions.

Cement

Up to about ten years ago, with the exception of one small plant in Southern California, no cement was produced in the State. Now we are supplying our own needs and are able to ship a large quantity to surrounding States. On account of the high quality and cheapness of the product it has been possible to almost prohibit the importation of the foreign product. In 1909 over 3,700,000 barrels were manufactured, valued at something over $4,900,000. With the advent of concrete construction came a greater demand for this product, and it is constantly increasing. We are able to supply practically any demand as the supply of raw materials for its manufacture is abundant.

Clays

Of clays, both for pottery, tiling and brick manufacture, it would be difficult to find better grades than are found over large areas in California. The clay industry in this State should be of greater importance than it is today, and the different products of manufacture from clays should give employment to a much larger number of persons than are now occupied in this direction. The annual production of brick and pottery clays amounts in value (1909) to about $3,500,000.

Copper

Copper, which enters so much into manufacture, is produced from Siskiyou to San Diego. The industry in California is practically in its infancy. It did not begin to assume any proportions until 1887, but since that time, up to 1910, we have produced over 298,000,000 pounds, valued at $57,862,927. Most of this product has been shipped for refining to eastern points, but it is anticipated that within a few years all of our product will be refined on this coast.

The industry furnishes employment for a large number of men both in the mines and smelters. Of the latter there are a half dozen operating in this State.

Exceptional opportunities are offered for investment in copper mines and prospects in California, as conveniences of operation and the economy with which the ores can be mined and smelted are an important consideration.

Gold

Gold, as you all know, is the mineral which has been the means of making California what it is. Were it not for Marshall's discovery at Coloma it is possible that we would not be here today. Hides and tallow would form the chief product of trade instead of the busy whirr of the different industries with which we are now surrounded.

Up to the present time California has produced over one and a half billion dollars in gold, and some might assume on account of this large extraction there could be little left. Let me assure you that we have hardly commenced to mine the gold contained in our quartz ledges, which are productive from one end of the State to the other. It is true that the shallow placers have to a large extent been pretty well worked out, but there still remains untouched a large territory of drift gravel and hydraulic mines which will some time yield untold millions.

One of the present large sources of gold is the gold bearing gravels, which are worked by the dredging process. Up to the year 1898 no practical means had been devised to profitably obtain the gold from these gravels. With the improvements which have been made in dredge construction and operation it is now possible to handle over 300,000 cubic yards of gravel monthly with the large boats, and at a total cost of less than 3 cents per cubic yard. About $10,000,000 in gold is annually obtained by dredging at present and that amount is gradually increasing.

An important feature of this industry is that in some places, after the gold has been recovered by the dredgers, the cobble piles formed are crushed into rock for macadam for roads, ballasting, etc., and also rubble for concrete, thus reducing the cost of these materials to a considerable extent.

It is estimated that the dredging industry will remain an important factor for the next twenty-five years.

With other forms of gold mining, our annual product approximates about $21,000,000 and again places us at the head of the gold producing States. This serves to illustrate that instead of the gold mining industry decreasing in importance we are now producing more gold annually than we have for nearly fifty years.

Petroleum

Petroleum is now our leading mineral product and far outstrips gold in point of annual production. To furnish an idea as to the magnitude of the industry, the records of the State Mining Bureau show that there have been produced over 307,400,000 barrels of petroleum, valued at more than $136,600,000 in the past twenty-three years, and up to January 1, 1910. The greater part of this has been produced within the past few years.

To the manufacturing interests and other consumers of power the immense production of petroleum of which California is capable insures them for a long period of time a most economical means of power production, and a lever, if necessary, against hydro-electric power, should the latter become too expensive. The necessity for fostering the petroleum industry is thus made apparent.

At the present time there is an apparent overproduction and the necessity arises for the more extended use of petroleum in the different channels. The economy and advantage with which it can be used over other means of producing power are indisputable, and as a means of disposing of this surplus and relieving the situation it has been suggested that the government adopt petroleum as a fuel on the Pacific Coast instead of coal both by the Army and Navy Departments. Such suggestion was originally made by the State Mining Bureau in 1902, but notwithstanding its advantages from an economical standpoint and otherwise our government has continued to ship coal to this coast from eastern mines, and largely in foreign bottoms.

From the records of the Navy Department I recently made a comparison as to the saving which would result by the use of petroleum as against coal purchased by the Navy for use during the year 1910 and distributed to Pacific Coast points and I found that if petroleum were used in place of the coal a saving would have been effected of at least $1,200,000—without taking into consideration the additional saving in handling or the greater steaming radius of a warship.

Such discrimination against a California product is not, however, the only instance on record by those in authority at Washington. It appears that whenever eastern products can be supplied government officials still insist that they shall be used in place of those mined in this State. For instance, note the government buildings erected in California. Undoubted proof of unjust discrimination by government architects against California materials is available. The California producer of structural materials has been barred from competing. Our building stones, such as granite, sandstone, marble and slate are superior to those from outside sources, and the prices of materials have been at least equal or even lower, so that no justification for this discrimination could be advanced.

The injury to the California producer is more than the monetary loss, as buildings constructed of foreign material stand as monuments to the observer that this State cannot produce the material used in construction; otherwise California material would have been used.

If time would permit, it would be a pleasure for me to enumerate a long list of mineral substances which are produced in California and which enter into manufacturing. As yet their production is comparatively small, but in my opinion it will be but a few years when the superior advantages that our State has to offer will direct the attention of capital this way, and when our raw products are utilized as they should be we will see California take her place as the leading State in the Union in the point of variety of manufactures.

Number 15

By the Onlooker

HONEST BEN

The most warmly appreciated orator of the Senate was not the golden-tongued Gates, nor the acerbic Wolfe, nor the strident Caminetti. Each of these, and several others, had his partisans favoring him for the Ciceronian crown, but the real Peruvian doughnut of debate was Ben Rush, of Suisun. Whenever he rose, one could feel a common thrill of gladness in the throng, and when he seated himself, after his brief, but pointed remarks, one could almost hear the heartfelt but suppressed applause. True, his speeches lacked a certain dash of variety; they all (but one) dealt with the same subject; yes, we may even say that the wording each time was the same. But these remarks were so pertinent, so pat to the spirit of the occasion, that they filled a long-felt want. We shall try faithfully to reproduce this speech; every morning, immediately after the prayer, Senator Rush arose, and gave tongue to these eloquent thoughts:

"Mr. President: I move that further reading of the minutes be dispensed with."

Which maybe you think did not settle the fate of those minutes. It did. Whereupon Senator Rush put his feet upon the top of his desk, and buried himself behind his newspaper and his moustache for the rest of the day, emerging occasionally to partake of light nourishment from the end of a black cigar. This careful regimen of health always restored him to condition to repeat his speech on the following morning.

This being senator is only a by-product of Senator Rush's life. He has graver responsibilities than this. He is a farmer, for one thing; and he has a nickname that he must live up to, by which token he is known as "Honest Ben" Rush. (Great thing in politics, these nicknames. Sort of trade-marks, like Charlie Curry's hat or Governor Johnson's pipe.) Being a farmer and being honest are about enough to keep an ordinary man busy. But Senator Rush has taken on politics as a sort of rotation of crops, growing a little senatorial record in his soul while he lets lie fallow the agricultural acres of his spirit, and for all I know maybe—I don't assert it, but, just from a rapid survey of politics as a general proposition, saying maybe—occasionally substituting political glory for the characteristics of that homo that Diogenes never put the spotlight on. The only crop that Honest Ben hasn't rotated very successfully is the crop of moss on his cupola of contemplation, whence all but fuzz has fled.

As chairman of the Committee on Hospitals and Asylums, and also as member of the Committee on Finance, Honest Ben had a mean advantage over other senators who have asylums in their districts. If the Napa institution did not fare well at the last session it was because Honest Ben did not dig his hooks in as hard as he had a license to. However, we have heard no seismic disturbances from Napa as yet, so the probabilities are that the Senate's reward for his eloquence has been satisfactory to his district.

The exception to his usual style of oratory, noted above, was heard on the occasion when the Griffin-Rush 8-hours-for-women law was being debated. Upon this occasion Senator Rush delivered the following Demosthenic:

"Mr. President and Fellow Senators: This bill is a good proposition and ought to pass."

Whereupon, as everybody likes Ben Rush anyway, they passed it. Generally speaking, they think he's a pretty good proposition himself. Eloquent, of course, but liveable, in spite of it.

NOT SEEKING PATRONAGE

State Chairman Lissner Explains Position of California Progressives

(Washington Post)

Editor Post: In your "Political Arena" of this morning you say in effect that the demand of the progressive Republican organization in control in California is for the Federal patronage from the present administration in exchange for a Taft delegation from that State, all of which is absolutely without vestige of foundation in fact.

It may be hard to comprehend by most politicians here, but the fact nevertheless is that patronage is almost the last thing the progressives of California are interested in, and this was made perfectly clear by the writer whenever the opportunity offered in the interviews he had the honor of enjoying with those prominent in political affairs in Washington. In this regard our only concern is to see that the servants of the Southern Pacific Railroad are removed from the Federal offices which they now infest in California, just as Governor Johnson has put them out of the employ of the State.

What is of vital interest to us in California is principle and policy, and it is upon those tests that we measure men, politically. For example, the President has helped himself more in our estimation by the last two appointments of members of his cabinet than by any other acts of his administration, and I venture to say that if he had had such advisers as Fisher and Stimson about him from the beginning there would now be no question as to the candidate California will support in the next national Republican convention.

Yours truly,
M. LISSNER.

THE MAN WHO DOESN'T VOTE

The California Outlook.

Gentlemen:—In today's (May 20) edition of your publication the "Watchman" calls attention to the fact that in the recent municipal election at Oakland only 22,023 votes were cast out of a total registration of 37,000, and asks what is to be done with the man who does not vote.

He suggests that such persons as fail to vote might be treated as having waived their right of suffrage and could be disfranchised without injury to the public—a very plausible suggestion but doubtless not seriously made by him.

If the right of suffrage were merely a right the suggestion would possibly provide an adequate remedy, but the right to vote is not merely a personal privilege, to be exercised or not at the whim of the citizen, but it is a civic duty—a duty of at least equal importance with that performed by the volunteer soldier in the day of danger, a duty of increasing dignity and importance in these days of direct legislation.

Realizing, then, that the actual exercise of the right of suffrage at every election is the citizen's highest duty, the Watchman surely would not recommend the release from that duty as a punishment for its non-performance.

Moreover, if one were to make a canvass of those who fail to vote they would be astounded to find the great majority of the non-voters to be business men, church members, and higher-grade workingmen—the very persons one would most expect to find doing their duty, persons upon whose votes we must depend to improve the government of our cities, states and nation by the nomination and election of better officials and by the endorsement of progressive policies.

The special interests see to it that their full voting strength is at the polls every time, and although their strength is but a small minority of the total vote possible, they often win through the default of the disinterested citizens. At every election there fails to vote enough of the better element to elect every good candidate and carry every good measure by an overwhelming majority.

The hope of the people lies not in disfranchising those who at present do not do their duty in this respect but in making these persons realize their power at the polls and in arousing them to exercise that power for their own good.

I believe that the real cause of the appalling neglect of the duty of voting is that our "good" citizen does not realize the value of his vote—the value of a single vote—does not realize that a difference of one vote in each precinct or even his one vote may constitute the balance of power.

The Governor of Massachusetts was once elected at the general election by his own voting of the party ticket; the sheriff of Alameda County was on one occasion elected by a single vote; and at the Oakland election, mentioned in your columns, the man who was undoubtedly the most capable and independent candidate seeking nomination for one of the commissionerships failed of nomination by only 36 votes out of over 20,000 votes cast at the primary election.

Bring home to our citizens a realization of their power! Teach them to hope, to vote, and to achieve! When once they realize the power of a single vote then, and then only, will they sacrifice their business hours and time to serve their nation at the polls.

Pollution of the Ballot

A. J. Beveridge: In the Senate of the United States, February 23, 1911

Every student in the world has noted the startling similarities in many developments rapidly ripening in the American republic with those that occurred in Rome when that republic began its decline—love of luxury, scandalously vast wealth ill-gotten, corrupt efforts for office and power, the use of these in behalf of "the interests" of that day. Chief of these was bribery.

In Rome bribery was the first definite symptom of a fatal disease. Patriotic statesmen saw that it would end the liberties of the Roman people, and the people themselves instinctively felt that they must throttle this evil if they were to continue to exist as a free people. As early as 180 years before Christ, the Lex Cornelia punished bribery of voters with exile.

But severe as this penalty was the abuses continued and increased, and the last century of the republic began with bribery, the most dangerous foe which the Roman republic faced. The Acilia Calurnia added heavy fines for bribery, whether successful or not, and forever deprived the citizen attempting it from holding any office.

The reason these two penalties were expected to stop this form of corruption was that money and the holding of office had become the twin gods before whose foul shrine of selfishness every ambitious Roman worshipped. To be rich and to hold office were the two great purposes of every ambitious Roman. "How much money have you?" and "What high office do you hold?" were the questions the answers to which fixed the status of the Roman citizen as to success or failure.

But in spite of the shrewd estimate of Roman character on which the Acilia Calurnia was founded, the capitalists or "financiers," as Ferrero calls them, and the politicians of that day trampled it beneath their sordid and reckless feet, and were able to prevent its execution because of the growing indifference of the Roman people themselves to the fate of their institutions and their descendants. "Sufficient unto the day are the benefits thereof" had become the unspoken rule which guided the great body of that once mighty people.

In that immortal period which produced Cicero and Caesar, Crassus and Cato, there was slight recrudescence of that ancient virtue, whose best expression was "To be a Roman citizen is nobler than to be a king."

But, after all, it was a feeble flame of righteousness—a very feeble flame considering Crassus, the master financier of his day, and subsequent Roman history. Yet it resulted in the Lex Tulia of Cicero's consulate, B. C. 64, which extended the Acilia Calurnia to any candidate who should hire followers or entertain the people with shows or refreshments. Every student knows the reason for this. Wealthy and ambitious men, who wanted their tools in important offices or who wanted to be in office themselves, gave the people lavish public entertainment.

The Roman citizen had been debauched so far that he was ready to cast his suffrage for anybody who would do him any favor or even entertain or divert him. Bribery in all its forms, gross and subtle, had utterly corrupted Roman character. The powers of pollution understood this well and laughed at the Lex Tulia and all other corrupt practices acts because they knew they could disregard them.

Consider the contrast between Roman history, law and administration, and English history, law and administration. For in almost every respect English and Roman history furnish the student the best materials for comparison and contrast, not only in the duration and extent of their power, but also in the character, or, as Emerson calls it, "the bottom" of the character of the two peoples.

American Character on Trial

So, instead of taking up this great problem as England has taken it up and saved herself, the Roman judges,

Former U. S. Senator A. J. Beveridge

the Roman Senate, and finally the Roman people let it go by. "Never mind, the Republic will endure," said they. "Don't bore me with talk of the Republic," was a common sentiment of the people of Rome. "No matter if the law is violated, let us stand up for the man in office if he has the cash," was the final expression of the debased Roman electorate.

No wonder Rome fell. And be sure we shall perish, too, if we pass this evil by as a thing for a sneering cynicism or a diseased sentimentality.

And so, fundamentally, the great question is: How shall we Americans approach this evil in our own land? Our institutions are on trial and, deeper than that, the character of the American people is on trial. If it is not so, then history has no meaning.

I know, and it is not a good sign, that we are so busy that we are impatient of the lessons of other peoples. We can be impatient a little bit too much. We can be too hurried. The time must never arrive in this republic—and if it does the doom of the Nation already has been sounded—when the purity of our elections is not to us a greater concern than the success of a politician or the success of the wrongful plans of great interests.

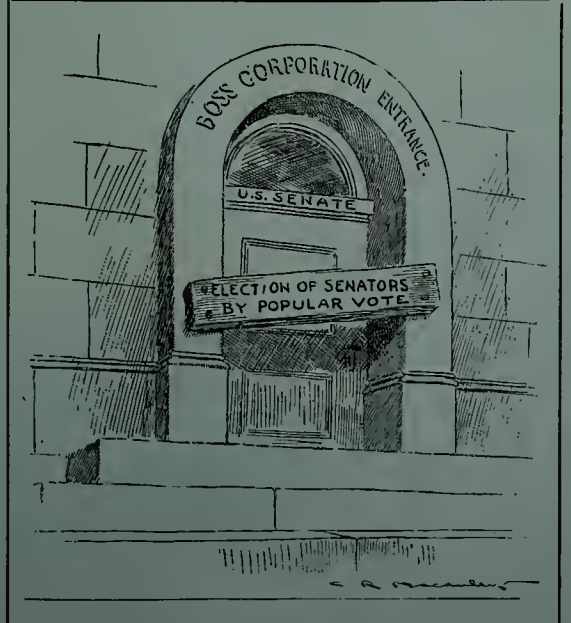
THE RECALL FOR JUDGES

Sound on most points of public policy and very attractive as a leader of the new movement to unfetter American democracy, Governor Wilson is not at his best in his view of the recall for judges. He says:

"Judges are not lawmakers. They are not administrators. Their duty is not to determine what the law shall be, but to determine what the law is. Their independence, their sense of dignity and of freedom, is of the first consequence to the stability of the State. To apply to them the principle of the recall is to set up the idea that determinations of what the law is must respond to popular impulse and to popular judgment. It is sufficient that the people should have the power to change the law when they will. It is not necessary that they should directly influence by threat of recall those who merely interpret the law already established. The importance and desirability of the recall as a means of administrative control ought not to be obscured by drawing it into this other and very different field."

The flaw in this argument is in the assumption that judges do not make law. They do. Without a recall of judges the people cannot be sure of the power to change the law when they will; for the judges, not the people, have the last say. Some judges are chosen by privileged interests to thwart the people; others, with honest intent, think so antiquely, are so slavish to privilege, that they do as much harm as if they were corrupt.

In a democracy no servant should be unchecked. At present a judge can be an enemy to the public welfare and hold his place so long as he does not get caught taking bribes or indulge in flagrant personal misconduct or turn crazy. This measure of control over public servants on the bench is not enough. The demand for a larger accountability is founded in a need of good government and it will persist and grow.—The Boston Common.



U. S. C. ACTIVITIES

The announcement of a summer session in connection with the University of Southern California should have interest for teachers and others desirous of using to profit the long vacation. Students can, with profit, devote six weeks of the summer to biology, botany, or literary subjects. It is the best time, indeed, to make use of the well-furnished Aquarium at Venice, now a part of the University plant.

The administration of the University has decided to establish a department of Oriental Studies for the purpose of meeting the requirements of Oriental students, who come here in considerable numbers, and also to give training to prospective teachers and others who look forward to a career in the Far East.

To the post of Director of Oriental Studies, with the task of developing the Department, President Bovard has called Dr. James Main Dixon, who for six years has been at the head of the English Department in the University. For thirteen years Dr. Dixon was professor in the Imperial University of Japan, and he is well-known as an authority on Japanese matters, having contributed the Japan articles to such standard works as the Universal and Chambers' Encyclopedias.

Pertinent Editorial Extracts From Our State Exchanges

What a Priee!

Having read what the Supreme Court did to the Standard Oil Co., it is well to consider what it did to the rest of us. And, by the way, what did it do to the Standard Oil Company? Why, it merely said that the work of the Standard Oil Company was too coarse and must be refined a bit. It said that trusts were all right and restriction of trade was all right and stifling competition was all right—so long as it wasn't carried to an unreasonable extent.

The Standard Oil had got three feet into the trough, and two seem to be the reasonable limit. * * *

But suppose the decision had utterly wiped out of existence every trust in the United States and had killed all the eggs of trusts. Suppose trade were unrestrained and competition as free as air—and the decision did none of these—yet the price paid would have been too high.

For that decision has enthroned the judge as the supreme governing power of America.

Wild talk?

Listen to what Justice Harlan, the veteran of the Supreme Court bench, said in his dissenting opinion:

"There are many things in this opinion," said Justice Harlan, "which may well alarm the country * * * It does not rest with this court by a process of judicial legislation wholly unjustifiable to read into the law words not written there * * * The opinion today means that the courts may by mere judicial construction amend the Constitution of the United States and amend the statutory laws."

There is the other side of the case. The court was asked to kill the trnsts, and, instead, it has crowned the judge. * * *

And on every hand we are being taught that judges are sacred, and that to control or recall them savors of anarchy.—San Diego Sun.

Court Law

It is now recognized that the victory over the Standard Oil cost the government the Sherman act. In its place is given the Supreme Court act, a distinctly weaker and practically unenforceable law. When it was suggested that Congress amend the act as the Supreme Court amended it, by interpolating the word "unreasonable," President Taft declared such an amendment would give the courts "a power impossible to exercise on any consistent principle which would insure the uniformity of decision essential to good judgment." * * *

Justice Harlan's ex tempore dissenting opinion makes perfectly clear the restrictive interpretation given the Sherman act and his warning against judicial legislation will find responsive accord throughout the country. Undoubtedly the usurpation by the court of the legislative function is the greatest and most confusing abuse in our system of government, and it is to be hoped that the plain spoken words of the eminent dissenting justice will have the effect of checking this pernicious practice. * * *—Fresno Republican.

Republieans and Democrats Watching Woodrow Wilson

The progressive Republicans of the State of California are deeply interested in the policies of Governor Woodrow Wilson.

If the Republican party at its national convention next year shall nominate as its candidate for the presidency a man who represents the progressive principle, its interest in Wilson will be indirect. He will be regarded only as a worthy foeman. But if the reactionary forces snould prevail at the next Republican national convention and Woodrow Wilson should be the choice of the Democrats there are unquestionably thousands of Republicans in this State who, placing principle above party, will give the Democrat the preference.

It now seems more than likely that Wilson will receive the nomination. He has outdistanced Harmon of Ohio and lacks only the endorsement of Bryan to make him invincible as a candidate for nomination. * * *—Chico Enterprise.

The Ineome Tax

The income tax, which has been a debatable question for more than a decade in this country, is in a fair way of being incorporated in the federal constitution, despite the tremendous influence that is being exerted against it. The chances of the proposed income tax amendment to the constitution being ratified by the necessary three-fourths majority of the state legislatures are exceedingly good. Thirty legislatures have voted to ratify, and some of those which last year rejected the amendment are prepared to revise their action. * * *—Salinas Index.

War on the Amendments

It becomes evident that, having failed in their attempts to defeat Governor Johnson when he was a candidate, and having failed to obstruct the legislative program for which he declared in his inaugural message, the manipulators of the old "machine" in this state are organizing for an effort to defeat, at the election this fall, the progressive constitutional amendments which are to be proposed to the people.

Most of those newspapers which take their orders from the corrupt old gang are now indulging in criticism of the amendments. It is clearly indicated that they are acting in concert and in pursuance of a defined program.

The purpose is to give the progressive movement a back-set; to make it appear, by the defeat of the amendments, that the people of California are tired of honest government and that they wish to return to the system of boss rule. * * *—Humboldt Times.

Another Good Bill

Another of the good bills that passed the late Legislature and was signed by the Governor is the one raising the school age to fifteen years. Hereafter eight years schooling is compulsory in California.—Mountain Messenger.

Fire of Standpat Press Drawn by Kent's Speeeh

The citizens of this congressional district have no occasion to complain that they are represented by a nonentity in congress.

It is a long time since a representative has jumped so quickly into the spotlight as has William Kent.

By his speech in the House on April 26th he has succeeded in drawing the fire of not only the correspondents of nearly all the standpat newspapers of the coast, but of such big eastern papers as the New York Sun and New York Tribune. The Morganized magazines will doubtless come trailing along in denunciation of Kent about midsummer.

And all because he has taken a stand in congress as a firebrand insurgent and has proved himself capable of compelling the attention of his fellow representatives and of the nation by homely speech, telling earnestness and witty illustrations, and by his convincing promise to work for the welfare of the average man. * * *—Chico Enterprise.

In the Same Class

Making counterfeit money and printing stock certificates for fake mining companies belong to the same category of crimes and ought to be regarded and punished by law. There is no difference between the two methods of stealing. The printing of stock certificates ought to be the duty of our national government just the same as printing postage stamps and greenbacks.—Montague Messenger.

Philadelphia Improving

The fact that a contract for street paving was given to the lowest bidder in Philadelphia has created a commotion in that city. They usually went to the biggest grafters.—Sunnyvale Standard.

Bigger Than His Associates

In the public estimation, Justice Harlan is a bigger jurist than all his associates put together; and there is a conviction abroad that, in the end, his contention that there is no such thing as "reasonable" or "unreasonable" trusts, will be written firmly into the decisions and law of the land.—Stockton Record.

Gleanings From the Press

OF FIFTY YEARS AGO

Monday, May 20, 1861

The California Legislature will adjourn today. Its session has extended over a period of nineteen weeks, or one hundred and thirty-three days. The number of Acts passed will exceed five hundred, four hundred and seventy-five having already been signed by the Governor, there remaining still in his possession between fifty and sixty.

The United States Marshal at San Francisco is alleged to have information of arms secreted in that city, designed for use by Secessionists in the South. He would undertake the capture last evening.

The Butte Record recommends John Bidwell for Governor, now that Governor Downey has failed in true loyalty. It says Bidwell is an unconditional Union man.

Suicide in Santa Clara County.—Samuel Weller, who was engaged in the lumber business at Lexington, Santa Clara county, recently committed suicide by taking morphine.

The Visalia Sun has seen sundry certificates of assay ore, which have been made by E. Justh, of San Francisco, from Potosi yields, and some of the assays show a value of $43.57 to the ton of ore. The smallest amount was $11 to the ton. The Sun thinks Potosi a humbug.

Wednesday, May 22, 1861

Colonel Joseph Hooker leaves (San Francisco) for the Atlantic Coast today (21st) to tender his services to the Federal Government.

Thursday, May 23, 1861

San Francisco, May 22d.—The new block of elegant cottages on Stockton street, near Sacramento, took fire this evening from the upsetting of a tinner's charcoal pan on the roof, and narrowly escaped destruction.

Friday, May 24, 1861

Late from Washoe.—The Territorial Enterprise of May 18th chronicles the following items: . . . .

Since the value of our mines has been demonstrated beyond a question, the increase in the value of timber tracts and water privileges has been very great. Water privileges, which a year since would not command hundreds now command thousands of dollars, and almost every available stream in the Territory is now claimed by somebody. . . . Timber tracts are being closed in. . . . The timber and water tracts will be, we think, in a few years, the real valuable investment of the country.

Saturday, May 25, 1861

Terry, ex-Justice of the Supreme Court, is reported to be making himself conspicuous in Nevada Territory, in speaking against and threatening the United States Government.

Showalter and Piercy, ex-members of the Legislature, left San Francisco yesterday morning for Sausalito, for the purpose, it was understood, of fighting a duel.

OF TODAY

Albany, N. Y., May 13.—More than 780,000 automobiles were registered in the capitals of various states of the Union on May 1st, according to a list compiled here. New York leads in the number of registrations with approximately 70,000. Pennsylvania and California come next with 40,000 each.

San Francisco, May 13.—Twelve students of the University of California left today for Alaska on the steamer President to spent their vacation in the mines at Treadwell.

Fresno, May 14.—Emma Goldman arrived in Fresno yesterday afternoon to give a couple of lectures under the auspices of the I. W. W.'s.

Portland, Ore., May 15.—A woman's hope that would not die and a wife's devotion that twenty-two years of disgrace and suffering could not alter were rewarded Saturday when the steamship Bear came into port and Chris Evans stepped off the gangplank, joining his aged wife.

San Francisco, May 15.—Governor Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey arrived here today from Los Angeles. He was the guest of the University Club at luncheon. Tonight he will be the guest of honor at a banquet, at which a number of prominent citizens will speak.

Governor Wilson will deliver tomorrow the annual Phi Beta Kappa address at the Greek Theater of the University of California.

San Francisco, May 17.—Both the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific will be double tracked between San Francisco and Chicago in time for the opening of the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco in 1915, according to an announcement made last night by Julius Kruttschnitt, Director of Maintenance and Operation for the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific, upon his arrival at the Bay.

Pasadena, Cal., May 17.—The thirty-third annual convention of the American Library Association will be opened tomorrow in this city. Delegates from coast points were pouring in today, while two special trains bearing librarians from all parts of the East are scheduled to arrive tomorrow. Seven hundred delegates are expected from points outside of Southern California, while an equal number will be in attendance from this section.

Oakland, May 18.—Henry P. Dalton, county assessor of Alameda county, was arrested here late today as he was leaving a downtown restaurant, where, it is alleged, he met a high official of the Spring Valley Water Company. District Attorney W. H. Donahue, by whose order the arrest was made, is authority for the statement that $5000 in marked bills were taken from Dalton following his arrest.

Sacramento, May 19.—The balance of the "Lucky" Baldwin estate inheritance tax was reported to State Controller A. B. Nye today from Los Angeles, showing that the State will receive $147,000, representing the tax and $7,461.28, interest. The estate previously paid to the State $100,000, making the total of $254,461.23 paid by the estate to the State of California.

San Francisco, May 19.—According to a Southern Pacific announcement half a business day will soon be cut from the San Francisco-Chicago time of the Southern Pacific-Union Pacific San Francisco Overland Limited enabling that train to make the trip in sixty-eight hours instead of seventy-two and a half.

"You have a fine lot of children, Binks," said Hawkins, as after a spin through the country they returned to the house for dinner. "How many are there?"

"Seven," said Binks, proudly.

"I've often wondered," said Hawkins, "whether you people with so many children have any favorites among them."

"Oh, no," returned Binks, hesitatingly; "that is to say, not consciously, but of course we are more interested in a 1911 model than in the earlier ones."—Harper's Weekly.

AN UNEQUALLED OFFER

The Twentieth Century Magazine. The leading original, illustrated monthly review in the Anglo-Saxon world devoted to clean, efficient and genuinely popular government. At all times fearless, outspoken and progressive. Subscription price, $2.00. Single copy, 25 cents.

A Forward Step for the Democracy of To-morrow, by Hon. William Thum, Mayor of Pasadena. One of the most significant volumes dealing with educational and politico-economic advance of recent years. Cloth. Price $1.00.

BOTH SENT POSTPAID FOR ONLY $2.00

THE BOOK

A Forward Step for the Democracy of Tomorrow

This volume by the recently elected mayor of Pasadena, is a work at once inspiring and suggestive, practical and idealistic. It deals with one of the most fundamental questions that confronts the public—the proper education of the young, and the giving to all children the opportunity to secure a high school education in such a way as to maintain their self-respect, broaden their general culture and develop their citizenship, while aiding the community. It is difficult to imagine any broad-visioned and thoughtful person, if he places manhood above money, who on reading this work will not give it his immediate and hearty endorsement.

It is a book for parents as well as educators and statesmen; a volume that all people interested in the coming race and the Republic of tomorrow should carefully read.

The following are some of the leading chapter titles:

Democracy, the High School and Self-supporting Students
Public Works High Schools
Manufacturing Works High Schools
The Heart-Mind and the School
Redeem National Resources and Help the Schools
A Study in Kinship; Church and School
A Fearless Church—A Better Country
The Sunday League
Social System—Education—Race Suicide

CRITICAL OPINIONS FROM EMINENT THINKERS

Edwin Markham, in an extended review of A Forward Step for the Democracy of To-morrow, says:

"Mr. Thum's work is full of stimulus toward good citizenship. May his blending of the ideal and the practical help toward establishing a better order for the youth of the nation—the youth who are the seed of the future."

Helen Campbell, the famous educator, economic authority and novelist, says:

"Mr. Thum outlines a program so feasible, so absolutely practical and wise, that one wonders why its principles may not be at once grasped and applied to every educational institution in the land. . . . "This book ought to be in the library of every social worker, no less than in every school. . . . There is not an impractical page between the covers, and its principles mean new life as surely as Burbank's theories have transmuted themselves into new possibilities for every foot of soil tilled by man."

Professor John Ward Stimson, A. M., the author of The Gate Beautiful, probably the most important art work written by an American scholar, says:

"There are few books which have given me greater pleasure to read than A Forward Step for the Democracy of To-morrow. Not only is the vital thought clearly, concisely and inspiringly expressed, but it is supremely timely, and its provisions for connecting high school education in a vital way with municipal and national operation of public utilities will appeal to serious-minded students of social and political advance no less than to those working for a broader and saner educational system."

B. O. Flower, founder of The Arena and editor of The Twentieth Century Magazine in the course of an extended book study says:

"A Forward Step for the Democracy of To-morrow is a work at once clear, simple and reason-compelling. Mr. William Thum has made an important contribution to the educational literature of progressive democracy. It is a work that is thoroughly practical yet nobly idealistic, and will appeal to broad-visioned educators, statesmen and parents who are great enough and wise enough to place manhood above money."

OUR SPECIAL OFFER

For the Goose and for the Gander.

A President was taking the Air on Pennsylvania Avenue, when he heard a Whiffling Sound behind him, and turning he beheld a Curious Thing dressed all in White and Diamonds.

"Whither away?" asked the President, whose curiosity was aroused.

"To the House to attend a meeting of the Committee on Territories," replied the White Thing.

"And is that a Bill you have in your hand?"

"Yes; it is an Act entititled an Act to amend an Act repealing an Act--"

"Kindly omit the Book of Acts," said the President. "What I want to Know is whereabouts is it likely to Strike the Executive Office. Am I Winner or Loser, and how much?"

"On that you will be pleased," said the White Thing, "for it changes the law as to Federal Judgeships in Alaska, Philippines and other Territories."

The President started. "What change would you make," he demanded hoarsely, "Speak, thou Fearful Guest, what change!"

"Hereafter," said the White Thing, pointing to the Bill, "You may continue to appoint judges, as you do now, but the power to remove them at will, which the present law gives you, is taken away."

"And why am I no longer allowed to Exercise the Recall?" asked the President in a Trembling Voice.

"Because you lack the Intelligence to make Removals. You have only just Brains enough to Appoint. When you have done that you are all In."

"Wait a moment" cried the President, grasping the White Toga of his Strange Companion. Where do you come from?"

"Arizona."

"And your Name?"

"Consistency," responded the other and all his Jewels Winked.

Should Resignation Suffice?

REPORT HAS IT that if the United States Senate concludes to have another investigation made of the Lorimer case Lorimer will resign. Will that settle it? Will that vindicate the senatorial majesty? Resignation will be accepted as tantamount to a confession of guilt. No honest senator would throw up the sponge and resign. An honest man would fight to the last ditch and keep on fighting until he achieved vindication or death. We have come upon evil times if one who has bought the highest office within the gift of his state may square accounts with nation and state by merely resigning. As well might the people of California give Henry P. Dalton quittance on condition that he resign his office as assessor of Alameda county. The idea is preposterous. Lorimer should either be vindicated or sent to Joliet to break rock for a decade. The grace of forgiveness is to be extended to those only who manifest contrition, not to those who merely get caught.

After Fifty Years

NOT MANY OF THE OLD SOLDIERS who marched in the processions on Memorial Day are under three score and ten. They must have behaved pretty well while in the service to have lasted so well after they came out of it. Not all the wounds of that conflict have healed but the bitterness and the sting have mainly sloughed out. We shall not be the united country that we ought to be until the Solid South ceases to be solid and southern men dare to call themselves Republicans as well as Democrats. Fifty years! But the negro is still a problem, a bone of contention, a menace to national tranquillity and fraternal affection. The North is long-suffering rather than reconciled to the unequal state of the negro in the South, for the North still holds the negro to be a man and men to have rights that are inalienable. It will not contentedly see the negro sink to peonage and to a permanently hopeless status of helotism. The South deserves our patience and our sympathy in dealing with the black problem, but the North deserves also that the problem be met in the spirit of loyalty to the manhood that is in the black man, with liberty to equality of opportunity if not to social recognition, which would be asking too much. Fifty years! It seems long, but it is not, anyhow not for working out a satisfactory solution for a problem like that of a black man in a white man's country. If the problem be solved in a hundred-fifty years the nation may think itself fortunate.

Wilful Failure to Provide

AMONG THE ENCOURAGING SIGNS of the times not many are to be hailed with more satisfaction than the tendency in judicial and administrative circles to close in on the deserter of families. In past years the husband and father who tired of his family, and walked off and left it, was accounted a good riddance and nothing was done with him, and yet he was a criminal of a type that needed to be dealt with, if for no other reason than to force home upon the minds of those who would marry, a consciousness of obligation to support their families as best they may if it takes a lifetime to do it, as it probably will. So generous has been the public, the state and the philanthropic institutions that, in California at least, a head of a family could do this and rest assured that his offspring would want for nothing except a father's love and that was generally of so indifferent a quality as to involve no great deprivation if lost. Such men leave their families partly because they tire of them but more frequently because their growing vices demand all that they can earn. A short turn at the hands of the law often works a marvelous change in such a person. With an open jail staring him in the face he bridles his appetites, nerves his ambitions and often makes a fairly decent and industrious citizen. One thing more is needed, a determination on the part of peace officers to hunt such men like horsethieves and laws to procure their extradition if they flee to another state. The consummation will justify the expense.

Poverty Made to Order

JOHN W. GATES, testifying before the House committee that has undertaken an investigation of the Steel Trust, tells us how Carnegie received $320,000,000 in 5 per cent bonds of the steel corporation for properties worth, at the outside, not more than $160,000,000. When asked what real value lay back of the common stock of the corporation, he declined to answer; but since the combined stock and bonds of the trust amounted to a billion dollars, and since the Carnegie properties constituted more than half of all the real value that went into the enterprise, Mr. Gates really means to tell us that two-thirds of the whole sum was water. On this water the people are now paying over $30,000,000 interest every year.

Of course this is only one example out of an infinite number that exist, but it will serve to make the system clear to us. In the year of grace 1900, three men, bearing the respective names of Gates, Schwab and Morgan, the greatest of these being Morgan, met and decided that every human being in the United States should be put down on the books of System & Co. as owing these three and their friends the sum of $10. Most of us were asleep at the time, for, according to Gates, they met at midnight; but even if we had been wide awake, we should have been none the wiser, and no more able to help ourselves. True, we may never be called upon to pay the principal of this debt, but the interest must be met regularly by us and our heirs and assigns forever and ever, Amen. No, not amen—a shorter and uglier word.

Ten dollars isn't very much, and the interest on it looks like fifty or sixty cents, so that does not worry us. But unfortunately about this same time, and before then, and after, Morgan was incessantly meeting up with other conspirators in directors' rooms, and putting down other sums against us in the mysterious day book of System & Co. So far as we know $10 was the biggest he ever put down at one pop, but time and again there were items like $4, $5 and $6, and as for the $1 and $2 items, they stretch out like the crack of doom. Ryan also was busy and Harriman and Rockefeller. Some of these fellows worked so hard at this business of chalking up items against us that they lost all the hair off their heads, and some of them actually died of exhaustion.

Of course the sum total of these items kept growing, and it is now gotten so big that none of us really dares look the thing in the face. However, most of us are so prosperous that we figure we can get out of the scrape some way, that is if the game will only stop now and not plunge us any deeper. But there are the fellows who have no surplus and small earning capacity. Every time one of these charges is entered on the books against them, it puts them that much deeper in the hole. By and by, they are in so far that it is quite hopeless for them to try to emerge. Bad business that.

War, pestilence and famine: those were the three great curses that impoverished the people and destroyed their happiness through the middle ages. As these disappear, we have provided another, that has latent powers more terrible than all the three together. It is over-capitalization. With the nation walled in by a tariff, with our industries gathered into trusts, with fluid capital under the control of two or three men, with our reactionary courts ready to defeat all efforts at legislation against the System, this power of unlimited issue of securities is, in the last analysis, the power to create poverty—and poverty is war, pestilence, famine—and hell.

Two Revolutions

THOUSANDS OF AMERICANS have, since the unpleasantness in Mexico broke out, been thanking their fortunate stars that no such thing as that could happen in the United States, we being a stable people not given to bloody violence and disorder. But how long has it been since American blood was being spilled at a rate that would soon depopulate Mexico, and in internecine conflict, too? Not so very long as reckoned in the life of a nation, not much longer ago than when Porfirio Diaz was winning immortal fame as a patriot, in fact just fifty years the 12th day of April last.

There are more parallelisms than divergencies in the lives of the two nations, come to think on them. Diaz established order with fire and sword after that he had become dictator. We only waved the bloody shirt on the one side and ku-kluxed on the other, spilling, not each other's blood, but the blood of the negro who was between the contending forces. Not being Indians, Grant and Lincoln were for forgiving and forgetting. Diaz, being an Indian, was for executing all who opposed him. Our way was better. There is no gainsaying that.

But after peace was established what divergence was there in national policies in the two contiguous countries? We began to develop (skin) the national heritage. We gave the people's lands to railroads and allowed corporations to grab them by the millions of acres. The Mexicans under Diaz did likewise. Diaz exploited the many for the advantage of the few who stood by him. So did our government with all who "took program," at the hands of the "powers that be." Diaz felt that if he brought prosperity to the relatively few great interests he was doing the best possible thing for the Mexican citizen, peon or other toiler, and, to this day, he confesses his inability to see where, in doing so, he made a mistake. Put the same question to J. Pierpont Morgan, to either of the Rockefellers, to Nelson A. Aldrich, or any of the other big standpatters and they will be able to see no flaw in the defense that Diaz has made before the world for his record. They hold, too, that, so far as the common man is concerned, wages is the only good, and employment at fair wages all that he has any right to ask for. Mexico's Diaz and our special interests will be found of one and the same mind, and not one of the "interests" on our side of the line but sympathizes with Diaz and feels that he has been shamefully abused by an ungrateful people.

Diaz preserved order and order is not only the first law of heaven but of hell, too. Our big ones insist that there must be order at all hazards. How else can the pockets of the masses be gone through with if they are not to be held securely while the search is being made? That is all that the special favorites of Diaz asked of him; that is all that our special interests ask of Uncle Sam, that he make the people hold still while the resources of the nation are ravished and cashed in; while business men run their own business just as they are of a mind to. Each business man and corporation of them will take care of the rest.

But Porfirio Diaz made one supreme mistake. He concerned himself for the credit of his nation in the financial markets of the world, for the opening of mines, the building of railroads, the dredging of harbors and the production of crops; for the beautifying of the cities and the inducement of immigration, but he forgot to make his people fit for governing themselves. He forgot to build school houses on the ground as well as on paper, and to prevent usurpations of authority by big corporations and rich favorites. We have done better in these respects, we The People, not we the American government, for our legislatures have been subjugated, our courts packed, our electorate corrupted, seats in our national Senate bought as certainly as in Mexico.

And what has Mexican insurgency been fighting for that American insurgency has not? The followers of Madero have been fighting for a square deal. So have the followers of Roosevelt, La Follette, Cummins, Hiram Johnson. The methods of the two revolutions have been different, but the justification, the inspiration, the purpose in hand have not been different. There have been more of parallelisms than of divergencies. At bottom, on both sides of the line, a mighty conflict has been raging for liberty, for equality of opportunity, for justice at the hands of judges not selected because of their partiality for the special powers that made them judges. Our Mexican brothers have shed much blood in their cause. We have shed printer's ink, our coats and our fears and, so far, nothing more, and yet the gringo and the greaser are nearer in fraternity of purpose than many think.

Industrial Freedom Myth

A CURIOUS DOCTRINE has developed of late years among the wealthier class of business men in some parts of California, to the effect that Los Angeles enjoys a high degree of what they call "industrial freedom," due to the persistent attacks on labor unions by the Times newspaper of that city.

By industrial freedom some employers mean freedom on their part to secure workers at any price they choose to pay, and under any conditions they choose to inflict, without interference from law, public sentiment or labor organizations. In Georgia and South Carolina, industrial freedom means putting little children to work all night. In the mills at Pittsburg, industrial freedom means unorganized Hungarians at $1.40 a day who are old men at 40 years. In the New York sweat shops, industrial freedom means that women work 16 hours a day, and very nearly starve at that.

Industrial freedom of that kind is not to be found at Los Angeles; but what is to be found in that city is comparative industrial good order. There are strikes, but they are infrequent and rarely of long duration. There have been no cases of rioting or serious damage of property, if we except the two instances of the use of dynamite, for which trials are now under way. Nearly all lines of industry where labor is employed are prosperous, and the number of laborers steadily on the increase. As a rule the open shop prevails, although there are lines that are closed to non-unionists, and other lines that are closed to unionists. The unions themselves are well filled as to membership, and they seem satisfied with conditions generally.

This is a state of things which we feel may justly be described as comparative industrial good order. It is not perfection; but considering the stories that come from other cities of incessant strikes, of languishing trades, and of labor unionism absolutely dominating city authorities, Los Angeles has reason to congratulate itself that things are no worse.

What relation does the Times hold toward all this? Just about the relation that chanticleer does to the rising of the sun.

This is a world where a great many people, particularly those of the pompous and conceited order, manage to get themselves taken at their own valuation. It is not alone for the gold brick operator that new suckers are born every minute. Every time Nature turns out a puffy, strutting rooster in human form, she turns out also a liberal contingent of easy-marks to bow as he passes and say, "What a remarkable man!"

The way to test a myth is to follow it to its home. Through the Eastern part of the United States, you will find that nine people out of ten who know anything at all about Los Angeles think its so-called "industrial freedom" is due to the Times. Coming West the percentage drops. When you get to San Francisco it is down to about two out of ten. In Los Angeles the idea now is confined chiefly to imported labor leaders and those who can use the paper for exploitation—its own particular line of toadies.

The reason Los Angeles enjoys industrial good order is that it has an aggressive and intelligent citizenship that is steadily on the job. This shows not only in the industrial good order, but also in good city government generally. The people of Los Angeles have never truckled to labor unions politically, nor to any other special interest; but have run their affairs on a just basis for the welfare of all. For a long period of years the Times has been the open and avowed friend of all special interests in corporate form, and it has sought by every device to break down and demoralize decent citizenship and to build up machine politics in Los Angeles. Its vulgarity, its low moral standards, its constant abuse of honorable and efficient men in office have all tended, as far as its influence would carry, to discourage and hamper those who strove for justice, fair dealing and good order. Its indiscriminate and bitter attacks on all who labor for their bread may have pleased a few reactionary bigots, but with the great mass of Los Angeles people they are a source of shame and disgust. This paper has of late attempted a more liberal policy, declaring that it opposes only the bad unions. Let anyone who has the time to waste search its columns for the last decade, and find, if he can, one word in behalf of legislation to help the worker, one line in support of arbitration, one paragraph in favor of any kind of labor organization. It is not there. He will find only the sneers and contempt that snobbish wealth feels toward the lowly and unprosperous.

Every intelligent, fair-minded citizen of Los Angeles and every adherent of the cause of good government throughout the State owes it to the Truth to do what he can to destroy this ignoble myth.

Passing of Shams

DIAZ FUIT. He goes out of history by the rear exit, entering the path that leads not to eternal fame but to hasty and immediate oblivion. He has suffered the fate that sometimes, but not always, falls upon the pseudo-great—that of being found out. Call no man happy until he is dead. If the bony hand had rattled against his door panel ten years ago, when the writers were acclaiming him as the maker of a great nation, he might have escaped to the Elysian Fields with his plundered reputation. History might have dug into him and revealed the sawdust stuffing—and then again it might have bee fooled like the rest of us. Clio has her blind side. But fate let him live on well into the new century, the century that asks questions and brutally dissects the answers. And so there came the national swift kick, heraus mit 'im, and the Down-and-Out Club has another active member.

It is the epoch of the passing of the great shams. Great work, and only at its beginning. Humanity has secured a new broom, which is thrust into dark corners, bringing out the bloated old spiders, the squealing, useless mice and the accumulated muck and ashes of the past. Call the broom what you like—universal education, democracy, the spirit of inquiry, science, pragmatism, the Missouri idea, Roosevelt—whatever it is, it works. It gets the results. Civilization points its finger at Castro of Venezuela, and he fades. The Young Turks fall in, and Abdul Hamid falls out. "Let me be the goat," says Aldrich, and the people take him for a starter. "We can reform ourselves," shriek the English Peers. "Yes, after we are done with you," responds Lloyd George. The tariff blows up. A huge cloud of Lame Ducks is seen over the Capitol at Washington. Southern Pacific is ditched in California. Lorimer makes the Senate look just like it is. Old General Prosperity begins to wonder whether he is the real thing or a fake.

All this is merely up to date. If we might roll back the curtain a few years, no doubt these would seem little more than a prelude to the magnum opus upon which humanity has entered. A veritable stampede of the shams is about to begin. There is a community of interest among these creatures, a close family relationship. Sawdust is thicker than water. Every time a big one is snaked out, a lot of smaller ones come to light wriggling all about him. And the downfall of one opens the way for the overthrow of many others, for they have braced and bulwarked one another against attack. Thus in Mexico, clustered about the sham president, were the "Cientificos," who exploited the resources of the nation to the people's loss, there were a thousand petty tyrants in public office, there was a peonage system which was worse than Afro-American slavery, there was a complete suppression of free speech and of the aspirations of twelve million people to govern themselves. Thus again in our own country, back of the one great central sham that pervades our laws and courts, our government and institutions generally, and rules in the minds of most of us, viz., that money is of more importance than manhood—back of this lie ten thousand forms of sham and evil, the inheritance of all the centuries of human ignorance and error that have preceded the day in which we live. One by one we are pulling them out to the light and annihilating them. Some need only the light; others resist to the last. For a long time it was slow, heart-breaking work, now it is coming a good deal faster. It will never be finished. The problem is that of the line that always approaches but never reaches the given point. But that does not disturb us. Man is an animated desire for something better. His only real happiness lies in putting good where bad has been, in substituting knowledge for ignorance, in throwing out the sham to make room for Truth.

Senate Constitutional Amendment Number 2

(This series of articles on the proposed constitutional amendments is intended mainly to open the discussion. The writer of them had not the advantage of hearing them discussed in committee and before the Legislature and the views he holds regarding them are confessedly inexpert, but these amendments demand attention and the writer will handle them as best he may according to his lights. Discussion of them is cordially invited.)

THIS AMENDMENT proposes to the people of California that Section 14 of Article 11 shall be made to read thus: "The Legislature may, by general and uniform laws, provide for the inspection, measurement and graduation of merchandise, manufactured articles and commodities, and may provide for the appointment of such officers as may be necessary for such inspection, measurement and graduation."

In order to illustrate the significance of the proposed constitutional change nothing better can be done than to copy entire Section 14 as it now stands in our constitution. It reads thus: "No state office shall be continued or created in any county, city, town or other municipality for the inspection, measurement or graduation of any merchandise, manufacture or commodity; but such county, city, town or municipality may, when authorized by general law, appoint such officers."

The constitution as it is relegates the whole subject of short weight and measure to local authority and local authority has relegated the whole subject to the good or bad inclinations of manufacturers and dealers, with the result that the buyer gets the short end of very many transactions in the retail trade. The proposed amendment will take the subject out of the hands of local communities, which have neglected it, and undertake to bring upon short-weight and short-measure dealers the power of state authority to set them right.

Civilization is of ignoble origin. Our whole system of jurisprudence arose from a public need somehow to regulate and restrain private vengeance. The quest for justice, the supreme earthly quest of all the ages, originated in a quest for vengeance against one's adversary. Our whole system of coinage grew out of the tendency of private coiners to debase the coins they cast. Time was when every dealer had to bite or ring on the counter every coin he took in order to make sure against a debased medium of exchange. Fixed standards of weights and measures were forced by a universal need for protection against the short-weight and short-measure petty larcenist. Millionaires have been created through the commission of innumerable petty larcenies. In short, ignoble man has, from the dawn of history, preferred to get on by theft rather than by labor if he could do so safely. Indeed brigandage preceded barter and theft preceded brigandage. All the crimes of all history are daily committed still and civilization chiefly consists in the prevention and punishment of such crimes. That the state has so long neglected this clear field for the exercise of sovereign power is not creditable to the state.

Just how far the consumers of California suffer from this short-weight and short-measure species of petty larceny the writer does not know, but investigation in other states and in large cities has shown the suffering to be great and scarcely to be borne. Especially is this true of the poor who buy in littles and are in innumerable littles robbed. The dishonesty of one dealer tempts other dealers to be dishonest through force of competition.

Dishonesty is our national sin and opportunity for dishonesty leads us into temptation. Our daily prayer and constant care should be to avoid, as far as we may, that temptation. A good corps of trained inspectors, roaming over the state, dropping into business houses when least expected to test scales, measures and standards generally, would have as wholesome an effect upon square dealing as the pure food and pure drug laws have had and are having, and that will be a great gain toward justice.

It is in vain that we inveigh against swarms of officials and an unwonted degree of regulation. In sparsely settled communities, with few dealers and few customers and no poor hovering close to the pauper line, little regulation and few officials are needed, but as population increases and society becomes complex, and especially as a large population of hand-to-mouth dependents swarm our cities and villages, the strong hand of the state must be put forth for their protection or many will fall below the poverty line instead of maintaining themselves above it.

The wholesale and retail petty larcenist and manufacturer is abroad in the land. He must be seen to by our state and the first step to take toward seeing to him is to adopt Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Two. Vote "yes."

Here in the United States we are trying to make the Senate really representative of public opinion. Over in England, the people are engaged in a similar task—that of removing from the path of progress their bourbon House of Lords. In both countries the highest legislative body is in the grip of Special Privilege. In ours it is the Money Power; in theirs, Landlordism. And while we see The System, with its bell-wether statesmanship, steadily giving way before the onrush of popular government, it is good to learn the progress our neighbors across the water are making in throwing off the yoke of the hereditary Lords. It is an inspiring story; one that will find quick response in the hearts of liberty-loving Americans. The forces of democracy are mighty forces, and they are now moving, in tide-like unison, the world over. But are the people of England to free themselves from bourbonism in government before we have fairly made a start?—La Follette's.

Senator Gallinger, the almost-not-quite new president pro tem., appeared in the Senate the other day in a serge suit. This caused Senator Cummins to inquire whether the New Hampshire senator couldn't now be classed as an "in-serge-gent." And yet they talk of nominating for the presidency a man who will spring such a pun as that!—"The Pathfinder" (Wash., D. C.)

Is the President A Poor Politician? We have been told a great many times that President Taft is a thoroughly poor politician. Perhaps he was when he began his present job. Perhaps he has learned something since and perhaps he has been fooling us from the first. Anyhow he seems more recently to have been doing some very good politics. The likeliest man in the country to oppose him for a renomination was Charles E. Hughes and the President put him on the supreme bench where he fits his environment, and Mr. Justice Hughes has said "no" even before the proposer could get the proposal fairly out of his mouth. He is where he wants to be and there he wants to stay. Ballinger was an incubus and a red flag to insurgency and Taft bowed him out of office with a gracious smile and many assurances of esteem but put in his place the best man that could have been selected to placate the progressives, and he appears to have given Fisher that job. Secretary Dickinson was and is a Democrat and his fence building for Taft was inconsequential, so out he went, with all dignity to be sure, but he went, and in his place came Stimson, the ideal of the progressives of the East. If the President is not in fact a good politician he has secured the services of some mighty good political adviser and seems to be taking his advice.

Walter Fisher For Governor Scarcely had Walter L. Fisher warmed the seat lately occupied by the rigid, frigid Ballinger than there began to sprout or incubate something that betokens life—his candidacy for governor of Illinois. Did the President pass out hunches to the right persons out in Illinois to the effect that it would be proper to make Fisher "it," and let Deneen come to the Senate when Lorimer is kicked out, as he will be? And how could Fisher or his friends try to keep the convention vote of Illinois away from Taft while Fisher is needing to hold the party together to secure his own election as certainly as will Taft need to hold it together to effect his own? Murray Crane and Cabot Lodge are reported to have taken the contract to deliver the New England delegations next year to Taft, a thing they would not have attempted if Taft were not acceptable to the standpatters, as of course he is, or at least so fairly so that they will not think of putting up an out-and-out standpatter with any hope of nominating or electing him. This in spite of the fact that Joe Cannon expectorates had words in the direction of the President whenever he changes his quid to the other side of his mouth. He does not mean much by it. On the whole, some pretty fair political work is being done on behalf of the President's candidacy to succeed himself.

Where the Convention Is Likely to Be Held Kansas City has a big auditorium of which it is justly proud, but a year hence Kansas City will be in the throes of a change from the present union depot to a bigger and better one and so cannot handle the crowds without great difficulty. Denver is equipped to hold the convention, but has made no start. Chicago became convention tired some years since and seems to be doing nothing, but St. Louis, rarely heard from unless something of the sort is going on, is right after the Republican national convention of 1912, anyhow, and would like the Democratic too. Why not? It is centrally located and wants it and as no other city seems to, it would be discourteous to reject St. Louis and quarter the convention on to some community that does not care for it.

Direct Legislation May Be the Issue There are indications that direct legislation may become the national issue for 1912. The standpat element wants to preserve representative government for the very reason that it does not represent. They believe government safer that way. They fear government by pow-wow, by popular vote, by the inconsiderate action of volatile people who take counsel with their discontent rather than with their better senses, "trial by tumult," etc. In their hearts they feel that rich men instinctively know about affairs of government and that The People do not know about them unless they learn of men of affairs. They will set their faces sternly against any change in the established methods of legislating, adjudicating and administering the laws. They know how to use the old tools of government and inasmuch as it is hard for old dogs to learn new tricks, and the standpatters are nearly all old dogs, they have no desire to change.

Per contra, the progressive element, no matter which party it is in, regretfully concedes the inadequacy of the old methods of government. Not feeling too sure that The People will always act considerately or with great wisdom, they nevertheless prefer to trust them than to trust the "interests," which, however good their judgments or wide their knowledge, are unfortunately possessed of the devil of selfishness and cannot be trusted to legislate for the common good where a special good seems to be within their reach. On the one side The People are distrusted; on the other, the integrity of those folks who are not The People, whoever they are and whatever they look like. No one need be surprised if direct legislation, the initiative, referendum and recall, shall be the paramount national issue next year. It begins to look like it.

What Candidates Fit This Issue? Mr. Taft is not for direct legislation. He took Oklahoma severely to task for adopting these political instrumentalities into its constitution, and he has insisted that if Arizona is to come into the Union with the recall of the judiciary in its constitution the people of Arizona must adopt the plank deliberately and when they have nothing else to think of. He would very well represent that element in our national life that would cling to the old methods, methods that remotely respond to public sentiment, if at all, but that are not immediately responsive and because they are not, are considered prudent and wise and good to hold fast to.

On the other side the range of choice is not broad. Woodrow Wilson balks at the recall of the judiciary. It is not probable that the advocates of direct legislation will implacably insist that the recall of the judiciary shall be accepted, too, but if they do Mr. Bryan fills that bill and so does Senator La Follette. Col. Roosevelt stands midway between Wilson and Bryan, ready to apply the recall to judges where, as in California, some of them manifestly need recalling, but reluctant to insist upon the right where judges have not seriously misbehaved. Mr. Bryan is a possibility, but not a probability. Mr. Woodrow Wilson would seem to be the probability as more likely to bring progressive Republicans over the party line to him than La Follette would be to bring enough Democrats over the line to him to afford a fighting chance for success in November, 1912. These are only maybe's, not sure things.

Are Our Suffragists Just a Trifle Slow? The Suffrage movement in California is not moving as The Watchman anticipated that it would. If report be well founded the Royal Arch was first in the arena with a paid lady speaker of much charm and wit to oppose giving women the franchise, but about all that has been done on behalf of women who would vote has been to ask the ministers to preach sermons for it, which not many seem likely to do. Some sidestepped, some opposed bringing such subjects into the pulpit and not very many will espouse the cause from the pulpit. In Rev. Dr. Aked the women have a Protestant champion who is unafraid and in Rev. Father Gleason, a Catholic prelate, who believes in suffrage in no half-hearted way. It is a moral issue, a fact that the Royal Arch seems to have been quick to realize, and the clergy certainly should be as heartily for it as the Royal Arch against it, but not very much seems to be doing. There was a chance for the women of California, who want the suffrage, to make the issue the paramount one at the special election in October if they had "gone to it." In 1896 "sixteen to one" had the center of the boards and could not be dislodged from it. In this special election there is no other issue, except the issue of direct legislation, comparable to this one, and the welkin ought to be ringing for the cause. There are only about four months 'till the harvest, whatever it is to be. All that The Watchman can say is: "Up and at them."

A Natural Solicitude Senator Lester G. Burnett, in writing to this paper to correct the error made in our review of legislative work, May 13, of attributing to Assemblyman Clark the authorship and charge of the bill to establish a State reformatory, whereas it was Senator Young who had that work in hand, goes on to express a not unnatural solicitude for the purchase of good land and not some refuse piece that will be sought to be sold to the State because no one else will buy it. The Watchman does not know the full personnel of the committee to whose hands this purchase has been entrusted, but there are at least two members of the five who can safely be trusted: the Governor and the Lieutenant-Governor. Lieutenant-Governor Wallace knows land, and Governor Johnson, whether an expert on realty or not, knows what's right from what's not right and will not stand the thing that is not straight up and straight out, no not for a minute, and if the other three, whoever they may be, should wish to do the wrong thing the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor would make such a "holler" that no wrong use of that money could possibly be made effective. We think the anxiety of Senator Burnett, while not unnatural in view of things that have been done in past years, warrants nothing more than a public interest in the exercise of sound judgment in making the selection. The integrity of the transaction will never be brought into question.

Some State Land Deals Some of the state's land deals have been fearful to contemplate. The San Quentin tract had been "bricked off," all that could be, before the residue was sold to the State and by the time that the brick-makers get through with a tract of land small inducements for agriculturists are left. Besides, a young mountain had to be taken down and a hole filled up before room could be made for the erection of the new cell houses. The Folsom site has some water power and a moderate supply of rock, but otherwise it is a Tophet, deserved, perhaps, and certainly not a bad preparation for an abode wherein the gate hinges glow. There is some good land at the Home for Feeble Minded at Eldridge, but the greater part of it will hardly keep a cow to each ten acres. At Napa hundreds of acres have had to be purchased in order to make up for the deficiencies of the original tract. The land purchased for the Preston Industrial School at Ione is a slumgullion in winter and as hard as granite in summer, about as unpromising a proposition for farming as one may find in a day's travel. The only saving grace of that venture is a commanding outlook. The land owned by the Stockton hospital is good, that at Agnews fair but insufficient, that of the State farm at Davis all right. California has proven a "good thing" in more than one real estate transaction, but hereafter it will he different. The old order has changed, let us hope, permanently, for in the old days there were jobbers abroad and unterrified.

The Needs of A Reformatory Good land is not a bad thing for a reformatory to possess. Facilities for transportation for persons and products should be a first consideration and those facilities should be both by land and water. Power must also be a consideration, either oil or electric or both, but with transmission of electric energy as well worked out as it now is that need not be difficult. A matter of greatest importance, however, is an abundant supply of water. In supplying some of its institutions with water California has been put to great cost and sorely plagued. But after all it will he found that the reformatory for first offenders will have to be mainly industrial and not agricultural. Agriculture is only one of thirty or more occupations that will need to be taught. Those needing to be reformed will mainly come from the cities and to the cities they will return. Why teach such as these agriculture? Why not teach them something that they can do to make a living where they will indubitably choose to live? The state will have to meet the wishes of its wards in this respect or meet failure. The institution must be a trade school and to some extent an agricultural school, and only to a slight extent either a manufactory or a state farm to supply other state institutions with agricultural products. A quarter section will be enough for the men. The cows may need more.

California Has Forced the Issue The higher-ups in the San Francisco graft cases did not foresee that they were precipitating national issues that may revolutionize the government of the whole country, but they were doing just that. The eyes of the nation became focussed upon California as a result of the graft prosecutions and when, through the direct primary and the splendid canvass that Hiram Johnson made, the interests and the higher-ups generally were kicked out of office the nation welcomed the direct primary with open arms. From a direct primary to direct legislation is only a step and a very natural step to take. California is going to take it.

At Pasadena last week Governor Johnson sounded the keynote of the amendment campaign now on. It is direct legislation. The women might have made the suffrage issue rank first if they had gotten into the campaign first, but direct legislation seems likely to take first place and for this irrefragable reason: It is only through direct legislation that Californians can make sure that the old crowd cannot get back into power again. Their only chance to come back is through the apathy of voters in electing their legislators, such apathy permitting the Herrinites to resume business at the old stand first thing we know. But with the powers of direct legislation in the hands of The People they can't, don't you know. With the initiative, referendum and recall available The People can rise up and, forthwith, (not two years after), undo any evil thing that a programmed legislature does. These innovations are anchors to windward and should be cast where they are sure to get a tight hold. Governor Johnson's keynote speech settled the October issue.

"PASSING ON" THE BEGGAR

The beggar long ago discovered that a ticket to some other place where he can trouble us no more is the thing above all others which we give with the greatest cheerfulness to the applicant for aid. As a result an agency in a railroad town out of a total relief expenditure of $300 a year used $240 for railroad tickets to nearby communities.

The officials of neighboring places returned the compliment. All were busily giving transportation to meet the demand which they themselves had created by "passing on" the procession of charity-rate travellers. "What else could they do?" Surely something better than this.

Over 400 public and private agencies refuse to buy railroad tickets for applicants except straight through to destination and then only to those who will be better off there.

The adoption of this rule in one city reduced to one-half the amount spent for railway tickets. How badly some sane method of regulating the evil of "passing on" is needed, is shown by an instance given by Mary E. Richmond in The Survey.

"A feeble-minded woman, young and good-looking, applied to the county officials of a western state, saying that she came from Kansas. The county promptly sent her to another county, which as promptly sent her back again. Weeping and in great distress, she was sent again and was again returned, this second time in the custody of the county clerk. Such contests are not unknown over the insane."

SENATORIAL SKITS

Number 16

By the Onlooker

JOHN W. STETSON

Step right up to the bar of the Senate, ladies and gentlemen, and listen to the Hon. John W. Stetson of Oakland, giving tongue to the following eloquent verbiage on the subject of San Francisco:

"Serene, indifferent to fate,
Thou 'sittest by the Golden Gate."

At this juncture you begin to wonder where you have heard these eloquent verbiage before, when you observe that the Hon. John W. Stetson is oppressed by the same amaze, and is going on a still hunt to find out. Judging by his burrowings, you might imagine that she was sitting under a file of assembly bills, between a letter from a clergyman protesting against the Hon. John W.'s vote on the Local Option bill and another protest from the Royal Arch on the same subject, and you are just about decided that you heard it originally in McGuffey's Third Reader—when suddenly both your guesses prove to be wrong: the Hon. John W. Stetson has found her sitting in his left-hand coat pocket, next to a package of Egyptienne Dreams (cork-tips), and has dragged her forth to continue on her triumphant way as follows:

Senator Stetson

"Ta-tum, te-tum-te tum, te tum, Tra-la, la, la, la, la, la,"

or words to that effect—the senator concluding this happy reference by the remark, "As Bret Harte sang in those never-to-be forgotten lines:"

Of course, after a while, you remember that the honorable senator is making a speech against state endowment of Throop Polytechnic at Pasadena, and you wonder what the dickens the Golden Gate has to do with that. Nothing, we may enlighten you at once; nothing. But what has anything to do with an oration, anyway? Again, we say, nothing. In other words, the Hon. John W. Stetson has been making an oration, and he has be n burning a few yards of the old fashioned pyrotechnic fuse just because that's the style in oratory. No matter if the fuse got wet and sputtered: she flared up after a while.

But what, you ask, what has all this to do with anything in particular? Gentle stranger, we called it thus longly to your attention simply to let you know the worst about Senator Stetson. That was his first, last and unique performance as a verbal gymnast during the whole session, and we note it to his credit that his galleon of guff promptly grounded on the mud flats opposite the Golden Gate and stuck, proving that he wasn't used to that sort of navigation.

For, you see, John W. Stetson is a likeable person, a great, big wholesome, strapping, broad-shouldered, two-fisted, English country squire sort of a fellow, a whole lot too manly and honest to incline naturally toward the arts and insincerities of clap-trap oratory, so it was pleasant to hear his joints creak when he tried that kind of thing. All the rest of the session (in fact, through all the rest of that very able speech) when you wanted to know what he thought, the Hon. John W. stood up in the front row, put his hands in his coat pockets to get them out of the way, and proceeded to tell you as if he were arguing the whole thing over in his mind the way he did when he first arrived at his present opinion. He was short on grace, but long on earnestness and convincing appeal when he talked this way.

In addition to being one of the most influential members on the floor, by reason of his character and personality, Stetson was chairman of the judiciary committee, one of the three big committees of the Senate and in some respects the most important of the three. He had charge of the railroad bill in the senate, and was its principal author. His record for intelligence, courage, independence and sympathy with reform ranked him as one of the three or four biggest men in the last legislature.

LET THE SCHOOLHOUSE HELP TO MOLD OUR CITIZENSHIP

School houses are the people's property, and for God's sake open them for the people's use. The town meetings have vanished. In our city life we have grown so big we do not recognize each other. Encourage the school community plan. Let the labor and the political meetings in, for if our politics have grown rotten it's time they were let in for the salvation of good citizenship.

Plan your city with playgrounds, because playgrounds today mean good citizenship of tomorrow. You can't make a whole man out of half a boy, and unless the boy can run across the greensward and shout himself hoarse, you have no man of him.

Plan civic centers for your school houses. Install the games and the lectures. I am not afraid to allow labor unions or politicians to have their meetings in the school houses. The whole secret of municipal progress lies in knowing what to do, and then doing it.—Jacob Riis.

The Initiative and Referendum

An Effective Ally of Representative Government

By LEWIS JEROME JOHNSON

Professor of Civil Engineering, Harvard University

(Based upon an article in the New England Magazine, June, 1909, and the Chicago Public, of July 30, 1909, and published in this form by the Massachusetts Direct Legislation League.)

Our fathers founded this government in order to secure for the people—all the people—the blessings of life, liberty and happiness. They devised institutions and machinery to that end

Today, after the lapse of a century and a quarter, combinations of power have grown up under these institutions, in the face of which, for multitudes of our population, life is precarious, liberty practically despaired of, and happiness, except of a kind enjoyed by the Roman proletariat or the plantation slave, unknown. We know that no one would be more impatient of such conditions than our revolutionary forefathers, and no one more resolute in seeking a remedy. Honor to their memory requires us to scrutinize their work, and to modernize it if necessary, just as they modernized their inherited institutions.

Ideals of the Fathers Not at Fault

Accordingly we turn first to the spirit and purposes underlying our institutions. We find nothing to criticize, even after all this time. We can suggest no improvements in this quarter. Even now we are inspired with a new enthusiasm by the ideals expressed by our fathers in founding this Republic, the ideals so impressively reaffirmed by Lincoln at Gettysburg.

Scrutiny of Their Governmental Machinery

We turn next to the details of their governmental machinery. Little is left of their industrial methods and institutions, and perhaps their political devices too are out of date. If they are, possibly it is not too late to supplement them or replace them with better.

The legislative machinery underlies all else. We observe that our law-making is entrusted to representative bodies. The make-up of these bodies is, nominally at least, under public control, but the output (except amendments to state constitutions) is not even nominally under public control, except as such control may be exerted through pressure upon individual representatives. When we consider the extent to which such pressure is exerted today by the greedy and highly organized few, rather than by the merely normally interested and unorganized many, a legislative system which may have been safe once comes to look decidedly defective.

A Fundamental Defect.

Further reflection convinces us that this lack of adequate popular control of results is not only a defect but is the fundamental defect in our legislative mechanism. Its correction is therefore essential, and is logically the first step in the modernization of our political machinery. This done, improved legislation is assured as fast as the majority can agree upon it. This done, all unnecessary and undesirable obstacles to progress will have been minimized. Until this is done, we have little reason to hope for permanently better conditions, except at an utterly unreasonable cost in effort and delay. The importance of concentrating attention upon this issue is manifest.

What Can Be Done

The next question is, How shall the public get adequate control of results?

The answer is, We must assert our natural right to revise the work of our representatives. We must do this revising ourselves. There is no one else to do it. To do it we must supplement the existing legislative machinery with a workable, orderly, and properly guarded contrivance to enable us to enact laws, to veto them, to amend them or to repeal them by direct popular vote over the head of legislatures and city councils, in the instances when these bodies fail to meet the public will. In other words, we must considerably extend the practice of direct legislation by the people, already familiar to us in the New England town meeting and in the popular ratification of amendments to state Constitutions.

Fortunately the way to do this has been devised and tested and has met expectations on a city-wide and state-wide scale. It involves two devices developed in the last few decades, the Initiative and the Referendum, now included under the single term Direct Legislation. . . .

(Here follows a description of the initiative and referendum, and their practical workings.)

Hopeful Outlook for Representative Government

Supplemented by the initiative and referendum, to serve as a permanent background, and for application when called for, the representative system will gradually but surely enter upon a period of honor and usefulness hitherto never surpassed and probably never equaled. Relieved of the unnatural excess of power under which they now stagger and sometimes fall, legislative bodies will cease to be attractive objects for bribery and secret influence. Log-rolling will greatly diminish. The power of bosses and rings will be undermined. Seats in the legislatures will then begin to be unattractive to grafters. At the same time they will become more attractive to high-minded, public-spirited citizens. There will be a fairer chance that a man clean when elected will stay clean. It will make it safe to reduce the size of legislatures and to diminish greatly the number of elective officers. The party machines and bosses once permanently out of control, we may reach the point of competing successfully with the corporations in attracting the best young talent to the public service.

With direct legislation in vogue, it is not necessary to retire a faithful legislator to express disapproval of some of his measures. The electorate, while returning the man to office, can overrule the measures with no more reflection on his honor or usefulness than is involved in the overruling of a lower court by a higher. Honest and able representatives are hence likely to be repeatedly re-elected. Long tenure is as valuable to public as to private business. Where the people have been in control long enough for this result to show, as in Switzerland and in the New England towns, they are seen to act upon this principle. In Switzerland it is rare that a new member appears in a legislative body except to fill a vacancy due to death or voluntary retirement. In New England towns it is common for faithful officials to be retained in office practically for life, their annual re-elections being frequently uncontested.

With a seat in the legislature thus robbed of its charms for all but the public-spirited, and with re-election practically assured to men of proved merit, real legislative experts in good number may gradually be developed.

Representative Government Yet to Be Given a Fair Trial

In view of such untested possibilities, it is beside the mark to wonder whether representative government is a failure. We begin to realize that it has not yet been fairly tried, at least not in recent years. We realize that our legislators have been working under almost intolerable conditions. They have been continually exposed to temptations that no ordinary man ought to be asked to face, and it is a tribute to human nature that so many of our legislators have stayed straight. Under direct legislation legislators will have all the power that is ever accorded to representatives and agents in business, which is all that is wholesome or attractive to worthy citizens of a democratic republic. That final enacting power is far from essential to the dignity of a legislative body is shown by the universal respect in which our American constitutional conventions have always been held.

Improved Status of the Voter

While a sufficiency of power is thus left with the representatives, a salutary increase of responsibility is thrown upon the voter. It brings him, to some purpose, into closer touch with great affairs. It enables him to vote for measures apart from men, and for men apart from measures. He can begin to assume the stature of a man, to become a sovereign in fact as well as in fancy. It will enable him to settle something at an election besides the party label of officeholders, which in turn settles little except which faction shall dispense the spoils of office. For we know only too well that platforms are "merely to get in on, not to ride on." Even if they were expected to be observed, platforms are composites which rarely represent, except in the roughest way, the views of any one thoughtful voter.

Simplicity of the Voter's Task.

The new task proposed for the voter, though inspiring, is relatively simple. It differs widely from legislation in the ordinary sense.

The originating and drafting of bills can manifestly never fall as a burden on the mass of the voters. For this service the community can always command ability as wise, disinterested and as practiced in legislation as any who now do such work. The average voter's part in the work is deliberation, discussion and the registry of his decision. This is no new task for him; the only novelty is in having a chance to do it intelligently, and to see his decision go into effect.

The voter, going into the booth, has known for months just what is coming up and in just what form it is coming up. There is no thought of possible amendment. With regard to each measure he has simply to approve or reject. He has had plenty of time to make up his mind. If a measure is objectionable in purpose or form, or is lacking in clearness, he will of course reject it and await—or cause—its reappearance in a more acceptable form at a subsequent election.

The voter is thus more like a juror than like a legislator. His capacity for intelligent, discriminating work at a single election is therefore large—much larger, as experience shows, than at first thought might seem possible.

In 1909, for example, the voters of Portland, Oregon, in a city election, besides voting for mayor and other officers, voted discriminatingly and with sustained interest on thirty-five measures, thirteen of which they passed. The average vote on each of the thirty-five measures was slightly over eighty-one per cent of the total vote for mayor, with a range from seventy-five per cent to ninety per cent. The majorities, both yes and no, were sometimes heavy, sometimes light. There is every evidence that the voting in each case reflected the calm judgment of the voters.

In Denver, in the election of May, 1910, the voters, besides electing city officers, dealt discriminatingly with a list of twenty-one measures, some of them trickily worded. Moreover, in this case, they had to face an enormous corruption fund and all that the combined party machines and selfish interests could do to mislead. The result was a triumph for the people at every significant point.

The people's capacity for direct legislation is not likely to be subjected to severer tests than it has already stood with signal success. . . .

Direct Legislation a Safeguard Against Mob Rule

Sometimes office-holders or party machine men profess a great fear that direct legislation will result in "mob rule." This must be taken to mean that they fear, probably with reason, that the people, after weeks of deliberation and with adequate information, would not support their pet schemes. Prospective abundance of popular majorities in their favor would neither excite their alarm nor be called by them "mob rule." No; mob-action finds a more promising field in nominating conventions, and even town meetings than in the long process of gathering signatures, weeks of discussion and deliberation, and the quiet vote on an Australian ballot in isolated, individual booths.

Direct legislation is not only a safeguard against mob rule, but against the only thing likely with us to lead to violent revolution, namely, machine rule for the benefit of the privileged few. Majority rule precludes both mob rule and machine rule, for majority rule brings into play the great patient mass of honest, hardworking citizens, ordinarily silent and little felt. They abhor alike the violent methods of the mob and the intriguing of "politics." No less do they shrink from making themselves individually conspicuous in hopelessly protesting against powerful wrongs which they can, though they ought not to, endure. They are likely to suffer in silence until driven to extremes, rather than seek relief through the distasteful and inadequate means now at their disposal.

To provide the people with orderly and regular means of expressing themselves on equal terms with all their neighbors, with the certainty that their will thus expressed will take effect, is the logical way to insure the healthy and natural progress which in the long run is the only preventive of violent upheaval.

Deeper Value of Direct Legislation

An additional advantage in direct legislation is the education which it affords the average voter. One cannot help believing that the consequent toning up of the public standard of thought and morals would be in the long run the most important feature of the system. Direct legislation tends thus automatically to produce a highly trained and self-respecting electorate, and to lay the deepest and most promising foundation for permanent good government.

Direct legislation is the only orderly means known for accurately and unmistakably expressing the public will as to legislation, and for making it prevail. It gives at last a fair approach to a proper and worthy means of registering public sentiment, well defined by some one as "the deliberate and reasoned judgment" of the people. It is as effective a balance wheel against mere popular clamor as it is a safeguard against the silent scheming of the crafty few. Direct legislation thus opens for the first time a fair prospect for the early realization of the cherished American ideal—a government by as well as of and for the people. . . .

What the Fathers Were Trying to Do

We shall be interested to see how direct legislation fits in with the ideas of our wonderfully far-sighted and successful Constitution framers. It will be worth while to quote a few passages from the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts—the oldest of their works—the spirit of which is no stranger in other parts of the country. Articles V, VII, VIII of that honored document will give the ideas of the fathers on the relation of the people to their representatives:

Article V. All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them.

Art. VII. Government is instituted for the common good; for the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people; and not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men: Therefore the people have an incontestable, unalienable and indefeasible right to institute government; and to reform, alter or totally change the same, when their protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness require it.

Art. VIII. In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments.

Lack of Steam and Electricity the Obstacle to Direct Legislation at the Outset

On reading these sturdy New England doctrines one must conclude that the only reason why the fathers did not then and there establish direct legislation for the state and for cities as they might develop, was that it was at that time physically impossible. Mechanical invention had not advanced far enough to permit it even if they had conceived the idea. We must not forget that their facilities for disseminating information and gathering returns were little superior to those of Julius Caesar. They knew no more of railways than Caesar did, such highways as they had were not so good as Caesar's. But they resolutely did all that was practicable under the mechanical conditions of their time. They provided an obligatory referendum on the adoption and amendment of the constitution of the commonwealth, even though it might and did take weeks to put the matter to vote and get the returns. And it is clear that nothing was farther from their minds than that the will of representatives should prevail over the will of the people, some modern office-holders to the contrary notwithstanding.

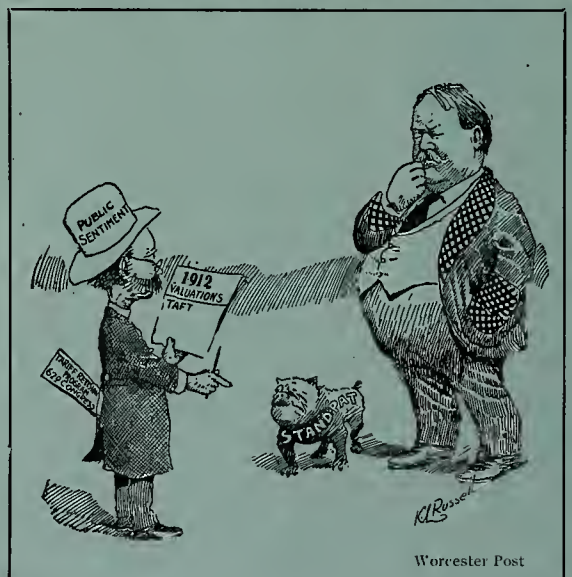
Now that direct legislation, as a working institution on a large scale, has become a possibility through the introduction of modern means of spreading news and ideas by the telegraph, high-speed printing press, and the railway, we can proceed from the point where the fathers were forced to stop and can vindicate more clearly than ever the soundness of their noble idealism.

An Attractive Outlook

In closing it may be said that the initiative and referendum appeal particularly to progressive Americans in whom still lives the spirit of the liberty-loving men who founded this nation. Such citizens readily comprehend the necessity of controlling the important results, and of not limiting themselves to toying at government while privilege does the governing. They take great satisfaction, moreover, in a remedial measure so thoroughly in harmony with the old ideals and institutions. It involves, after all, only a bit of additional machinery, and depends for its success only upon our fitness for self-government.

Of course direct legislation is only a piece of mechanism. It will not suffice merely to set it up. It must be made to work promptly and with vigor when required. This will take real citizens. Oregon shows that such citizens still exist—some of them of New England or other American stock, some of them born in old-world monarchies.

The success in Switzerland; the steady progress and gratifying results in America; the strenuous opposition by favorites or managers of political machines; the misrepresentations by professional lobbyists and conspicuous officeholders, echoed in ready-made "editorials," all indicate that the initiative and referendum are measures justly destined to receive an increasing amount of public attention and regard.



With the initiative and referendum in force, we shall be equipped as never before to resist enemies from within: enemies far more dangerous to our freedom than any foreign foe.

The initiative and referendum may well be the means of instituting on a permanent basis the responsible kind of representative government which our fathers lived and died to secure.

Ohio's Troubles With Big Bosses

How long will it take some people to find out that a stone wall is hard on the head? The Republican party in Ohio has not elected a Governor since 1903, and the reason is plainly the selfish domination of the party conventions by a clique of narrow bosses. Yet, after all this bitter series of lessons, culminating in an election that none could misinterpret, we still find the Republican membership of the State Senate practically unanimous (thirteen out of fifteen) in resisting improved legislation, and in following the lead of a representative of the man who, more than any other, defeated the Republican ticket last fall, George Cox. How often must a lesson be repeated before it is learned?—Cincinnati Citizens Bulletin.

Somebody's Got to Back up

THE DAY AT SAN FRANCISCO

By Franklin Hichborn

His honor, The Mayor of San Francisco, P. H. McCarthy, is at sixes and sevens with his Police Department. The Honorable McCarthy has been at sixes and sevens with his Police Department almost from the day of his entering upon the most exciting two years of his life—his mayoralty term. And the sixes and sevens are largely of the Mayor's own making.

Just at present McCarthy is involved in the firing of a Chief of Police who won't be fired, but who has appealed to the courts to hold the man behind the firing arm. Up to present writing, the Chief of Police holds his job, with excellent prospects of being thrown out at any moment. While the Chief of Police holds his job, it is hard for the Mayor to hold his dignity, or the onlookers their faces. But the squabble is cruelly hard on afflicted San Francisco.

To put the phrase as McCarthy-esque as possible, Mayor McCarthy "started something" with the Police Department even before he had the mayor's chair warmed. McCarthy's distinguished predecessor, Mayor Edward Robson Taylor, a Doctor of Laws, a Dean of a Medical College, incidentally a poet, and at no time a politician—nor a hoodlum—had just been ushered out of that chair, with a torrent of vitriolic abuse from McCarthy—through the vehicle of the new mayor's inaugural message—that was funny to the frivolous and outrageous to the more serious who look for at least dignity and common courtesy in the Executive of a large city. McCarthy had not proceeded far in that inaugural address, before he had demonstrated that he possesses neither.

In his uncalled for abuse of the outgoing mayor, McCarthy charged that the Police Department was not doing its duty. As soon as he could get about it—which was very soon—McCarthy proceeded to remove the Police Commissioners whom Mayor Taylor had appointed.

The commissioners against whom the blow was directed were Fred G. Sanborn, Joseph Leggett and A. D. Cutler, all of whom stand well in San Francisco to say the least, and had made good commissioners, and whose terms of office had not expired.

To their places, the Mayor appointed Isaac H. Spiro, prominent member of the Royal Arch, by occupation a soda water manufacturer; Percy L. Henderson, a politician-capitalist generally credited with being in close touch with the old machine element, and Walter E. O'Connell, business agent of the plumbers' union.

Harry P. Flannery, a saloon-keeper, had already been appointed by McCarthy as president of the board.

The change of commissioners was as dramatic as it was summary. The Police Department was under the command of the old commissioners until they were removed. The Chief of Police, J. B. Cook, was in sympathy with them. Under the circumstances, the police might have refused to throw the old commissioners out, if it came to that.

But the Sheriff's office of the City and County of San Francisco was in complete accord with McCarthy. Tom Finn, at the time McCarthy's political partner, had just taken over the office. By the most curious of coincidences, on the night of the removal of the Taylor commissioners, a large number of deputy sheriffs assemhled in and about the room in which the commissioners were to meet. Cutler was out of town, but Sanborn and Leggett attended the meeting.

The two passed through the crowd of deputy sheriffs to the meeting room. There they were met by Mayor McCarthy's trusted police messenger, Peter Fanning, who handed each a notification that he had been removed from office. Sanborn and Leggett retired gracefully, and their successors took immediate possession, which is nine-tenths of the law.

Chief of Police Cook at once tendered his resignation. John Martin was named as his successor.

By curious coincidence, a police officer by the name of Peter Fanning, closely connected with Mayor McCarthy's office, has, in the present flare-up, been indicted on a charge of collecting graft money from the unfortunate women of the half-world.

To justify his course in removing the very excellent gentlemen whom Mayor Taylor had appointed to the Police Commission, McCarthy issued one of his long statements to the public.

"I intend," said McCarthy in that statement, "to give San Francisco a clean, honest and economical government, and in order to do so I must have with me on the various commissions men who will carry out my policies."

The "statement" sounded fine, but the retired commissioners had scarcely got accustomed to unofficial life when San Francisco filled up with a surprisingly large number of bunco men, pick pockets, dance-hall entertainers, prostitutes and gamblers.

Finally, a trio of bunco men opened up a "fake pool room" over in Marin County. They soon ran foul of the Marin County authorities, and landed in jail. One of them, Joe Abbott, made what he termed a confession. In this confession he alleged that President Flannery of the McCarthy Board of Police Commissioners had invited him to San Francisco to prey upon the community.

With Abbott's sensational statements as a basis, Police Commissioner Flannery was indicted, not in San Francisco, but in Marin County. According to the published report of Flannery's trial which followed, Abbott, among other things testified that Flannery had said to him, "You have two good years in front of you. You ought to make a lot of money. I want you to make some money. I want you to make some money for me."

Abbott testified further that Flannery, the head of the San Francisco Police Department, had consulted him (Abbott, a bunco steerer) as to the detailing of policemen. Abbott stated on the witness stand, according to the published account of the trial, that he had said he would give Flannery 12½ per cent. of the fruits of those two good years.

Abbott's testimony failed to convince the jury. Flannery was acquitted.

President Flannery, of the McCarthy Board of Police Commissioners, returned to San Francisco in a blaze of glory. The celebration of his vindication was one of the loudest and most curious affairs that ever struck the town.

But the vindicated Flannery did not return to his job as head of San Francisco's Police Department.

McCarthy is alleged to have stated during his campaign for mayor, that San Francisco should be the Paris of America. The "Paris of America" idea has been cropping up constantly from the day of McCarthy's dramatic removal of the Taylor Board of Police Commissioners.

The idea fairly made the town sizzle soon after the Flannery board took office. The rumor got out somehow, that cafe dancing was to be permitted in the retail business part of the city. During the Taylor administration this form of entertainment had been relegated to the tenderloin. The report was at first denied, but, as the papers of the time had it, on March 21, 1910, the "Paris of America" gained recognition. The Board of Police Commissioners on that date issued an order which permitted dancing in saloons and cafes in the retail shopping district of the city. The new district at once became known as the "uptown tenderloin."

The district ran true to name. At once a horde of tenderloin entertainers headed for San Francisco. Scenes that were enacted in the district were, in their mildest form, pictured in the newspapers. Reputable San Francisco was shocked and indignant.

Rabbi Martin A. Meyer of the Temple Emanu-El, was, I think, the first clergyman to declare against the new district. He preached a sermon on the subject.

"The Paris of America," he cried, "they would call it—not the Paris of art and science and literature, but the Paris of decadency and degeneracy.

"Business is the excuse these men give," went on the Rabbi. "At its altar they would sacrifice your boys and girls."

The Rabbi hit it right: the excuse which the Police Commissioners gave for authorizing the up-town tenderloin was that the business men of San Francisco had petitioned to have it opened—for the benefit of business. And such a petition had been presented them. At first this petition was withheld, but the commissioners eventually made it public.

Investigation made by the Women's Civic League showed that 260 persons and firms had signed the petition. Among the signers were some of the largest establishments in San Francisco.

The feeling which the opening of the district engendered is well illustrated by a letter written by President David Starr Jordan of Stanford University, to the League. President Jordan said:

"I am very glad that you are taking up the list of signers of that tenderloin petition. I shall be interested in knowing which ones of these reconsider their act. I don't favor boycotts but I have cut off from the list of firms with whom we trade, Goldberg, Bowen & Company, and Shreve & Company. So long as their names are on that dive list, I prefer to do business, myself, with other people, with cleaner notions of trade."

And then the real astonisher came. It developed that the business men were mistaken. The up-town tenderloin did not help business.

Indeed, the up-town tenderloin hurt business. People stayed away from San Francisco because of conditions here. The ex-prize fighters, saloon keepers and the like, who had been given "the snap" of opening "places" in the up-town tenderloin lost money. The sheriff's lock began to appear on their doors. But capital was invested there, and had to be protected. The excesses of the district rather increased. But all to no purpose. The "Paris of America" as displayed in the up-town tenderloin proved a flat, financial failure.

And then it developed that the principal thing which stood in the way of San Francisco receiving the Panama-Pacific Exposition was the loud reputation that the city was establishing as "The Paris of Decadency and Degeneracy." Even the hotel men, who had been well represented on the petition for saloon dancing—the St. Francis itself being represented on the list—adopted resolutions requesting that the new district be wiped out.

"Resolved," said the hotel men, "that the San Francisco Hotelmen's Association, having the best interest of San Francisco at heart, commend the expressed determination of Mayor P. H. McCarthy and District Attorney Fickert to transfer the tenderloin to some less prominent section of the city."

And then came the finish. The "up-town tenderloin" lasted less than six months. The order of the Police Commissioners permitting it was made on March 21st; the order for its abatement went into effect on October 4th.

With the order of abatement, came a shake-up of the Police Department.

Health and Bad Odors: Prof. Jordan of Chicago University, discussing the proper function of health boards, calls attention to the fact that things may constitute a serious nuisance and inconvenience without any particular influence against health; and for that reason he contends that matters of mere municipal housekeeping like garbage collection and plumbing regulation should not be put upon boards of health. Garbage, he says, is not a breeder of disease, except as it may breed flies that carry disease, and sewer gas, he contends, is no more injurious to health than illuminating gas from leaky fixtures. Bad milk, he holds, is the great municipal disease maker, and on that the health boards should make their chief campaign, leaving things that are offensive to the senses to be cared for by other departments. The public, he thinks, will naturally take steps against actual nuisances.

Bad Milk—Whose Fault? A speaker before a pure milk conference in Philadelphia declared that the consumer was more to blame for bad milk conditions than the producer. The fault does not lie with either of them, as a rule, but with the authorities. Clean milk is more expensive than dirty, and the stress of competition urges the producer to omit the necessary regulations. The consumer is practically helpless to distinguish between good and bad, and so takes the cheaper milk and the risk that goes with it. Rigid inspection by competent people is the thing needed to protect both consumer and producer, and that cannot be obtained in communities where the people would rather play at partisan politics than have good municipal housekeeping.

Getting in Her Work: The gentle but efficient hand of woman appears in the new health regulations of Seattle—where the women vote to good effect. These regulations are being carried out with great strictness. They relate chiefly to the food and milk supply, and they are merely the application of good house-keeping rules to the kitchens and dairies that supply the public. No bakery, candy making concern or restaurant can do business without a permit, and the latter is issued only when the premises are in proper order to be easily kept clean and readily inspected. Frequent examination of the milk supply has resulted in bringing that product up to a very high standard.

Depth of Concrete Underpaving: Samuel Whinery, a New York paving expert, who was employed by the Chicago Commission on Expenditures to report on the paving work done in the latter city, comments on the custom, which, he says, prevails quite generally throughout the country, of using the same depth of concrete under asphalt on all streets, irrespective of the character of the traffic they would be called upon to bear. He says that for heavy freighting eight inches of concrete is desirable, whereas in residence districts four inches is sufficient.

Saving the Cost of Contractors' Bonds: Youngstown, Ohio, finds that the contractors who do city work pay $10,000 a year on the average for bonding the city against their failure to fulfil. As there has never been a case yet where the city has been compelled to collect on a bond, financiers are figuring on some way to save this money and keep it in the city, through the establishment of a special fund carried along from year to year.

Teaching Practical Civics: A course of study in practical civics running through all grades and covering all the duties of the citizen has been prepared by the secretary of the Health Board of Indianapolis and adopted by the school authorities. It deals with such matters, for example, as the collection of garbage and methods of street paving. It teaches the children to be observant of the city's work.

Blocking Car Doorways: An Indianapolis councilman has brought in an ordinance forbidding people to stand in the doorways of street cars. People stand in doorways because they like to have something to lean against more substantial than the pin in some woman's hat. The best remedy for this evil would be to provide seats enough.

Interest on Deposits: The city of Providence, Rhode Island, is rather a conservative place, but it manages to get 3 per cent per annum from its banks for city deposits. Yet there are many bankers in California who will tell you it is a great mistake to have a law requiring a minimum of 2 per cent, or anything at all for that matter, for public deposits.

Old-fashioned Franchise: Evidently Quincy, Illinois, does not expect to grow much in the next 50 years. It has just granted a street car license for that period. At the end of about 25 years the company will be compelled to pay the city $500 a year, and this increases slowly until in the last five years it must pay $1000 a year.

Tacoma Light and Water Figures: The annual report of the Commissioner of Light and Water of Tacoma shows a profit of $72,000 for the year 1910 in the light department, and $29,000 in the water business. The lighting works expended $122,000 on betterments, and the water works $88,000.

Against City Alleys: The real-estate bodies and city authorities of Milwaukee have come to an agreement, after long discussion, on the subject of alleys. The new plots will all be laid out on an alleyless plan. It has been decided that alleys are disease breeders and collectors of refuse.

Waste of Fine Bridge: Milwaukee has a large, fine viaduct and bridge, built of concrete that was finished nine months ago, and might be of great service to the public, only there is a disagreement as to whether it conforms to specifications or not, and the contractor will not allow it to be used until that matter is cleared up.

New Sewer System for Buffalo: The effort to keep the water of Lake Ontario free from bacteria, so it will be safe for drinking, has compelled Buffalo to construct a new sewer system at a cost of several millions. The money will be raised by general not by district taxation.

Syracuse and the Commission System: Syracuse, New York, following the example of Buffalo and Rochester, has now an organization whose purpose it is to campaign for the establishment of the commission system.

Good Showing of Water Department: The water business of Spokane pays 100 per cent over cost of maintenance and operation, but interest and sinking fund gets away with half of this profit.

Oklahoma's Water Supply: Oklahoma City finds it necessary to go clear to the Ozark mountains for a water supply, and is contemplating an issue of five millions of bonds to pay for the undertaking.

Expense of Water Mains: Nebraska has adopted a general law requiring cities that own their water works to assess the cost of extension of mains against the property thus supplied with water.

School of Policing: The Police Department of Louisville publishes a daily bulletin, and through this the police are given a correspondence course in the duties of patrolmen.

Municipal Conduit Plan: Pasadena is considering a plan for putting all wires underground in conduits owned by the municipality and rented to the service companies.

Dust-laying Tests: Kingston, New York, is another city that will make systematic tests this summer of oil sprinkling as against calcium chloride as a dust layer.

Road Across the Continent: Automobile manufacturers are considering a campaign to get the national government to construct a military highway clear across the continent.

Down with the Fly: Portland, Oregon, is starting an anti-fly campaign and proposes to become a flyless town.

Insurance Sinking Fund: Scranton, Pennsylvania, has been paying about $1600 a year for insurance, and it now proposes to establish a sinking fund for insurance and pay its premiums into that.

Great Work on Arbor Day: The children of South Bend, Indiana, planted 12,000 trees on Arbor Day—flowering catalpa.

Garbage Auto-Truck: Manchester, New Hampshire, has a garbage auto-truck, which does the work of three ordinary wagons.

PARKS AND PARKWAYS

Here and Elsewhere

By J. B. LIPPINCOTT

Park Commissioner of Los Angeles

Mr J B. Lippincott, who is a Park Commissioner and also assistant chief engineer of the Aqueduct, addressed the City Club of Los Angeles on Saturday noon on the subject of "Parks and Parkways." The talk was illustrated by fifty lantern slides. These views have been collected from a number of cities of the United States, and show the best treatment of city parks in Minneapolis, Kansas City, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Boston and New York. They were exhibited as ideals towards which the landscape engineer should work. There were also given a number of views of Los Angeles parks, showing where good work had been done and where poor work had been done.

This presentation hy Commissioner Lippincott is of importance as outlining the ideas of the Park Board for the treatment of our city parks, particularly in view of the fact that the Council has now under consideration the park budget for the coming fiscal year.

Roadway in Griffith Park

Mr. Lippincott's talk largely was explanatory of the views shown, and was along the following general lines: The natural topographic and climatic conditions in Southern California and surrounding Los Angeles to a marked degree fix the ideals for this section. The one distinctive feature that we possess, superior to any other section of this country, is a mild climate throughout the year, an abundance of sunshine, and a placid sea backed by a bold range of mountains. All of these conditions attract people to out-of-door life and pleasures. Fundamentally, it is the one thing that is inducing thousands of tourists and home-seekers to come to our boundaries.

"Other cities," said the speaker, "have natural resources in mines, forests, fisheries, or coal-fields adjacent to them which support and develop their growth. In Los Angeles and vicinity, while we are succeeding in various business enterprises, our leading occupation is horticulture, which also is an out-of-door pursuit.

"President Roosevelt remarked at the opening of the Greek Theatre in Berkeley that in California for the first time the Anglo-Saxon race had been placed under the environments of ancient Greece, and that this should ultimately and positively affect both the development and ideals of the race. Los Angeles should preeminently become the home of art and letters in the United States. It should seek the good, the true and the beautiful. Already this is becoming manifest, and we should make it our duty, both personally and officially, to aid in the development of such ideals. With men, and with localities as well, preeminence in some one specialty leads to greatest success.

"If that argument is accepted, it manifestly becomes the duty of our city not only to develop its parks and parkways, but to do this work in the most finished and artistic manner, to obtain the highest talent in landscape gardening, and to produce effects that are gratifying to those who live in the community, and attractive to the great throng of tourists who annually pass through our borders.

"Los Angeles has some 4,000 acres in parks, 3,000 acres of which are in Griffith Park. It has but one park in the business portion of the city. Other and larger parks are largely situated around the perimeter of the thickly settled district, such as Westlake, Hollenbeck, Eastlake and South Parks. Elysian Park and Griffith Park particularly are mountainous and hilly, and of a distinctly different type.

"In the treatment of parks, a careful study should be made to determine the most important use to which any particular park could be put, and the greatest benefit that can be derived from its proper development. This, of course, calls for wholly different methods for our different parks. Central Park, consisting of something over ten acres of land in the thickly built-up business section of the town, is too small for the development of general forest treatment, or even for the proper carrying out of such plans as would apply to parks of more extended area in residential districts. The park is not large enough to properly permit of winding paths, forest trees and extensive flower effects. It is better adapted to the purpose of a city square, and has so been treated.

"It is the intention of the Park Commission to place a hundred seats along the broad walks of Central Park, as well as to cast a continuous concrete bench of classic design around the central fountain. Instead of having trees so thick that they choke and crowd each other in their struggle for sunlight, the effort has been made to preserve the best specimens, and other trees will be planted in suitable places there and carefully developed.

"The general map of the city shows that Central Park is the only open square in the congested portion of the city. It is to be regretted that this is the case, and the members of the Park Commission are unanimously of the opinion that it would be a misfortune, and not for the best public interest to utilize this park for the site of any public building. During the past year it has been proposed that it should be used for the erection of a city hall, a fire department station and a city library. If once it is invaded by public buildings, it will be destined to disappearance as a park.

"Such parks as Westlake, Eastlake and Hollenbeck should properly be treated as city parks in the generally accepted meaning of the term. Here winding paths, flowers, trees and shrubbery should abound. The effort, however, should be made to develop broad vistas through the park. By doing this, the apparent extent of the park is increased, and it is made more beautiful. In the past, it would seem that the policy has been too much pursued of planting whatever happened to be in the nursery in whatever open space there happened to be in the park. As the trees and shrubs have grown, they have crowded each other for sunlight in a desperate struggle for the survival of the fittest, and many of our parks are filled with numerous deformed trees under which it is impossible to grow lawn because of the density of the shade, instead of having fewer and more perfect specimens.

"Prospect Park in Brooklyn, Delaware Park in Buffalo, and of some portions of Sycamore Grove Park in Los Angeles indicate ideal treatments of this character. Broadly speaking, the park boundaries should be surrounded by high growing trees and shrubs, enclosing the park in such a manner that when one enters therein the impression of isolation in the park is given. Within this area vistas of lawn and water, fine trees with grassy slopes beneath them, set off by attractive flowers, should be obtained.

"In a locality noted as Los Angeles is for its flowers, it is particularly desirable that a conservatory should be built in one of our parks which would be an ornament to the city and an object of interest to all visitors. Our present conservatory, while it is handled by a competent foreman, is ridiculously small and inadequate. It is the ambition of the Park Department to start the construction of a conservatory that will ultimately reach this ideal. Commissioner O'Melveny is particularly expert and interested in this class of work and anxious to aid in its development.

"In Griffith Park and Elysian Park we have other features which indicate different treatment. Elysian Park should be a municipal forest. This idea was started by Superintendent La Grande, who did effective work. This park contains about 800 acres and should be accessible to a great mass of the citizens of the town, particularly from the poorer districts of the city. Unfortunately, during the rush of subdivision work that has gone on during the last generation in this city no adequate arrangements have been made for entrances into Elysian Park, and today Elysian Park stands almost unused by the people. While thousands visit Eastlake and Hollenbeck parks on Sundays, Elysian is practically deserted.

"The only entrance to Elysian Park that can be called such with propriety is through the Fremont Gate, and immediately beyond there lies a long stretch of up-hill road, attractive to Motor cars and horseback riders, but wearying to those on foot. It is a beautiful park, containing many attractive valleys and hills, and the difficult problem before the Park Commission, and one which has received much study, is the obtaining of suitable entrances on which street car lines can be built leading up to some of its broad, wooded valleys, and which will permit those who have to go on foot to promptly and easily obtain access to it.

"Griffith Park, owing to its topographic and general physical conditions and its extent in area, should be perpetuated in its natural state. I know of no other park in the United States offering such varied and attractive features and capable of such a magnificent development. Here should be preserved the natural wild trees, wild flowers and wild animals that are indigenous to Southern California. Only roads and trails should be built in this park. On the southern slopes, which have been burnt off, the planting of forest trees has been started within the past year. A water system is now being built to aid in the rapid growth of oaks and sycamores on its southern valleys and mountain sides. Broad entrances are to be provided, largely due to the efforts of the Hollywood Board of Trade, and the isolation of this park will be overcome. Here also street car lines should be encouraged. Seven and a half miles of roadway have been built during the past year, and some twenty miles more have been projected. An extensive system of horseback trails has been started.

"A fine natural opportunity is found in one of the broad valleys of this park for the laying out of a municipal golf course. There is under consideration the building of an artistic and effective fence around the entire park, through which entrance can be had by gates, so that the herbaceous, wild animals of California can be liberated and allowed to roam over the broad areas of mountain and woodland. The ideal for this park is to preserve it as a part of the primitive, natural conditions of Southern California.

"In many of the cities of the United States parkways and boulevards have been constructed connecting the parks. Minneapolis, Kansas City and Seattle have succeeded wonderfully in this class of park work. In Los Angeles we have nothing of the kind. There is not even a city street on reasonably easy grades connecting, for instance, Westlake and Sunset parks with Elysian Park. The Park Commission is particularly anxious to provide connecting parkways of this character.

"The City Water Department has 120 acres of land, over 90 acres of which are contained in the Silver Lake reservoir, intermediate between Griffith and Elysian parks. The valley in which the Silver Lake dam has been built runs as an unsightly ravine and slough from the Silver Lake diagonally across the northwestern portion of the city, passing near the Bimini Baths and crossing Wilshire boulevard west of Vermont avenue. The physical conditions of this ravine make it practically prohibitory for residential purposes, but offer ideal conditions for the construction of a parkway connecting Westlake and Sunset parks with the Silver Lake reservoir. The Water Department has signified its willingness to cooperate with the Park Department in the improvement of this Silver Lake site, and this area was planted in forest trees last spring. From Silver Lake to Griffith Park and Elysian Park the connecting link would be relatively easy. It is believed that the construction of such a parkway would enormously enhance the values of adjacent property and that these increased values would largely overbalance the expense of purchasing and improving this parkway.

"Another project of this nature looks to the co-operation between the city of Los Angeles, the cities of Pasadena and South Pasadena and the county of Los Angeles in the obtaining for public possession of the bed of the Arroyo Seco extending from Sycamore Grove Park to the boundaries of the National Forest Reserve. The representatives of these communities have manifested great interest in this enterprise, and it is to be hoped that it can be accomplished. The bed of the Arroyo is heavily timbered with the native California trees, and a winding driveway connecting these cities by easy grades through the bed of the Arroyo would be a most attractive feature of this locality.

"The city of Los Angeles is behind, rather than in the lead of the cities of the United States in the improvement of her parks and parkways. This is shown in the following table:

City.	Population.	Park Revenue.	Proportion of Total City Revenue.
Denver	210,000	$264,000	14 per cent.
San Francisco	450,000	405,000	7 " "
Kansas City	248,361	393,645	20 " "
Minneapolis	301,000	694,651	13.5 " "
Los Angeles	319,198	202,565	5 " "
Seattle*	311,593	202,564	8 " "

*The city of Seattle has bonded itself for $3,500,000 park improvement.

COMPARISON OF APPROXIMATE PARK EXPENDITURES FOR THE PAST TEN YEARS

City.	Population.	Amount.
Kansas City	248,381	$9,000,000
Minneapolis	301,000	6,000,000
Los Angeles	319,198	1,750,000

"The present Park Commission was appointed in the spring of 1910. The accounts are kept in fiscal years, beginning July 1st. A comparison of park expenditures for the first nine months of the fiscal year 1909-10, prior to the present administration, with expenditures for a similar period for the following year during this administration shows the following:

COMPARISON OF EXPENDITURES

	Administration and Maintenance.	Betterments.	Total.
July 1, 1909 to Mar. 31, 1910	$102,006.99	$27,559.36	$129,566.35
July 1, 1910 to Mar. 31, 1911	79,853.10	44,010.52	123,863.62

"In conclusion, it may be stated that owing to the natural physical opportunities in Los Angeles and the habits of our people and our visitors from outside it is incumbent upon this city to specialize in the beautification of its parks, that this work of development should be done by the best talent that we can obtain along scientific and artistic lines, and that the city of Los Angeles at present is behind its sister cities of equal size in this line of work."

COLLIER'S WEEKLY ON WILLIAM KENT'S TARIFF SPEECH

The daily newspapers of the country printed the humorous parts of it; it did contain much humor, of that incisive and engaging quality that has been heard in the House only rarely since Cushman of Washington died. But the serious parts of Kent's speech were entirely consistent with his possession of an honorary degree from Yale; no speech in the present session has gone more directly to the heart of the philosophy of government.

Kent, although he stated specifically that he would protect infant industries, so long as they remain infants, looked free trade in the face more courageously even than any Democrat who has spoken during the present session. California has reason to be proud of his courage; every voter in the State ought to send for his speech, and everybody else as well who would like to see a tariff speech which is easy to read, luminous, and entertaining.—Collier's Weekly.

The "pay-as-you-enter" plan of electing senators begins to look like a back number.—Omaha Bee.

OLD GUARD STANDS PAT.

We are all more or less familiar with the importance of committees in Congress. We know, for instance, how a member like ex-Congressman Tawney at the head of the appropriations committee can stifle progressive legislation by simply refusing to provide the money to carry on its administration, and how a senator like Aldrich at the head of the finance committee, accessible always to the interests, can "revise" the tariff by adding still more to the excessive protection already enjoyed by our giant industries. It is in the committee room that legislation is considered, shaped, filled with "jokers" or buried in pigeon holes. The character of the committees is therefore of prime importance. This the old guard of the Senate recognizes. Despite the efforts of the thirteen Progressive Republican Senators, representing the public sentiment of the country, to have the Republican representation on the main committee fixed so that the Progressives would be assigned in proportion to their numerical strength in the Senate, all the committees that deal with the great problems of the country were "packed" by the Old Guard with the "tried and true" senators of special privilege. Arrogantly, defiantly ignoring the mandate of Republican voters all over the country, these reactionaries, led by Gallinger, blocked every opening, through which might come genuine progressive bills, with ultra-high tariff senators, anti-conservationists, and Senators opposed to real railroad regulation.

It is plain that the Standpat Republicans are determined to serve the System to the last ditch. Depleted in numbers, repudiated by Republicans at the polls, they still hold fast to the power that remains to them. For a while yet the fight must go on along the old lines. Progressive senators must continue their struggle on the floor of the Senate, rather than in the committee rooms, for what the people demand in legislation. And what is more important, the voters of the various states must not forget that they still have work to do to bring about such changes in the personnel of the Senate as will insure real representative government. Until that is done they will continue to pay tribute to special privilege.—La Follette's.

Mistress—Why have you been so long, Marie? I told you we wanted the lobster for lunch, and it is now past one o'clock. Maid—It's on account of your hobble skirt you gave me, madame.—Fliegende Blaetter.

PROVIDING FOR "LAME DUCKS"

The ten members of the national monetary commission now draw salaries of $7500 a year each. When the commission was originally appointed the members were not paid salaries, inasmuch as they were members of the senate or the house, and there was a constitutional obstacle to the drawing of two salaries by congressmen. Inasmuch, however, as the members of the commission in all cases ceased to serve in congress, with the end of the last session, provision was made for the payment of salaries to them just before the adjournment.

It is now a well paid "lame duck" commission, consisting of the following men: Ex-Senators Nelson W. Aldrich, Julius Caesar Burrows, Eugene Hale, Hernando D. Money, Frank P. Flint, Henry H. Teller and James P. Taliaferro, and ex-Representatives James McLachlan, George W. Prince and Robert W. Bonynge.

The names of Messrs. Prince and McLachlan were added only in March in order to provide places for them in the public service. Another "lame duck' performance that deserve criticism was the placing of ex-Senator Warner of Missouri upon the board of ordnance and fortifications at a salary of $5000 a year. All such offices are practically sinecures, and the effect is to pension indirectly the occupants. The multiplication of commissionerships under the federal government should be investigated rigidly by the democratic house—Springfield Republican.

"'Ave you 'eard that old Jim 'as stopped smoking?" "No." "Yes; you see, 'e's a little near-sighted, and the other day 'e emptied his pipe into a gunpowder barrel!"—Tit-Bits.

From Kern Canon to Giant Forest

The Chronicle of a Knapsack Trip

By WILLIAM CONGER MORGAN

Article and photographs, courtesy of The Sierra Club

When the Sierra Club left the Kern Canon last summer, the main party, with the pack animals, climbed the steep trail up Coyote Creek, rambled through the alpine meadows at Farewell Gap, made camp in the shadow of Saw Tooth Peak and again at Redwood Meadows. But two score of us trampers took the short-cut up over the Chagoopa Plateau, across the Big Arroyo and up Lost Canon, over Black Rock Pass and down Cliff Creek Canon to the Giant Forest, where, joining with the main party, we heard for the last time that season the "call of the wild." It is the log-book of this latter journey which is appended here, for brief and simple as was the trip, yet it was replete with the pleasure that dwells beneath the evergreen shade of the mountain-sides.

The excitement began some time before the start was made when the captains of the four parties were summoned before the commissary general to receive their allotted provisions, for on a knapsack trip, ten is about all that can be accommodated in one mess. Every member of each party was present for the apportionment of provisions and outfit among the individual members, the packs were made up, and all was ready for the start.

The pack-train put us up the first steep fifteen hundred feet of the trail leading up Funston Creek to the Chagoopa Plateau, and late in the afternoon of July 21st we shouldered our burdens and the trip began. There was much shifting of packs and adjusting of straps as we ascended to the Upper Funston Meadow, and to some of us the first three hours' tramp seemed longer than any of the succeeding days, lovely as it was in the evening light. The scarlet gilias stood like flaming torches beside the trail beckoning us onward, and as we climbed we left behind us the long-leaved yellow pines and entered the fragrant shade of the firs. When we reached the plateau the sun was near the horizon and the silent company of tamaracks, standing like a picket guard around the meadow, were casting long bars of shade across the grass. Two parties, the "slow-goers," were to spend the night at Moraine Lake, on whose crystal surface there appeared reflected every tree and stone, even the distant Kaweahs. The rest of us turned to the south and scrambled down the steep sides of the canon into the Big Arroyo. The short twilight of elevated regions was accentuated by our descent from the sunlit heights into the darksome valley, and we had scarcely time to gather in the night's supply of firewood and call in the stragglers before darkness was upon us.

Looking Up Cliff Creek Canon

Photograph by E. T. Parsons

With the exception of the one spot where precipitous walls of rock attempt to block the stream as it comes cannonading from the gorge and plunges headlong into the Kern, throughout its whole course the Big Arroyo, though deeply cut, is an open canon. From the more gentle slopes on the western side, streams come tumbling down from the Kern-Kaweah Divide every mile or so, each carving for itself a side canon. The ascent of Lost Canon presents little difficulty for man or beast. Climbing past the long series of cascades down which Lost Creek tumbles into the Big Arroyo, we were soon passing through the beautiful gardens and forests of Lost Canon. From wall to wall lies a flowery meadow, pleasantly shaded with groves of tamarack pines. Through it, flowing in wide, tranquil curves and stretches of diminutive rapids, runs the musical stream, whose voice spoke with a vain allure to our fishermen, no trout ever having been planted there. Traveling onward, past the meadows, our climb gave us a succession of magnificent views looking back across the hazy canon of the Kern. Black and sharp against the early morning sky rose Cirque Peak, Langley, Le Conte and Guyot. Above our heads as we trudged along towered the jagged pinnacles of Mount Needham and Saw Tooth Peak, which, mantled in black storm clouds and most marvelously gilded by the setting sun, we had seen on the night of our camp at the foot of the Red Kaweah.

The head of the canon is boxed in by a steep rise of five hundred feet. Surmounting this, we stood upon Black Rock Pass. The panorama that greets the eye is superb and varied, especially from the ridge just to the north. Beyond the barriers that rise northward nearly a thousand feet above the pass lie the Five Lakes, thrice repeated, and beyond them, across the Big Arroyo, the twin clusters of the Kaweahs and the ruddy ridge of Red Spur. To the east, at our feet, lay the exquisite little meadows and woodland of Lost Canyon, the abode of the tripping deer and the shambling porcupine, and to the west the valley of Cliff Creek and the watershed of the Middle Fork of the Kaweah. Southward the view was shut in by Needham and the sharp peak of Saw Tooth, in whose shadow, cradled on the top of the pass, barely removed enough to prevent its slipping over the ridge, lies Columbine, a gem of mountain lakelets. Like a circle of spears on all sides rise pinnacles of ragged rock which, reflected from its surface, contrast strongly with the mantle of snow which dips beneath its azure waters. A solitude of rock and water and snow and sky it seems, yet from the rock sounds the cheery whistle of the marmot, from the sky the twitter of the leucosticte (rosy finch) and, snuggling close to the snow in a sheltered sunny nook, the mountain daisy blooms.

Four or five other lakes nestle in little basins just below the pass. Lying at different levels the higher cascade into the lower over precipices or rounded bosses of rock that make difficult going for foot-folk and are quite impassable for pack-animals. The bones of a couple of animals bleaching on the upper ledges sufficiently attested that some one had come to grief there, unnecessarily so, as the trail, swinging far to the north, close under the walls of the cirque, avoids the dangerous belt altogether. The great difficulty in this canon lies in picking up the end of the trail at the precise point where its assistance is most needed. This is particularly true to the traveler making his way up Cliff Creek, as at the foot of each boss, or precipice, there is a broad bench of meadowland criss-crossed with a maze of cattle trails. In each case only patient search discovered the trail close under the northern wall. Altogether the pass is not to be recommended for pack-trains except under the skilled and patient guidance of an experienced mountaineer.

Pertinent Editorial Extracts From Our State Exchanges

Police and Politics Poor Bedfellows.

Once again San Francisco's police department is stirred to its very foundation by a political disturbance which is aimed at the removal of Chief John F. Seymour. It has been openly announced in the public prints that Seymour may have gained the enmity of his superiors by refusing to agree with them that the lid was on too snug, but such insinuations are buried beneath formal charges of incompetency filed by the administration against the head of the police department.

Scandal which pointed the finger of suspicion at the mayor's secretary in San Francisco and which had its inception in the hovels occupied by the inmates of the under world in the city across the bay, was accompanied by a storm of allegations and denials by men in high places, some raw spots having evidently been rubbed.

And in the meantime the people of San Francisco who are supporting a police force for peace and protection are looking on, helpless and bewildered, and wondering when their city can pick out a chief of police who will take program in sufficiently large doses to keep his political health and position in working order for more than a few months.

It is generally admitted that Seymour, whose reputation for honesty and efficiency is coast wide, accepted the position under pressure and he has announced his intention of fighting the attempt to cast him out under a charge of incompetency.

We are not desirous of taking sides in an interesting controversy, but we will arise to remark that civilization can boast of but few good police departments which are wholly manipulated under political control—Oakland Enquirer.

Socialist Victories.

In saying that the vote by which a number of Socialists were elected to Mayoralties was 20 per cent Socialist and 80 per cent "protest," Woodrow Wilson, New Jersey's militant governor, expresses what a great many observers feel to be the cause of the extraordinary showing of the candidates of that new political cult in recent elections.

Certainly it is absurd to say that thousands had suddenly become converts to the Socialist creed, when at the last general election the party had made no notable gain in its total vote. The evolution of parties—the successful ones—is generally slow, and it is not believable that any party should grow so alarmingly fast in a natural way. . . .

The glamor of these seeming Socialist victories has already died out, and the votes by which they were accomplished prove to have been principally casual. The Socialist vote has declined in Milwaukee, Oakland has elected a Republican mayor, and Santa Cruz and Vallejo have just defeated Socialist candidates for all the city offices.—Richmond Independent.

Investigating Express Companies.

One of the most important investigations ever made by the Interstate Commerce Commission is that of the express companies of the United States. This investigation is now under way. The commission has before it much material which it is at present studying and arranging. It is thought that the outcome will be a complete change in the express business of the country. Quite recently there was held in Washington a convention relative to the much talked about and written about parcels oost. This was attended by distinguished men from various parts of the country. Some of them have made thorough study of the express situation. It is somewhat remarkable that the resolution was passed by the convention favoring the complete absorption or control of the express companies by the government. Assuming that half the things complained of against the express companies are sustained, it will not be strange if the demand for government ownership will be urgent after the Interstate Commerce Commission's report has been published. . . —Yolo Democrat.

Real Statesmanship.

When Frank P. Flint, senator from California, succeeded in getting nice protective tariff rates for lemons oranges and walnuts to benefit less than one-tenth of the population of this state alone at the expense of eighty million more people of the nation, it was considered a great "divvy" from the pork barrel; now comes the new senator, Works, with a promise to try to get justice for the lemon growers, but not to the detriment of the poor of this nation. This sounds like real statesmanship. — Willows Journal.

Insurgency a Protest.

Under the title of the "Senate Dead Locked," the Weekly Chronicle of San Francisco reads the Insurgent or Progressive element out of the Republican party. The cause for this departure on the part of the Chronicle is due to the fact that the insurgent Republicans in the United States senate refused to be governed by a caucus of the Republican senators, and acquiesce in the election of a man who has proven by his conduct in the past that he is not in sympathy with the reforms demanded by the people. . .

The men that stand branded as insurgents by such reactionary organs as the Chronicle and other stand-pat publications are, in fact, the men who are representative of the best thought and principles that are contained in the Republican party. In fact, they are the saving element of that organization, and if they are taken from the old organization, then there is no longer anything within the party that is worthy of preservation. The Chronicle makes the statement that with the Progressive element within the body of the Republican party it will be impossible for the party to elect its presidential candidate in the year 1912. It might also have said, and truly, that with the Progressive element divorced from the Republican party its nominee can not be elected. The statement that this element is the minority has not yet been proven. . . . —Pomona Times.

To Make Mining Safer.

All research and experiments designed to safeguard the lives of miners should be followed by sympathetic interest. For that reason the action of the United States government in buying a coal mine which will be worked by experts with the object of discovering the safest methods of mining will meet with general approval.—Mother Lode Magnet, Jamestown, Cal.

New York's Foreign Born.

New York City has about 1,000,000 American born citizens, 1,000,000 Italian citizens and 2,500,000 other foreign born citizens, in all 3,500,000 foreign born citizens against 1,000,000 American born. There is food for thought in the statement of an Episcopal Bishop of the Empire state, that New York City will be what the Italians make it.—Redlands Review.

OF TODAY

San Francisco, May 20.—Announcement was made here today that the Great Western Power Company will build, at Big Meadows, in the northern part of the state, a reservoir which will surpass in capacity the Roosevelt dam in Arizona and the Assouan dam in Egypt.

Sufficient water will be stored for the irrigation of 300,000 acres of land, eventually to be disposed of for the irrigation of large tracts in the Sacramento valley. In combination with the City Electric Company, which has just been acquired by the power company, the horsepower for the irrigation project will be increased to 50,000.

San Francisco, May 22.—Eugene E. Schmitz balanced his cash book last Tuesday, and, finding only a nominal sum to carry forward, hit the trail for Mexico, whither many restless Americans had just preceded him. Schmitz is not going to the troubled republic to wield sword or gun, nor to carry the banners of Diaz or Madero. He seeks not war, but pelf.

The sum the former Mayor has lost since his enforced abdication is variously estimated by his friends, but it is admitted to be considerable even by the most conservative. The only certain estimate is that he has lost all.

Sacramento, May 22.—The highest price ever realized for a car of California fruit was that brought by the second car of cherries shipped from this State several days ago and sold in Chicago today for $5,554 or at the rate of $2.55 per ten-pound box, according to the California Fruit Distributors. There were 2,188 boxes of cherries in the car.

Sacramento, May 22.—The last shipment of lady birds—known as ladys bugs, also—was sent from the Insectary in Capitol Park last Saturday by E. K. Carnes, who sent the bugs—3,000,000 of them—to the southern part of the State. The bugs are the most impartial little ones in the State. They eat anything that looks like a harmful bug, making no specialty of gobbling up a certain kind of harmful scale or buglet. They are of especial value in the Imperial Valley to keep out damaging insects which would otherwise make the muskmelon crop impossible.

Fresno, May 26.—That a steamship of the regular river size will make a trip between Stockton and San Francisco to a point beyond Herndon, about 15 miles from this city, early next month, possibly June 5th, was announced today by the River Navigation Committee of this city. The trip will be made no later than June 9th and will be for the purpose of demonstrating the possibilities of navigation on the upper San Joaquin.

Doyle (Lassen Co.), May 26.—The fall of a giant meteor, followed by four smaller ones, caused consternation throughout Lassen County yesterday morning. The first meteor, which was plainly seen by several in this place, fell in the direction of Tule Lake and the shock of the explosion was heard for miles around and caused the earth to tremble as though from earthquake.

J. D. Brown, Night Agent for the Western Pacific Company here, saw the meteors. He declares that the big one resembled a huge burning barn sailing through the air. The noise was like that of escaping steam from a score of locomotives and the explosion when the meteor sank from sight was deafening.

Chief of Police Martin retired on a pension. As his successor, John F. Seymour was chosen.

Mayor McCarthy celebrated Seymour's elevation with another statement.

"At best," said the Mayor, "no city can afford to tolerate more than one so-called 'tenderloin district,' and I absolutely insist upon a proper and immediate policing of San Francisco which will centralize the element that must ever be watched by the police and by the police made to respect and fear the law.

"Your newly chosen chief of police (Seymour) is a veteran officer of your own department, experienced and skilled in his life's profession and distinguished throughout the country and abroad for his eminent ability and his unimpeachable character. Consistent with my promise and pledges heretofore made, I have labored diligently to secure for the people of San Francisco the services of this most capable officer, and now that success has crowned by efforts I entertain the earnest hope that your honorable board will share in my high opinion of the man and will look to him as the executive head of your department for the achievement of the many improvements in the police department so long sought by me."

And now other changes come in the San Francisco Police Department. McCarthy has removed his own Commissioner, Henderson, as summarily as he removed Taylor's appointees, giving Max Goldberg Henderson's place.

The new board proceeded to suspend Chief Seymour. They passed the necessary order, but Seymour took the matter to the courts. At present writing, Seymour holds his job, but if the Police Commission finds him guilty of misconduct, however arbitrarily, he will have to go.

McCarthy has issued a long statement to the new Board of Police Commissioners in which he sets forth that, "pursuing a policy definitely outlined before the municipal election, November, 1909, which policy was passed upon and approved by The People at that time, I am determinedly interested in giving to the community within the law, a liberal and square administration which is in harmony with our universal wish for civic peace and progress, commercial development and the legitimate pursuit of happiness."

That sounds well, but what does it mean? Does it mean a revival of the glories and scandals and bankruptcies of our one taste of a "Paris of America"?

That is for the events of the next few weeks to show.

LAW-MAKING JUDGES.

When the North and the South were at white heat over the question of Negro slavery, in that bitter period which culminated in the Civil War, the rights of a slave were brought to a hearing before the Supreme Court of the United States, and irreverent liberty men were often heard to say of the decision that "it gave the law to the North and the nigger to the South." History repeats itself. The same Supreme Court, its dominant members now in friendly touch with plutocracy as those who dominated it some sixty years ago were with slavocracy, has just disposed of two cases involving the plutocratic principle even as that old decision involved the slavery principle; and although it may not be said that in these cases history has repeated itself literally, it seems to have repeated itself in effect as closely as superficial circumstances permit. . . .

Let it be distinctly understood that in these comments we make no attack of our own upon the Supreme Court. We go no further in suggestive criticism than the oldest and one of the ablest of its members goes in his dissenting opinion. While agreeing with the decision dissolving the oil trust, Justice Harlan does not agree with it in usurping the authority of Congress, and he says so in unmistakable and highly significant terms. What could be more sinister in significance than his indignant phrases, to which Senator La Follette gives this shortened but not altered form: "The court has by judicial construction written into the Sherman anti-trust law language which the great combinations and trusts have been endeavoring to persuade Congress to add to it by way of legislative amendment?"—The Public, Chicago.

Departing Guest—You've got a pretty place here, Frank, but it looks a bit bare yet. Host—Oh, it's because the trees are a bit young. I hope they'll have grown to a good size before you come again!—London Opinion.

Cliff Creek contains some of the sharpest and most angular slide-rock that the writer has ever experienced. We needlessly ascertained this fact in attempting to cross-cut the trail, which is generally smooth and well rounded from its continual use by cattle. The waning day sent us down Cliff Creek at a lively pace, for we planned to camp for the night at Redwood Meadow. We reached this charming spot about sunset, that mystic time when sequoias are seen at their best, for the huge cinnamon shafts tower up into the leafy shadows like pillars in a temple. Indistinct in the twilight, the waxen spikes of the lupines stand like tapers on the altar, while soft and clear throughout the darkling aisles of the forest sounds the magic flute of the woodland, the vesper song of the dwarf hermit thrush. One would fain linger in such a spot under the spell which eventide throws over all nature, but the seeping streams were warm and uninviting, so we hastened on and just at nightfall came upon the gurgling waters of the North Fork. For an hour the campfire shone on the circle of faces and cast a flickering light into the recesses of the forest. Then each scooped for himself a little hollow among the stones and crawled into his sleeping-bag. For a moment or two the stars twinkled and birds of the night called to each other from the leafy branches over our heads. Then all was dark and all was still.

Crossing North Fork and Deer Creek next morning, we struck the new trail to Giant Forest. It skirts the base of Sugarbowl Dome without cutting contours until Buck Canon is crossed. Then begins the ascent which ends only at the top of Seven Mile Hill, from which point the old and the new trails run side by side. For us this four-thousand-foot climb was a tough one. The day was hot and humid; the trail dry and dusty. We made the climb in the middle of the day—the price we paid for a couple of hours' "beauty sleep" that morning. But neither sultry air, glaring sun nor thirsty trail depressed our spirits as much as the fact that we were entirely unprepared for what we experienced. We had been told of the fine new trail that did away with the steep zig-zags of the old. As often, therefore, as the trail bore off to the west, the step quickened and the stride lengthened in the hope that we were now on the shady stretch that would lead to the far-famed sequoias. More than a score of times did our hopes fall as the trail turned back into the sun again and began the climb once more.

The new trail is beautiful—for pack animals—and so safe that a fractious mule cannot fall his own length, but anything with more spirit than a burro will find it monotonous and disheartening. Having experienced the new, next time the writer would try the old trail by Alta Meadows, which though rougher and more dangerous, has distinct scenic value.

It was such a pleasant variation from the steady up-hill pull of the morning, that the descent from the ridge of Panther Peak was made at a swinging pace; and forty-eight hours after we picked up our packs in the Kern Canon, we threw them off in Giant Forest, certainly not a bad record for a knapsack party, some of whom were women.

Of the days spent in the shade of the sequoias little need be said, for the delight and charm of this spot is well known. Our morning rambles startled the deer in the leafy glades and sent the quail scurrying to cover on the sunny slopes. We wandered idling through the forest and waded waist-deep through acres of lupines whose delicate perfume filled the air and attracted myriads of bees, the drowsy hum of whose wings lulled one to slumber at the noon hour. From Moro Rock, that huge dome of granite, we looked across the valley of the Middle Fork of the Kaweah toward the Great Western Divide, and from Sunset Point watched the shadows fall. Flowers there were, the old-time favorites that everybody called by their first names and others so little known that no one knew any gossip about them. They said that the fishing was good and showed a couple of dozen fishlings caught in a far-away stream—to us who had come from the Kern! About the big sloping rock to the south of the store we slept and on it built our campfires, the pot-holes which freckle its surface affording the best kind of seats. A score of people there are who can tell of one so large that there were forty feet inside the brim. Strange tales there were, too, of how the animals got in one night and ate the melons and cake and opened a can of cream to go with the coffee. Two days and nights were spent amid pranks and pleasures, then came the main party with its official chronicler who put an end to the literary career of a scribbler-errant.

Real Estate Mortgages

THE safest form of investment is a real estate mortgage on improved business or residence property in cities, provided it be selected with care and judgment. Such loans pay interest at the rate of six, seven or eight per cent, varying somewhat according to the amount loaned.

I make a specialty of securing such loans for my clients. My experience in building and knowledge of real estate values assure reliable appraisements and safe investments. I attend to drawing all papers, securing certificates of title, insurance policies and the collection of interest without expense to the investor, the borrower paying all charges.

I have on hand at my office good safe mortgages ranging from $500 to $5000 paying 7% net, secured by improved Los Angeles city property worth more than twice the amount of the loan. Call at my office or write me and I will send you a list.

FREMONT OLDER

Editor San Francisco Bulletin

The San Francisco Bulletin is one of the very few metropolitan dailies in California that has stood steadfastly and consistently for the cause of Progressive Reform, since its inception, in this state. This number contains a timely, very interesting article from an entirely fresh viewpoint, on "Dynamiters and Dynamiters," by Mr. Older.

A Patriotic Traitor

PROGRESSIVE DEMOCRATS are affirming that Mr. Bryan is merely trying to do his part while the followers of Underwood retort that he is trying to "do" his party. To the politician whoever would cause division in his party is a traitor, but in the eyes of those who would see such a realignment of American voters as would put all the progressives in one party and all the conservatives in the other would prove himself about the patriot the nation is looking for. Mr. Bryan does not give great promise of being that man. On the tariff issue he is a very retrogressive progressive. The country has stolen a march on him, in fact several marches, for it is now full fourteen years ahead of a tariff-for-revenue-only policy and will no more go back to it than to sixteen-to-one.

Thumbs Down

AT A MOTORCYCLE MEET in the suburbs of Chicago lately, almost at the opening of the day's events, one of the cyclists was killed in plain view of the crowd and under circumstances peculiarly distressing, whereat the management was inclined to call off the remainder of the events, but the crowd protested. They had paid their entrance money with secret expectation, if not hope, that some thrill of the kind might take place and were not to be deprived of their chance at another sensation if they knew their own minds. How much have we, in reality, progressed in the humanities since thumbs were turned down in token of death to the gladiator in the arena at Rome? Our methods have changed, but have we?

The Sale of a State

SO RUNS THE STORY: Moffatt, the big Colorado railroader, died owing four millions of overdue bonds on his road, his private fortune being encumbered as collateral security. William G. Evans, a life long friend and executor of the estate, undertook its salvation from importunate bankers. Evans has been the Herrin of Colorado. Simon Guggenheim could raise the money to pay off the debt and no one else could, but he has coveted above all else the place of boss of Colorado. Therefore, as a condition precedent to coming to the relief of the Moffatt estate and railroad, Evans was required, so runs the story, to turn the position of boss of Colorado over to Guggenheim. So the political future of a great commonwealth becomes mere "boot" thrown in in a deal between two of our modern Big Ones. Thank God that thing is no longer possible in California anyhow!

Bigness Next

NOTHING SEEMS MORE INEVITABLE than that the antitrust decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States will drive all the constituent parts of the existing big combinations into single corporations more mighty, perhaps, than the United States Steel Corporation now is. How much better off shall we be then than now? The winning of these cases by the government suggests the entirely successful surgical operation followed not long after by the death of the patient. The essential purpose of combination is exploitation and one great concern can exploit more readily than a lot of lesser ones somewhat loosely bunched. Must we tackle the problem of mere bigness next?

Where State Lines Vanish

COLORADO AND WYOMING are joined in issue before the Supreme Court of the United States over the ownership of interstate waters as states. It should be easy for the Supreme Court to apply the "rule of reason" to that case and to hold that, without relation to state lines, he who was first in time must be held first in right. However, in case of a manifestly greater public interest being on the side of the late comer some interstate or national method of applying the law of eminent domain for the condemnation and payment of the titles of holders whose rights obstruct a larger development will doubtless have to be worked out. As users of the waters of interstate streams we are citizens of the Great Republic, not of states.

Insurance Rates and Employers' Liability

ALMOST A PANICAL FEELING seems to be spreading with reference to advances in rates for insurance against liability for accidents under the Roseberry law. Perhaps the insurance companies may be stimulating this feeling, perhaps it is only the unknown that terrifies, perhaps the press may be exploiting the matter to make interesting reading, but whatever the cause the truth is that there is no occasion for indulging a tendency to stampede. At the worst the employers will have no greater burden to carry on to the ultimate consumer than his employes have carried all along, and in fact, not half as great for the reason that the injured employes and their associates have carried the entire burden of casualties to life and limb while the Roseberry law does not contemplate that the employers shall carry half of it. For example, if an accident to a head of a family result in the death of the injured his family will receive, under the Roseberry law, a sum equal to three times the average annual wages of said worker, the same not to be less than $1,000, nor more than $5,000, but the family loses the earnings of the dead husband or father for all of the years during which, had he lived, he would have toiled for their benefit.

Nevertheless, the burden to be borne by the employers will not be trivial, and inasmuch as the state has transferred to their shoulders the bearing, in the first instance, of this burden, it must in fairness see to it that adequate facilities for insuring against the risk are made available at a cost not greater than the service is reasonably worth or, in reason, should cost. Adequate insurance at reasonable cost is the foundation of employers' liability and workmen's compensation policies.

But a difficulty is that no one knows precisely what insurance rates should be in order to cover the risks insured against. Actuaries have not fully worked the problem out in this country or even in European countries. Of course insurance companies are not likely to make the mistake of charging too little to make sure of covering the risk, or to underrate that risk in soliciting business. Nor are they likely to knock each other's heads off through competition. The main risks are that the premiums charged will either be in excess of the risks assumed or else that wildcat concerns will go into the business to get what they can out of it and then go to pieces when the burden of an accumulated liability supervenes. The state must safeguard the employer in this particular even if, in order to do so, it has to establish a system of state supervised or operated insurance.

The state of Washington has done this at the outset. It has made its workmen's compensation law apply to something like fifty industries and, with the best actuary advice obtainable, it has fixed something like fifty different classes of industries with an appropriate rate for each class, causing the members of each class to bear the whole cost of injuries inflicted in that class. These rates run from one and one-half per cent of the annual payroll, for working in creameries and printing establishments, etc., up to five per cent for working in concrete construction, stone or brick work and ten per cent in powder works.

The first and best insurance that employers can take out will be to discipline their forces and put their machinery in order for the prevention of accidents. And right here the boozy employe will find himself shut out. The prudent employer will permit no employe to go to work on Monday who has spent Sunday guzzling beer and "going down the line." Workmen will very generally have to stop drinking or stop working for reliable employers. They will have to gravitate (and this is a real danger to the whole system of workmen's compensation) to the employer who first makes himself execution proof by putting his property in his wife's name, so that a recovery for accident obtained against him would be worthless and then fills his shops and works with refuse, boozy, careless and irresponsible labor that no prudent producer will dare to employ. Just how serious this outlawed competition will prove we do not know, but it is an element to be considered. It is not often that the off-scourings succeed in any line of endeavor or that their competition bites as well as barks.

There are those who would have had California delay the entering upon this policy until some braver, more enterprising state, some state in which the humanities rise more highly above the lust for gain than its own, had worked the problem out, but it is to be doubted if the manhood of California will take any such view of the issue. The industry of this state has put up to it by the Roseberry law a good, hard problem to work out with justice toward all interests, a man's problem and, for one, the writer of this is heartily glad that the policy of shirk did not commend itself to our late legislature. California can do its share toward working this great problem out as well as can any other state. And it will do it. If it does all other states will speedily follow.

Right of Way for Cities

THE DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT on the Los Angeles power bonds removes the last possible obstacle from the path of California cities that may desire to enter upon utility enterprises. The issue touched upon, which was whether a city could start into the business of supplying some utility for which a franchise had already been granted to a private company—this issue had already been covered in the United States Circuit Court, but it was new to our Supreme Court.

Nearly a year ago Los Angeles voted $3,500,000 bonds for the construction of a plant to generate electric power from the Owens River water as it comes down from the mountains, and to distribute the current for light, heat and power to the people of that city. A suit was brought by a taxpayer to enjoin the city from the sale of the bonds on the ground that the municipality had no right to enter upon the making and distribution of this utility, it having granted franchises to several private companies for this purpose, whose interests would be unfavorably affected by the city's competition.

The general question of whether a city can undertake business in competition with private companies enjoying city franchises has been covered in decisions in other states —always in favor of the city. The point raised in this case turned on the phraseology of the article in the constitution which prescribes how a franchise is to be granted to a private company, in any city that does not itself possess public works for the production of this particular utility. No provision is made for granting a franchise by a city that possesses a plant for the utility. In other words, it seems to have been the object of the framers of this section to prevent cities from creating competition against themselves. Those who carried on the case against Los Angeles undertook to make this provision work backwards, and contended that since only those cities that were without public works could grant a franchise, therefore any city that granted a franchise must forever remain without public works. Which is about like saying that since you can't make an omelet without breaking eggs, therefore if you break the eggs it must be to make an omelet. Of course Judge Shaw does not put it quite that way in his ably written opinion. That is just a little Supreme Court decision of our own.

What Judge Shaw does say—and it sounds particularly good to us as we look forward into the future—is that "grants of franchises and of special privileges by the state to private individuals and corporations are to be construed most strongly in favor of the public; and that where the privilege claimed is doubtful nothing is to be taken by mere implication as against public rights." That has the true ring to it. From the days of the Dartmouth decision our courts have held that a privilege once granted, no matter by what fraud or misunderstanding, must bind the people. But the courageous application of the principle laid down in this decision—not new and yet frequently overlooked—will serve in a measure to palliate the wrong of the Dartmouth idea.

Los Angeles is now ready to go ahead with the great work of supplying its people with cheap light and power in unlimited quantities. It should become one of the best lighted cities in the world, and should add greatly to its population through new manufacturing enterprises. C. D. W.

Who Is Going to Do It?

NEXT TO THE JOY OF ACTUALLY DOING THINGS and of regarding them when finished, comes the joy of contemplating the big work to be done, sizing it up, planning it out and figuring on who is to do it.

Here is a rare fine old world filled to overflowing with the things man needs for his comfort and development. Here is bountiful Nature ready and anxious to do her share of the work on a ratio of about 100 to 1. And here is Mr. Man, a wonderfully clever being, with an immense amount of good in him, who has thus far managed to give himself only half a chance. And the problem is so to reorganize things that everybody will begin life with a fair opportunity to win happiness and to gain his share of the good that the world provides. This means the practical abolition of poverty and unemployment, the enormous reduction of disease and crime, and a great increase in the comfort and happiness of everybody.

There is the job, and it is certainly a big one. It is not to be accomplished, like the fall of Jericho, by any business of horn-blowing, nor by religious revival meetings, nor by electing this or that party to office, nor by dreaming about socialism, nor by writing editorials; alas! It is a gigantic and complicated scheme of development, involving a thousand changes and reforms, and as many more experiments and mistakes. It calls for object lessons without number, for sacrifices, for a great amount of dull drudgery; and there are in the midst of it the sounds of strife and the cries of the injured, the ravings of cranks and the warnings of the wise. But most of all it is a matter of work—work that will not do itself but must be done by somebody—and the question is, who?

In this world's affairs we generally expect to see those who are most directly benefited by any enterprise carry it forward themselves. And as this is a project for uplifting humanity and abolishing poverty, we naturally think of the poor and down-trodden as the chief beneficiaries and look to them to strike a blow for themselves.

But we shall look in vain. They do their part in providing the object lessons, the living victims for the necessary sacrifice, but they will never be in any number fighting soldiers in the war for the common good. And those who are dreading—or perhaps even hoping—for an uprising of the masses and another French Revolution may just as well be calm. It is not going to happen. The reason why the slaves did not come to Harper's Ferry to help John Brown with his foolish rebellion was chiefly because they were slaves. Those who are really down-trodden are in no condition physically, mentally or morally to undertake warfare.

Nor are these people any more the beneficiaries of the coming new order than the rest of us. The other end of the chain that binds the slave, says Rousseau, is fastened to the master. Out of this miserable reeking pit of poverty come the diseases that carry off our children, the crimes that terrify us and the sense of injustice and wrong that destroys our peace of mind. The agent of oppression, unwilling though he may be, suffers along with the victim.

Shall we turn then to the farther end of the social line, and look to the rich to do the work? They seem to be doing some of it, for they give for colleges and libraries and for the abolition of war. Many of them have become "socialized" as we say, by which we mean that they have come to understand and live up to the responsibility toward society that their wealth has imposed upon them. But the vast majority of the members of this class are opposed to any change that may hazard their place of vantage. The test comes not in the willingness to surrender some of the gain for the public benefit—that is a mere sentiment of charity or perhaps even a longing for praise—but in the willingness to retire from the position of toll-gatherer. Money is needed in the work, for money is the concentrated essence of human energy, and through their money the rich may help. But as a class they are not with the movement—not even when they profess socialism, as many of them are doing.

Is it then the socialist with his admirably equipped machine for spreading his doctrine and with the earnest idealism that we cannot but admire, who is to do the work? There are two kinds of him: The theorist, who wishes to sit down and wait until everybody is brought to believe in socialism, when, by some sort of a grand turn-over, the thing is to be achieved as a whole; and the opportunist who recognizes socialism as a development and is ready to help any policy that leads in that direction. The first of these classes is plainly hors du combat from the start, for with this gorgeous dream dangling before his vision he has no time to waste on mere details. As for the opportunist it would seem that he might be of great value in the premises since most of the reforms are socialistic in character and tend toward the goal he is seeking. The practical fact is, however, that he is so devoted to his party, and so anxious to claim everything for his theory, and so proud of his place far in advance—as he deems it—of the general procession, that he is not very useful.

Will the churches help? They might but they will not. They are dependent—like the rich—upon the system of privilege, and they dare not be in earnest against it. In matters of morality they bear some aid, but on the economic issues that really underlie most questions of morals they are silent. They must not meddle with politics, they say; their work is saving the souls of individuals. If everyone would only do right, they piously declare, then all would be well. This is stand-patism diluted with self-complacency. A vast possibility going largely to waste.

What about organized labor? Twenty or even ten years ago before the lines of battle were so clearly drawn, the labor union was held to be a great reservoir of political strength, waiting its chance to serve the interest of humanity. Hope still survives although experience has dealt it a well-nigh fatal blow. Wherever the union has appeared in politics it has been for the gain of its class and not for the general good. It seems to have adopted, on the suggestion of the Marx socialists, the doctrine of "class consciousness," which means in effect class selfishness. Bad as selfishness is in the individual, it is infinitely worse when set up as the battle cry of some one portion of the community shut in by an industrial boundary. It is a crime and worse than a crime, a blunder; for if the people as a whole come to understand that organized labor's only interest in politics is to win special privilege for itself, they will "lay for it" with a club, and its last state will be worse than its first. By uniting with saloons and the tough element—as in San Francisco—it may have its brief hour of local triumph, but in the long run it will be heavily the loser. However, that is aside from the question, will it help? To which the answer is: Not while it maintains class selfishness.

Who, then, is to do the work? Why, the rest of us. Those that are neither so rich as to be part of the system, nor so poor and miserable as to lack energy and intelligence; those that work with hands or brain or both, and yet do not profess a class consciousness on that account; those who are dead in earnest in desiring things better—better for everybody—and yet are not hopelessly tied up to any particular theory; those who are prepared to do today's work today, whether it be easy or not, or romantic or not, or our own choice or not; those who do not claim to know it all, but are prepared to experiment and make some mistakes and to keep right on in the face of discouragement. These are the people that will do the work. While they are in harmony on the main points of the program, they are not politically united. Working in disorganized and almost erratic fashion they have still managed to accomplish much. Whenever they finally get together things will go forward with a rush. C. D. W.

Senate Constitutional Amendment Number 22

(This series of articles on the proposed constitutional amendments is intended mainly to open the discussion. The writer of them had not the advantage of hearing them discussed in committee and before the Legislature and the views he holds regarding them are confessedly inexpert, but these amendments demand attention and the writer will handle them as best he may according to his lights. Discussion of them is cordially invited.)

Initiative and Referendum

THIS IS THE DIRECT LEGISLATION AMENDMENT. The writer of this does not despair of representative government. On the contrary he clings to it and builds on it, but this affords no reason why anyone should insist that all government shall be representative and not at all direct. There is abundant room for both sorts contemporaneously and hand in hand.

During the recent session of the legislature 2877 bills were introduced in the two houses, of which 956 passed both houses and 753 became laws. It is improbable that to exceed one measure in the hundred, that will be offered a legislature for enactment into law, will ever be offered to the people directly for such enactment. Direct legislation will be reserved for the few crucial measures in which the general public has become profoundly concerned and, when so concerned, the general public should have the power to make its concern directly and immediately effective. This is the purpose of Senate Constitutional Amendment Twenty-two and its purpose is good.

A petition of qualified electors of the state, equal to 8 per cent of all the votes cast at the election previous for governor, proposing either a law or an amendment to the constitution, and addressed to the Secretary of State will cause such measure to be submitted to a vote of the people at the next general election, or to a special election to be called in the discretion of the governor. This is the first legislative power that will be reserved to the people, if this amendment is adopted, as it should be.

The second proposed reservation of power to the people is like unto the first except that, instead of proposing the law directly to the people, it may be proposed to the legislature. Petitions for such a law require the signatures of 5 per cent of the voters instead of 8 per cent. Upon the assembling of the legislature, as soon as it shall have organized, the Secretary of State must transmit such proposed law to it for action. The legislature may, in its discretion, enact or reject the measure, but may not change or amend, or it may propose another law on the same subject. Both measures must then be submitted to the next general election or at a special election called by the governor in his discretion.

The next proposed legislative power reserved to the people by this amendment is known as the referendum. Only urgency measures, such measures as provide for current expenses, measures necessary for the preservation of the public peace or health, enacted by a two-thirds vote of both houses, are to go into effect until ninety days after the final adjournment of the legislature that enacted them. During this interval of ninety days a five per cent petition of voters may be presented to the Secretary of State asking that any act or any section of any act, be submitted to a vote of the people and it must be submitted at the next general election or at a special election if the governor see fit to order one. Pending such action, the act or the section of the act whose submission has been petitioned for, must be held in abeyance and not go into effect.

None of the measures so proposed and adopted by the people is subject to gubernatorial veto, but may be amended, like other statutes, at any subsequent session of the legislature. If there be conflict between two such measures the one receiving the highest affirmative vote is to be held valid.

Until otherwise provided by law (and such provision should be made without delay) copies of all such proposed amendments and laws, together with arguments pro and con furnished by persons designated by the president of the state senate, will be sent out to all voters "in the same manner," as now provided by law as to amendments to the constitution, which provision is inadequate for the proper education of the people. The Oregon system of getting out a pamphlet to be sent to each voter, carrying as much explanatory argument as friends and foes are minded to supply at $50 per page, and sent early, is better.

These powers of direct legislation are likewise reserved to counties, cities and counties and cities and towns, except where independent charters have been adopted. Many specific provisions relating to procedures are included in amendment twenty-two not necessary to the purposes of this article.

Representative government has been indicted upon the charge of not being representative of the people on just those particular occasions when the public welfare most needs that it shall be. On all other occasions it serves passing well. This amendment, if adopted, will remedy that evil. It will be opposed mainly by two classes of persons—those who serve special interests first and those who distrust and fear free government anyhow and are at heart monarchists, aristocrats or plutocrats. All others will vote for this amendment if they understand it. By their votes on this issue shall the faith of a man in his fellow men be measured. A. J. P.

Tariff on Wool

THE QUESTION OF FREE WOOL or wool under a 20 per cent ad valorem tariff is not an issue of principle, but of policy. The partisan Republican, whose one interest in the matter is to see the Democratic party get into a quarrel or into a hole, contends that as the Democrats are by nature and protestation free traders, nothing but free wool will satisfy the demands of consistency. If this applies to wool it applies equally to everything else, and the nation would then have no revenue from customs duties and must establish a direct tax. However, no political party will allow the question of its consistency to be decided by its opponents.

Mr. Bryan takes the position that as the Democratic party has frequently declared for free wool, and as wool is a raw material and a necessity to human health and welfare, that it, of all things, should not be taxed. As a matter of abstract principle he certainly has the best of it, and all who favor the ultimate readjustment of taxation to conform to the interests of the people in the mass will hold that wool should be freed from burdens as soon as practicable. But does that mean free wool instantly? That is, as we say, a matter of policy.

Woodrow Wilson, whose opinions in general seem to be sane and logical, says that the party has always recognized in its utterances the need for caution and moderation in tariff changes in order to disturb business conditions just as little as possible. The stand-patter wants no change whatever; the radical desires a general and immediate reorganization regardless of consequences; the sane reformer believes in announcing the end to be gained and the recognition of the principle that is involved, but he would proceed slowly and cautiously, doing as little harm as possible in the work of change. The house seems thus far to be dominated by leaders of this latter kind. C. D. W.

Undivided Allegiance It was at Pasadena that Governor Johnson strongly emphasized the need for an undivided allegiance to the state on the part of all persons who would serve the state if the state is to be free and independent of corporation domination. It is astonishing how far short of an undivided allegiance many public officials used to fall under the old regime. The Watchman has overheard legislators of some pretense to character accost some bell weather of the Southern Pacific flock with: "How do we vote on this proposition" or, "Is there a program on this measure?" If orders were given orders were taken and followed without a question and yet those same men, in cases where orders were not given, would approach an issue frankly and with a manifest desire to understand it and vote loyally for the state's interest. Out from under that spell, or that obligation, they voted and talked very much as might the freest members of the thirty-ninth session.

A difficulty with a divided allegiance always is that allegiance to the state comes second and not first. It was not until after all obligations to the "organization" had been discharged that serious attention was given to the interests of the state. This also was the direction of least resistance, for where Mr Herrin or Jere Burke or Walter Parker did the thinking it saved their henchmen that fatigue that comes of craeking hard nuts. Thrown upon his own responsibility and under an obligation to do what the welfare of the state requires to be done makes a fellow dig sometimes to find out what is right, and the digging is not always easy.

The Pleasure Of Pursuit Those who take the direction of least resistance and handle public issues by the "tip" system or the "hunch" or by "taking orders" miss a zest that cannot be made up to them. They are on a parity with the young that take their nourishment premasticated, predigested and disgorged from the stomach of the parent. All the fun that was to be had out of it the parent got. There are few greater joys open to a Man than to be given some good, hard public problems to work out, something that will require him to roll up his sleeves and dig, burrow perhaps, as some of the union soldiery burrowed out of the Libby prison. With what ecstacy did they see daylight at last. No divided allegiance there! The enthusiasm involves self forgetfulness. The delver loses himself, and perhaps his whole family and next of kin, in his zeal for his task. It is out of that kind of work that progress is made. It was just that sort of an undivided allegiance, in short, that precipitated Governor Johnson into the campaign for governor more than a year ago. He forgot his law practice, what his home and his wife looked like, forgot everything except the task he had tackled, that of kicking the Southern Pacific out of the politics of this state, and nothing else than that sort of an allegiance could have kicked it out or can keep it out now that is has been kicked out.

A Personal Experience The Watchman, being under no ohligation not to tell, confesses that he once held a state office under former Governor Pardee to fill out an unexpired term where the hand of death had removed a better man than The Watchman as well as a better man for the place, but having written of "undivided allegiance," reminds The Watchman of what the then governor of California said to The Watchman when he handed him his commission. The Watchman cannot vie with Tom Lawson in remembering verbatim everything that was said but what Pardee did say was tantamount to this: "There! By blank, I want you to understand that you are 'it', from this time on. I don't want to catch you doing anything because you think I want it done, or that it would be for my interests. You have but one interest to subserve and that is the interest of the State of California. I can look out for my interests. You don't have to. It makes me sick to see men I appoint for office hanging around to get a cue from me and if I ever catch you doing it I'll fire you because I can fire you. I can't all of them for many are appointed for fixed terms. You are not. We may turn you down and you may catch me doing politics a little on the side, but you don't have to. You stay on your job and stand up until you are turned down and keep right on kicking after that if you want to. I am not saying these things to you because I think that you need to have them said to you. If I had thought that I would not have appointed you, and yet there is no harm in your knowing how I feel. There are no strings tied to you, no not even a condemned packing thread. Get busy." And The Watchman can say this in all sincerity: During his two years and two months of service under Governor Pardee he did not encounter so much as a packing thread of executive influence tending to draw him from an undivided allegiance to the state in the discharge of his official duties. This in face of the fact that Pardee was a candidate to succeed himself. What Pardee's course was with other appointees The Watchman can not testify of his own knowledge, but of his own experience he has a most vivid and grateful recollection.

Repression and Suppression Speaking of the working out of a great problem in government being a Man's job reminds one of the task which the city of Chicago lately put into the hands of a commission of trained investigators. It was none other than the solution of the social vice problem as it exists in great cities. Never before perhaps has such searching attention been given that problem. They devoted months to it. By a process of investigation and elimination they rejected first one palliative and then another, segregation and regulation among others, and, finally, by gradual reduction, they reached the conclusion that only two things could be done about it: To repress it and, ultimately, suppress what is politely termed "vice" or "immorality," but what in plain terms means public prostitution. And the wonderful part of it is that these are not visionaries or utopians, but practical, scientific investigators, yet they believe that it can be done; that if the white plague can be destroyed so can the red, although the red is more terrible and causes more suffering than the white. It looks to an uninformed observer as if a thousand years might be quite soon enough to expect the work of suppression to be complete, but these men think not. If not, education has got to be carried pretty close to the home and to childhood. It was Emerson who said that when nature desires to accomplish an end she always overloads the tendency in that direction. It would seem so. When we come to replenishing the earth, tendencies toward race suicide notwithstanding, it would seem that the tendency had been most confoundedly overloaded.

Anxious Seat If Not Mourner's Bench Those who are looking ahead less than a twelve-month see as through a glass darkly. There is no occasion for worry, to be sure, for worry helps not at all, but the only thing that is perfectly clear is that there is nothing certain. What is wanted is such a reforming of party lines as will make them conform to public sentiment with all the progressives of both parties on one side and all the conservatives and reactionaries of both parties on the other side. It ought to be the simplest thing in the world to procure such a realignment. It should only be necessary to hoist the respective banners over the two camps to make birds of a feather flock together forthwith but the perverse things won't do it. Tradition, associations, veneration for a name on a banner under which one has marched to many a battle field, all tend to hold men to the party of their nativity so to speak, so we shall see tens of thousands voting against their convictions, that they may go with their parties in the general election of 1912. What is to be done about it? Why nothing! There isn't anything to do about it except to grin and bear it.

Very Hard For Our Leaders

The situation will be easy enough for the rank and file of party voters. They have but to vote their sentiments and go their respective ways rejoicing, but not so the party leaders. We say that there is little difference in sentiment between the Republican and the Democratic progressive, and that is true, and yet the Republican insurgent is no Democrat. The Republican progressive is as much of a protectionist as he ever was. He does not believe in a tariff for revenue ONLY. What he does believe in is only so much protection as is needed only on those articles that do need it, but suppose that, so believing, the Republican progressive turns in and helps the Democrats to elect Woodrow Wilson president, frankly advising his Republican progressive confreres so to vote, and then Wilson, in his first message and the Democratic congress at its first opportunity, proceed to devise and adopt a tariff for revenue ONLY tariff bill, where will the progressive leader find himself when the reaction comes? Where the mugwumps found themselves thirty years ago, outside the breastworks, without a party and almost without a country, and their progressive followers will be without leadership and will feel themselves to have been betrayed by their leaders into the camp of the common political enemy, whereupon the old guard will reenter upon a new lease of power with increased ability to do mischief. It seems fairly evident that unless there is such a general breaking away from party allegiances as virtually to constitute two new political parties in this country, an out-and-out progressive and an out-and-out conservative, the leaders on both sides will be forced, much against their own inclinations in most cases, to preserve their party regularity and make their fights for Right Things, as they are given to see the right, within the party lines of the old parties. The rank and file of both parties can and will and should vote as they please. Perhaps we ought not to try to cross that bridge until we come to it, but it cannot be amiss to know even almost a year in advance, that there is a bridge there that will have to be crossed when we do get to it.

WOMAN'S CITY CLUB INAUGURAL.

The Woman's City Club of Los Angeles held its first meeting at the Angelus, June 5th, with an attendance of nearly three hundred. The women of Los Angeles are concerned about the management of their city, which so directly determines the nature and welfare of their homes and children and they have arranged through The City Club for lectures and addresses upon civic matters by those who know.

DYNAMITERS and DYNAMITERS

By Fremont Older

There is nothing more interesting in these stirring days than the study of public opinion; and San Francisco for many years past has been perhaps the spot where the veering of sentiment has been most noticeable. It swung back and forth during the dark days of the graft prosecution. Sometimes it was strongly favorable to the men who were pursuing the corrupters of the city and sometimes it would seem to turn the other way, swayed by the influence of the poison press, which responded to the money which was back of it. Perhaps the strangest attitude of mind that was encountered at any time occurred when James G. Gallagher's home was dynamited in April, 1908. Gallagher was the pivotal witness for the people in all the big bribery cases then pending in the courts. Of course, we all felt that the city would rise as one man and denounce the influence that everyone knew must be back of the explosion. But nothing of the kind occurred. In fact, outside of the small group of men and women who were cooperating with Heney and Spreckels there was scarcely any indignation expressed. By the merest chance no one of the eight people in the house at the time of the explosion was killed, but the intent to kill them was obvious, and the men who instigated the crime were just as murderous as the men, whoever they may be, that instigated the crime of blowing up the Times Building in Los Angeles. The circumstance that in one case the attempt to kill innocent persons was not successful, makes no difference in the iniquity of the crime.

Gallagher's home was dynamited in an endeavor to murder the witness whose testimony was an essential link in certain of the graft cases. A Greek boy named Claudianos is now serving a life sentence at San Quentin for the crime. He was convicted by a jury in Alameda county and confessed his guilt. The man who hired him to do the dynamiting, Felix Paudevaris, is a fugitive from justice and is now wandering about Europe. Paudevaris was also employed by someone who is not wandering about Europe, but is comfortably wandering about the streets of San Francisco. Is there any one looking for them? How large is the reward offered by the commercial bodies for their capture? How many detectives are searching Europe for Paudevaris, and how many are endeavoring to ascertain the identity of the man who employed him? There is no reward offered and not an officer has been assigned to that task. Something near $100,000 was originally offered by capitalists in the Times case, and a small army of the shrewdest secret service men are now searching the world for the other men suspected of participating in the Los Angeles explosion. Why such apathy in the one case and such glowing zeal in the other?

Many persons who are now extremely indignant over the blowing up of the Times Building in Los Angeles were quite cool when Gallagher's house was dynamited. Neither in Los Angeles nor in San Francisco was there any such manifestation of popular wrath as the Times case brought forth. And it is this particular attitude of public opinion that is most interesting to study. Sympathizers with the hoodlers professed amusement over the Gallagher affair. It was a subject for jest. Indeed, some of the newspaper claque for the wealthy criminal class went so far as to accuse William J. Burns of procuring the dynamiting of Gallagher's house with the object of discrediting the prosecutors in the graft cases. If my memory serves me, the Los Angeles Times repeated this false charge against Burns as it repeated and magnified every false charge against him for his attempting in San Francisco to convict wealthy criminals.

For twenty years past Harrison Gray Otis, through the columns of his paper, has been committing acts of violence against unoffending and innocent workingmen. He has called them thugs, hoodlums, ruffians, criminals, ragamuffins; in fact, exhausted a specialized vocabulary of abuse in assassinating their characters, in humiliating them and bringing sorrow and misery to their families and friends. That is one kind of violence. Dynamiting a building is another form. There never has been any more indignation over the assaults that Otis has made upon these men than there was over the actual physical assault made upon Gallagher's house. But no person who was not indignant over the dynamiting of the Gallagher home can consistently be indignant over the dynamiting of the Times Building.

I am one of those who do not believe that the use of dynamite will solve any of our problems. I think our troubles are almost wholly economic and the way out of them is not by the use of the bomb. But if it should turn out that labor had been in some way connected with the Times affair, certainly an example was set by capital when it caused the explosion which destroyed Gallagher's house. While not believing in the use of dynamite by either the rich or poor, I protest against the abhorrent injustice of those men who condone the murderous dynamiting when done by or for the criminal rich and condemn it when done by or for the desperate poor.

Moreover, my sympathy for the murdered poor and their families is not confined to those who are killed by the poor. I realize fully the horror that attaches to the destruction of the twenty-one employes of the Los Angeles Times. And I am, as every right-thinking person should be, very deeply sympathetic with the widows and orphans who were thus bereaved. But I also fully realize the horror and cruelty by which one hundred and fifty employes of the Triangle Shirt Waist factory were killed the other day in New York. And I am just as sensible of the iniquity of the crime which permitted the Newark fire trap factory, in which dozens of girls were burned alive last December as I am of the iniquity of the crime which produced the death of so many of the employes of the Los Angeles Times. I have not forgotten the Slocum disaster in New York harbor. In short, I think it is just as criminal to kill men and women in preventable accidents, by neglect to furnish fire escapes or safety appliances, or by putting weights in life preservers, as it is to blow them up with dynamite. Certainly to the widows and orphans who are left, there is little comfort and no help from the knowledge that the deceased was killed by what the law calls accident rather than by what the law calls a crime. Nor do I deem it a valid distinction that in the dynamiting case the criminal had a deliberate intention to kill. The employer who exposes human beings to unnecessary danger knows that sooner or later some human being will be killed. He does not know on what individual the blow of chance will fall, any more than the men who blew up the Times Building knew what employes would lose their lives. But in each case it was almost certain in advance that some man or woman would lose his or her life.

I am forced to the conclusion, in view of this present aspect of public sentiment as I hear it around me, that the greater part of the indignation expressed for what happened in Los Angeles has as a basis hatred of organized labor. I also am convinced that the lack of indignation over a similar act here was due to the fact that if Gallagher had been killed, a capitalist would no longer have been harassed by the court—a capitalist who had broken a great union in San Francisco and who had thus endeared himself to those who are hostile to organized labor. I have contrasted these two cases to illustrate what I deem to be an interesting phase of public opinion. I do not imagine that it will serve to quicken human sympathy or broaden the view of our people. I should be happy if such an effect should result. But even though it has no such effect I think it wise to call attention to the two cases in order to keep the record straight.

WHAT ABOUT THE TELEPHONE?

Harvard Expert Reviews Conditions in Europe as Result of Two Years' Study

"Public Ownership of Telephones on the Continent of Europe" is the title of an authoritative volume in the Harvard Economic Studies, by Dr. A. N. Holcombe, Instructor in Government in Harvard University.

The marvelous growth of the telephone business in the United States under private companies, the widespread need of a careful readjustment of rates, and the recent effort of a Massachusetts State Commission to fix new rates, make this careful study of European conditions extremely opportune and valuable.

In this carefully prepared and most timely volume, the author has clearly set forth the results of an investigation into the public ownership of telephones in Europe, made upon the ground. His aim has been, not to draft a special plea for or against the general policy of public ownership, but to show how the telephone business has actually been managed by public authorities.

Doctor Holcombe spent two years in Europe studying industrial and governmental conditions, and has drawn his information from the most reliable documentary sources and from personal interviews with the responsible officials.

In the body of the book he has let the facts speak for themselves; in the conclusion he has attempted to interpret the significance of the European experience for the American reader. Although not advocating a policy for adoption in the United States, he states in unequivocal terms his judgment concerning the true value of public ownership as a form of industrial organization in the telephone business.

JOHNSON ON THE JOB

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

A year ago I interviewed Hiram W. Johnson for The California Weekly. As we sat in the soft glow of the shaded lights in his beautiful home on Russian Hill, in San Francisco, he spoke with doubt of his chance to win in the long fight he saw ahead for the nomination and election as governor. He had just reluctantly yielded to the importunities of the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, and consented to make the race. One thing that he said that evening I naturally left out of my account in The California Weekly:

"Somebody has got to risk a beating, and they've decided that I am the likeliest person to take it, so I'll make the fight. But now that I'm in it, I'm going to make it a bully fight, for the people."

A few days ago I sat with him under the high ceiling of the Governor's office, in the Capitol at Sacramento, where the painted figures of earlier governors looked down upon us—Micheltorena, who executed the laws from 1842 to 1845; Stanford, in the early sixties; Perkins, in the eighties—and he spoke again of the campaign of last year:

"I really thought, when I began, that it was simply a case of closing up my office long enough to take my beating and then going back to work with the consciousness of a duty done. It wasn't until I had gone out in the automobile and got out among the people, that I realized how widely the knowledge of conditions had spread, and how eager the people were for a release from the domination of corrupt politicians and corporations. Then I realized that I really had a chance to win—that the big opportunity to try to make things better, of which I had dreamed, was going to be mine. That was what put heart into the fight, and carried us through successfully."

"You have redeemed practically every pledge you made or that was made in the party platform. What is there left unfinished that you started out to do? What is the constructive work that you see ahead?" I asked.

"The big thing that remains to be done," Governor Johnson replied, "is the job that lies before the Railroad Commission. We have cleared the way for them, and it is now up to them. All I can do to help is to lend them any incidental assistance I can, and of course they know that I will do anything in my power to facilitate their work and make it effective.

"Think of the size of their task! They have got to arrive at the value of all the vast properties of the railroads, figure from that the fair basis of freight and passenger rates, and then readjust the thousands of rate schedules throughout the State.

"They are the ones who are going to feel the full effects of the power of the corporations and of the poisoned press. The uproar that will rise when they get well into their job is going to surprise the public. Anything that was done to me in the campaign will be mild by comparison. For these men will have to lay their profane hands on the very person of sacred Business itself. And when that is done, men who have followed us while we have dealt with political reforms will be pulled down by Big Business, and join in the cry that the commission is 'hurting business.' And yet this matter of rates goes to the very roots of the economic injustice that has oppressed this State for forty years. The political machine was built up to make possible and perpetuate this injustice. We had to destroy that machine before we could get at the economic disease. Now that the way is clear, that disease is to be treated. That is the big job ahead."

"How is the good work that was done by the last legislature to be perpetuated?" I asked. "Have you thought of that?"

"Yes," he replied. "Two things are necessary for that. First, we must carry the Constitutional Amendments at the next election. They will make permanent the best of the legislation enacted at the last session. Of course, the most important of all are the amendments that provide for direct legislation and the recall. Get these things into the Constitution, and it will be hard to undo the good that has been accomplished.

"You know, don't you," continued the governor, "that I have perfected an organized movement to campaign for the amendments? Most of the members of the legislature have agreed to work and speak for them in their districts, and many others are to take a hand. I shall do what I can; probably make some speeches in favor of them.

"The second thing necessary to perpetuate the good work is to keep the people informed of the true conditions. That means an unremitting campaign of education. I have solved that problem, I think, by an arrangement with the progressive editors of the State. About one hundred and fifteen papers have agreed to handle a syndicate news service originating in this office and distributed gratis, giving the news truthfully. This is only part of the work of education, and only part of what is necessary to guard against the most insidious and deadly activity of the enemies of good government. I mean the stealthy poisoning done by the venal press. Papers that profess friendship for good government at all times, slyly slip into their news columns poisonous suggestions of doubt, distrust, and misstatement, slowly undermining public confidence by polluting the sources of public information. These are the most dangerous enemies we have to contend with, and we shall do our utmost to keep the public awake to the truth."

"So you think the old machine is not dead," I suggested, "but only hiding in the cyclone cellar?"

"Yes," he replied. "Or, worse than that, its agents are already abroad again, working in underground ways, especially in the press, to make the path of the railroad commission, for example, a rocky one."

"It has been worth it?" I asked. "The fight?"

"It was a bully fight," came back the familiar phrase. "And I have letters here, from all over the State, from people I know and from people I never heard of, and the things they say would make it worth while by themselves. Frankly, I enjoy the job. I've enjoyed all of it. The legislature made it easier than I had expected—a fine body of men, most of them in earnest and with a high purpose. There is more routine work than I had supposed, and I thought I had made a pretty high estimate of what I would have to do; but it is interesting work, and I'm glad of the chance to do it.

"Look up there at that painting of old Leland Stanford. I looked at that the day Stetson and Bohnett carried away the signed copies of the Railroad Bill, and wondered what he thought of the revolution that had been wrought since his day. His eyes looked straight down at me as I signed the bill. It is a wonder he did not fall out of his frame with astonishment at the changes that have come."

So much for the Governor's job as he sees it. Now, briefly, for his job as his secretaries and stenographers see it.

Anyone who thinks it a life of glorious ease should notice the office hours kept during the session of the legislature: 9 to 1, 2 to 5, 8 to 11, every day, including Sunday. Nominally, the intervals from 1 to 2, and from 5 to 8, were free; but really they were as full of work as the office hours, often of work more trying than the office work, because it involved more intimate contact with men on equally delicate matters requiring both tact and decision.

The Governor's correspondence averages more than a hundred letters a day. During the legislature, no attempt was made to answer any except those of first importance; but now this mass of correspondence must be brought and kept up to date.

The sheer manual labor of signing documents is a considerable item in the job of being governor. For example, the governor must sign all land patents, all military commissions, all school teachers' life diplomas, all diplomas of graduation of students of the State normal schools and of the University of California. As chairman of the Board of Regents of the State University, he must sign all the university's bill lists, demands on the State treasury, leases, deeds, and other documents affecting its property interests.

Other labors that keep him from idleness are the considering and making of appointments, the hearing of arguments where the requisition of accused criminals is resisted, the hearing of pleas for pardons.

As the chief official of the State, he must be at call for speeches on occasions of great public interest.

These are a few of the routine duties.

In the intervals of their performance, he is now expected to crystallize the policies the people demand, and devise the means for carrying them out.

With this exacting grind of routine, and with the extra labor of a legislative session, it is remarkable that any man should be able to do creative work in addition. But everyone who had an opportunity to watch the last session from the inside knows how large a part the Governor's personal efforts played in the shaping and passage of the principal reform measures to which it was committed.

Altogether, the State has very good reason to feel satisfied with "Johnson on the job."

NEW BOOK ON COMMISSION GOVERNMENT

Messrs. D. Appleton and Company announce for early publication an important volume prepared by Clinton Rogers Woodruff, Secretary of the National Municipal League, entitled "City Government by Commission." The book will give in compact form a definition and description of this rapidly spreading system, a discussion of the principles underlying it, and an account of its actual operation, as well as of the results which have followed its application. Mr. Woodruff has embodied in this book the fruits of the latest experience and the most modern thought and opinion on the subject. The volume will include the texts of several typical commission charters, important tables showing the features of upward of one hundred cities which are now governed under the plan, and a considerable body of statistics. The work includes important contributions by such well-known publicists and students as Albert Bushnell Hart, Horace E. Deming, Rear Admiral F. E. Chadwick, and E. R. Cheesborough, the last of whom, more than any other one man, was responsible for the Galveston plan.

Stephens on the Recall

In the session of the House of Representatives, May 23rd, in the discussion of the admission of Arizona, our representative, W. D. Stephens, spoke as follows:

My home is in Los Angeles, Cal. I had not intended to speak as early in the session as this, but I am so concerned in the initiative, referendum, and recall that I can not sit quietly by and have a vote upon this question without saying a word or two.

Before I go further, and for fear I may not distinctly say it before my short time is over, I want to declare now that I am in favor of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, and that I am in favor of the recall of judges as well.

In the city of Los Angeles we have had the initiative, the referendum, and the recall for almost 10 years, and each succeeding election has shown that the people of my city are more strongly in favor of all three of these propositions than they were at the previous election.

Take the initiative. In the city of Sacramento the wisdom of that proposition has been well demonstrated. Within the last few years the city council of Sacramento, being tied down by a great corporation in the State of California, refused to allow another railroad corporation to build a competing line through that city; but the people found in their charter and ordinances a provision which allowed the initiative to be invoked, and it was invoked, with the result, if my recollection serves me right, that by a vote of 45 to 1 the people of the city of Sacramento voted to have this competing corporation build its lines through the city. From that time to this the city of Sacramento has grown apace.

Congressman William D. Stephens

In the city of Los Angeles we have had demonstrations of the usefulness of the initiative, as well as the goodly effect of the referendum.

Let me call to your attention a particular instance of the value of the referendum. Some years ago, without any previous notice to the people, a measure was brought before the city council granting to a corporation the free use forever for railroad purposes of the river bed that goes through Los Angeles. To make a long story short, that ordinance was passed by the city council. It only awaited the signature of the mayor, who was away; but before the mayor returned the people were getting ready for a referendum and recall. The final result was that because of the referendum and the recall which would follow, the city council retracted and took back everything that they had done, and today Los Angeles is possessed of a river bed that can be made an inlet and an outlet for the future commerce of that city, the value of which can not be determined today. It runs into the millions, and we have it under our own control because the initiative, the referendum, and the recall are in our charter.

We have had the practical value of the recall clearly demonstrated. A little over two years ago Los Angeles avoided a serious municipal scandal by recalling its mayor and electing in his place a strong and sturdy citizen who served out the unexpired term, was then elected by an increased plurality for a two-year term, and this fall will be reelected for still another term, and by a larger vote than ever.

Now, as to the recall of judges. That is not yet within our city charter, but it soon will be a part of the constitution of the State of California, and after the 10th day of next October, at which time that question will be passed upon, you men will know as well as I do that the State of California will forever and forever retain the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. Is there any reason on earth why a judge should not be subjected to the same laws, the same rules that govern the mayor and the city council and the governor and the legislators of a State? None whatever. I am not a lawyer, I do not know how to plead as you men do, I am only one of the plain people come to you to talk in a plain way about what we believe you lawyers should help us do, and that is to make judges as well as other officers subject to the recall.

You members know of man after man who has stood on this floor and discussed certain questions for which all of you in turn probably have taken him to task, alleging that he did not know what he was talking about; that he was wrong about this legal question or that; and yet is that man any different if the next moment he is made a judge of some particular court? Not a bit of it. He does not know any more law, and there is no reason why he should not be subjected to having criticisms made in the way of a recall.

Furthermore, you men, as lawyers, recall a judge every day. Some one of you somewhere does. Why and how? A criminal is arrested, the case is before the court, and you ask for a change of venue. Why? You allege that the judge is prejudiced; that you can not get a fair trial before that judge. Why do you do that?

You ask for a change of venue because you say you have not confidence in the judge. Is not that a recall? Have not the people as much right collectively as you have individually to allege that they would like to have a change of venue, to wit, a change of judges?

Then after you have asked for and got the change of venue you are not satisfied. You virtually say, "Put the defendant over into the other court and I will be satisfied." Then are you satisfied? No; you take exception to every single ruling that the new judge makes. Why do you do it? Because you are not satisfied, and you say you do not believe the man knows the law, and you go on to a higher court, and from that to a higher court; and finally you get to the Supreme Court of the United States, and then you are not satisfied unless the judgment is in your favor, and you ask for a rehearing. You would do still more than that if you had any opportunity.

No man can possibly have greater respect for the bench than I have. I believe the right kind of a judge will not be swerved from his honest opinions through fear of the recall, neither will he be influenced by political bureaus of any kind.

Gentlemen, I might talk on; I am so full of this subject that I could talk for an hour. Apropos of that I want to tell you a story. Out in Los Angeles we have a good many Chinamen, who ordinarily understand and speak English fairly well, but when brought into court can not do either, and always ask for an interpreter. A certain Chinaman was arrested for killing a dog, and brought to trial in a justice's court. During the trial the prosecuting attorney asked, "What time was this dog killed?" The Chinaman did not understand, and so the interpreter put a question to him that took about two minutes. The Chinaman gave an answer fully as long. The interpreter turned to the court and said, "Your honor, him say 3 o'clock."

Now, I could talk for an hour or longer on this subject, but I would like to say "3 o'clock." I believe that unless you favor the majority report as put in by the committee you will do the committee and the country a great wrong, because the initiative and referendum and recall are coming sure, the recall of judges as well.

UNBUSINESS-LIKE METHODS

Shiftless Way of Handling Finances a Handicap to Efficiency

Charles F. Gettemy, of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics, in his report for last year illustrated the conditions of accounts in many of the Massachusetts towns and the attitude of some of the local officers by the following letter signed by a town treasurer:

"Enclosed please find the report of the town of Blank in a condition which I do not like to send in, but I can't seem to make it balance.

"I have worked at it a good deal, but to no effect, so I thought I had better not put it in ink.

"The several items are correct, I am sure, but when bunched they don't jibe.

"If you can use this report, all right; if you can't, you will have to look up another man to straighten it out. I have worked on it all I am going to. The debt sheet enclosed is O. K."

Chief Gettemy, in commenting on this letter, said it was typical of others which might be cited, and while it might be calculated to evoke amusement, it is not without its serious aspect.

In another part of his report the chief said: "I think I risk little in saying that for every dollar lost through defalcation or actual dishonesty one hundred have been lost or wasted through loose, unbusiness-like methods of handling finances, and failure to keep the citizens properly informed from year to year by means of reports compiled so as to reflect actual current conditions, not only with technical exactness, but in language easily understood by the ordinary citizen."

Several of the measures urged by Mr. Gettemy to overcome this condition of affairs have been passed by the Massachusetts Legislature.

PROGRESS OF THE SUFFRAGE CAUSE

If California is the sixth star in the suffrage flag, Wisconsin may be the seventh. A bill has passed both houses of the Legislature and if the amendment is favorably voted upon by the people, the women of the state will vote at the elections of 1913.

THE DAY AT SAN FRANCISCO

By Franklin Hichborn

Mr Charles C. Moore, President of the Panama Pacific International Exposition Company, has issued a long statement on the burning question of several days ago, the site for the Exposition. A question cannot remain burning forever, particularly when it burns as furiously as did this site question. So there has been a slacking of interest in the particular site to be selected. This bodes ill for the Exposition, for none can tell what surprise will next be sprung upon the community in the way of site suggestions.

This is not meant to convey the idea that the boosters for the several sites have slackened their efforts. They have not.

A darkey stood on the scaffold in front of the uncompleted Hearst building at the corner of Third and Market street this week, blowing a horn and shouting, "put the Exposition in Golden Gate Park," as a mild way of reminding the public that the park advocates are still at work.

The improvement clubs of the city packed Dreamland Rink, the largest auditorium in town, with an enthusiastic crowd all boosting for the park site. One speaker stated that, put to a referendum vote, nine-tenths of San Francisco would declare for the park. The statement is probably not overdrawn. Not more than one-tenth the town is interested in seeing the exposition go elsewhere. The other nine-tenths want to see the exposition go somewhere and get somewhere, and go there and get there quickly.

And while the forced enthusiasm for the park site is being kept up, the boosters for the Harbor View site are by no means idle. In the most practical way they are endeavoring to create public opinion for the Harbor View property.

But the exposition management does not move. Incidentally the exposition does not move either.

And San Francisco, from a business stand-point dull and getting duller, with great hopes based on the exposition, is in a mood to cry out, "Confusion upon your site squabble, give us the exposition which we have provided the money for."

So there was a chance for President Moore to make a decided hit with his "review" of the work of the exposition committee. All that he had to do was to take a definite stand as to site. But he didn't take a stand, and consequently he did not make a hit. In fact, his "review" fell as flat as cold pan cakes, for Mr. Moore reviewed the things which we all know about, but not one word had he to say of what we all want to know—where the exposition will be located, and when the exposition management is to give us something more substantial than hot air and squabbles.

Mr. Moore "reviewed" the sense of great responsibility which has fallen upon the exposition directors in selecting the site; he "reviewed" the several available and near-available sites, he "reviewed" the findings of the eminent landscape artists who have passed upon the sites; he "reviewed" the several reports that have been made regarding them. But not one definite word had he to say of when the work of preparing the grounds for the exposition and the actual construction will be begun. That is what San Francisco wants to know, and what in a less intense degree the remainder of the State and of the Pacific Coast want to know.

Of course there can be no work begun until the site is selected; indeed, the proclamation, full of sound and fury, which is to invite other counties to participate, cannot be made until the site is decided upon. Therefore, that it may see something moving, the city is apparently willing to accept anything for a site that that annoying incident may be closed. With the public in this frame of mind, President Moore's "reviews" of things which we all know, and which many could review even better than Mr. Moore has done, has not tended to relieve the situation in the least.

San Francisco had made many sacrifices for the exposition. Her citizens have contributed $7,000,000 for it; her voters have authorized the issuance of $5,000,000 in municipal bonds for it; her electors, for the exposition, have even sent Julius Kahn back to Congress. The city could scarcely make greater sacrifices. But in spite of it all, the exposition lags lamely—and business is dull. That the inability of the exposition management to agree upon a site has much to do with the depressed business conditions is very probable.

And should one stagnant condition lead to another, the unlooked-for come in its worst form, and the dream of a great international exposition for San Francisco in 1915 not be realized after all, the blame for it would be placed, and justly placed, at the door of the exposition management. The management has been provided with a fund three times as large as would ordinarily be deemed sufficient for such an undertaking. A special session of the State Legislature has met for it; the San Francisco city charter, and even the State Constitution have been amended for its benefit. Everything that the public could do for the exposition has been done. It is now up to the exposition management. And if the exposition fizzle, or even fail of becoming the greatest exposition up to date, that fizzle or failure will be charged to wild, stupendous blundering on the part of the exposition management, and very properly.

One of the difficulties which the exposition management labors under in these days of the test of its efficiency, is the lack of tact—not to say common sense or common courtesy—of individuals holding exposition titles and honors. William H. Crocker gave a fine exhibition of this at the Woodrow Wilson banquet.

To appreciate Crocker's blundering stupidity it must be remembered that none who were identified in any way with the Graft Prosecution were given place on the directorate of the Exposition Company, although several closely identified with the graft defense, and at least one, himself a defendant, were made directors. This has caused more or less comment, but it has in no way influenced those citizens who were ignored, presumably because of their efforts to bring the corruptors of the municipal government to book. The local Progressives who were identified with the Graft Prosecution have worked hard for the exposition, and had much to do with winning the Insurgents in Congress to the side of San Francisco when the fate of the exposition was pending at Washington. President Moore, after familiarizing himself with the situation, takes the broad view that the directorate should be generally representative. Moore's attitude gave Crocker an opportunity at the Woodrow Wilson banquet, to take a fling at the Graft Prosecution, at the expense of the exposition. Crocker is a director of the Exposition Company, and one of its vice-presidents.

According to the printed reports of the Wilson banquet, Crocker "spoke of the unity sought in building the exposition, and that Charles C. Moore, the new president of the board of directors, wanted all factions, even the Graft Prosecution, represented there."

Crocker's remark, considering the character and attitude of the guest of the evening, Woodrow Wilson, was ungentlemanly, untactful, boorish, all of which was bad enough, especially as Crocker was speaking for the local Alumni of Yale University. But the stupendously stupid remark uncovered an attitude on the part of Crocker—which is probably that of many of his associates of the exposition directorate—which, assumed by the Progressives of this city and of the State, would have made the securing of the exposition for San Francisco impossible.

Had Governor Johnson, for example, refused to exert himself to secure for San Francisco the assistance of the Progressives in Congress, on the ground that a man whose indictment during the days of the Graft Prosecution had been seriously considered—or that one who was actually indicted—had place on the directorate of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company, it is not at all likely that San Francisco would have had the admirable, and, as it developed, necessary support which the Progressives in Congress gave her when the real test came. The same is true of the Progressives in the Legislature at the extraordinary session of September last, called for the benefit of the exposition. The Progressives have had practically no representation on the directorate of the exposition but all of them, big and little, have "boosted" for the enterprise, and some of them have been able to boost most effectively.

Had the situation been reversed; had all the directors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company been Progressives, to the exclusion of those who opposed the Graft Prosecution, would the anti-prosecutionites have worked for the exposition as constantly and as unselfishly, without expectation of honor or limelight, as the Progressives have done?

The anti-prosecutionites are queer, to say the least, as Crocker's remark at the Woodrow Wilson banquet indicates. Their queerness was astonishingly demonstrated at the time Heney was shot down during the trial of Abe Ruef. Heney, it will be remembered, was at the point of death for several days. One of the days was a Sunday.

On the Sunday in question, Rev. Dr. Evans, at the time pastor of Grace Episcopal Church of this city—and a good citizen of the kind that never fears to be on the right side—offered prayers for Heney's recovery.

Now, Grace Episcopal Church numbers many "higher-ups" among its congregation. At the mention of Heney's name there was a stir among the congregation. By toss of head and indignant look, not a few made it apparent that they did not approve their pastor's supplication.

Dr. Evans, however, continued firmly for civic righteousness. Incidentally, Dr. Evans found his position quite unpleasant. He finally tendered his resignation as pastor of Grace Church and accepted a comparatively unimportant charge at Palo Alto.

I never see the blue powder burns on Heney's face and neck, but I think of the cause for which Heney was fighting when he got them, and of the unpopular prayer incident of Grace Episcopal Church.

The squabble between Mayor McCarthy and his police department grows in intensity, sensation and interest.

Sometimes we have two Chiefs of Police, each issuing orders and each countermanding the orders of the other. Sometimes, the average citizen is in doubt whether there is any chief at all, and there is pardonable confusion of mind as to which is which.

All this is due to the fact that able attorneys represent each side of the dispute, and when able attorneys get into an affair of this kind, the plain citizen may as well give up. No law-abiding person can hope to escape the disastrous effects of the lawlessness of the legal quibble.

Mr. Theodore A. Bell, Democratic candidate for Governor last year, heads the able lawyers who represent those who are endeavoring to put Chief Seymour out of office. Mr. Peter F. Dunne is the most imposing name on the list of lawyers who are laboring to keep Chief Seymour in office.

Mr. Dunne is one of the Southern Pacific's finest. Mr. Dunne is the author of that famous expression which was largely instrumental in the defeat of the effective Stetson Railroad Regulation bill at the 1909 session of the Legislature, "fluidity" in rate fixing. Mr. Dunne succeeded in creating the idea at Sacramento that year that "fluidity" in rates is more important than "stability," and a man who can do that with hard-headed legislators, has a positive "snap" when it comes to dealing with mere judges.

We all know that when two irresistible bodies moving through space with irresistible force come together, serious things happen. So when Mr. Bell and Mr. Dunne meet in legal clash we may look for confusion to say the least. And we have it here in San Francisco.

There has been much speculation in the public prints as to who is to pay Mr. Bell for his services. The same question might reasonably be asked as to Mr. Dunne. The two gentlemen have scarcely entered the contest from any sense of patriotic endeavor. Indeed, Mr. Bell is reported to have announced confidently that his fee will be forthcoming. Mr. Dunne, no doubt, has an understanding as satisfactory.

And the mere citizen, when he wearies of worrying over who is Chief of Police and who isn't, has abundant material for speculation in the question, What is behind it all?

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

Decision on Bill-boards: The decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri upholding the findings of Judge Woodson of the Superior Court at St. Louis, has been hailed in some quarters as the death knell of the bill-board nuisance. It would be most gratifying to all who care for civic beauty as against greedy gain if this hope could be entertained, but it stretches the imagination too far to believe it. Mr. Judge Woodson's decision contained an obiter dictum to the effect that he believed legislation could be undertaken for the direct purpose of abolishing all bill-board advertising, but the points he ruled on directly were those involved in a certain ordinance which consisted of restrictions on the height of bill boards, the materials of which they should be constructed and other matters that the courts of California and other progressive states have long since held to come within the domain of the city's police power. In affirming this decision the supreme court does not necessarily uphold Judge Woodson's opinion as to what further legislation might be attempted for the direct abolition of bill boards. Every time legislation of that sort has gone to the test it has been worsted, no court having as yet recognized the fact of nuisance to the eye as having more weight than the right of the individual to do what he pleases with his own property. The courts keep getting nearer to that doctrine however. It may come before long.

Oiling of Roads a Necessity: Massachusetts spent a half a million dollars last year on the maintenance of its state highways and a large part of that was for oiling the surface of macadam roads. Experience shows that unless these roads are oiled the swift-moving automobile tears them all to fragments in less than a year. The suction draws out the binder, and the road then crumbles. Indeed, the great struggle everywhere is to find any form of country road, that is of moderate cost, that will stand the suction of the automobile and the pressure of heavy trucking. Within five or six years one element of the problem will be largely eliminated, and that is the heavy trucking. The automobile truck, will carry heavy loads, but will not injure the roads as the iron-bound wagon wheel of the horse vehicle does. Less money then will be put into the foundation of the road and more into a lasting surface. In many of the states that are thoroughly alive on the road proposition the planting of shade trees is included in work of road making, as protection of the surface from the rays of the sun means longer life for the road.

Mending Tamped Roads: Pasadena has many streets that were finished by the petrolithic process of mixing oil with sand and crushed rock and then making it firm by tamping. These roads are excellent for a time and then they wear into holes and depressions, and wherever they have been opened to let in pipes they rapidly disintegrate. The city now follows the practice of keeping these streets in repair by filling the holes and trenches with a mixture of crushed rock and heavy oil which unites with the good surface and closes up the fault. The stone is a large walnut size with some smaller fragments, and the mixture is made with the oil hot. The stuff is then conveyed to the street in a wagon and spread out and tamped by hand. The result is surprisingly satsfactory.

Cold Storage Record: At the behest of State Boards of Health many legislatures are passing laws regulating the length of time various articles may he kept in cold storage, and requiring that they be plainly marked as to their age when they are discharged from custody. One article that seems to make trouble in the passing of these schedules is cheese. How old must cheese be before it ranks as rank? A discussion on this subject was conducted in the presence of Governor Woodrow Wilson last winter, which he finally brought to a close by the remark: "Very well, gentlemen, we all appreciate that cheese has its own standard of respectability."

Calcium Chloride Dust-layer: The use of calcium chloride as a means of preventing dust on streets and roads is rapidly increasing in the Eastern states. This material has the power to draw moisture out of the atmosphere and thus keep the surface in good order. Constant use of this material tends to harden and toughen the surface, and it is being extensively used on racetracks for that purpose. The customary use is about one or one and a half pounds to the square yard, and from two to three applications are required through the six months of summer and autumn. The Highway Commission of New York state finds it costs $150 a mile to keep roads in order with calcium chloride through the season.

Squeegee Machines: The streets of Washington are now washed and cleaned by squeegee machines and the results are highly satisfactory. These machines are constructed on the principle of the rubber window washers, a number of rubber blades or flanges being fixed on a long roller which is dragged along the wet asphalt street by a team of horses. The corners and edges are done by hand. It thoroughly cleans the surface, and does not risk washing out the fine particles of asphalt that serve as a binder.

Public Opinion and Clean Streets: Street Commissioner Edwards, who seems to be giving a high degree of satisfaction in his care of the streets of New York, declares that all that is needed to give a city clean thoroughfares is for the people to be in earnest in demanding them. Which recalls the fact that whereas ten years ago dirty streets were the rule in American cities, they are now the exception. This is entirely due to the awakening of public sentiment on this subject—that and the curbing of partisan politics.

Law for Arbitration of Labor Disputes: Among other reform legislation New Hampshire has adopted a law calling for the arbitration of labor disputes on the demand of either party, work to continue during the period of arbitration. Laws of this kind are generally regarded as non-enforceable, although it is to be hoped that they will be tried in a number of different forms, and that some state may hit on a method that will be effective and at the same time constitutional.

Historic Fifth Avenue: Property owners along Fifth Avenue, New York, are endeavoring to get together on some plan for beautifying that famous thoroughfare. For a starter it is suggested that the height of buildings be limited to ten stories. As yet the "skyscraper" has not gotten into this district to any great extent. Most of the buildings are far enough back from the curb to admit of some scheme of side-walk decoration of trees or of plants in boxes.

The City Housekeeper Lady: Mrs. Caroline Bartlett Crane, the sanitary expert, was sent for by the Woman's Educational and Industrial Union of Rochester to prescribe for that town. As a matter of fact, Rochester is one of the best-kept, cleanest and most wisely governed of American cities, but it is always the progressive city or individual that is most anxious to make more progress while the stand-patter is perfectly satisfied with things as they are.

Paving Street Intersections: Indiana has a new law requiring cities to pay for the paving of intersections out of the general fund instead of assessing it against the frontage. The result of this has been a considerable boom in paving in Indianapolis and the serious embarassment of the city authorities to meet the extraordinary expense which had not been included in the year's budget.

Fine Playgrounds to be Established: Syracuse is planning to purchase sites for five children's playgrounds. The fact that a child was recently killed playing in the street in a region where there were no vacant spaces helped to stir the authorities to action.

Demands Municipal Telephones: The Ogden Chamber of Commerce asks the city council to take steps to secure municipal ownership of telephones.

Firemen's Show: There is to be an International Firemen's Tournament held at Turin, France, next summer, at which the best fire fighters of Europe and other continents are expected to assemble and show what they can do.

Salt Water on Roads: The county roads around Atlantic City, New Jersey, are kept free from dust by the liberal use of salt water. It is claimed that it makes the surface of the roads harder than when fresh water is used.

City Publication: Spokane is to have a "city gazette" which will cost about $7000 a year to publish. The editor gets a salary of $110 month.

Public Control of Public Servants

The Purpose of the Merit System

By FRANCIS B. KELLOGG, M. D.

Dr. Kellogg has made a lifelong specialty of The Merit System. He is a member of the Council of the National Civil Service Reform League.

Dr. Francis B. Kellogg addressed the Los Angeles City Club at its regular meeting last Saturday on the subject of Civil Service.

For 20 years Dr. Kellogg has taken an active interest in Civil Service reform. He says, "twenty years ago my attention was called to this reform and it struck me that here was something that got in at the bottom; that there was hardly an abuse in government or a phase of political corruption, in or out of office that did not find its ultimate source in the patronage evil. On the other hand, the proposed reform was built upon a foundation of pure democracy. It was proposed to substitute for patronage, an open field, a fair and equal chance for all and let the best man win—in other words the square deal in appointments to office. I was living at that time in Tacoma, Washington. A charter revision was in progress and I was instrumental in securing the adoption of the Merit System therein. Upon my removal to Los Angeles I found this city also wrestling with the problem of a new charter in which the Merit System also figured. This charter, because of some debatable features, failed of adoption. In preparing the present Civil Service amendment to the charter, the work of the previous charter commission was taken as a basis and adopted with a few changes. The revision was done by Mr. C. D. Willard and myself assisted by Mr. Henry O'Melveny."

Dr. Kellogg has been called "the father of the Los Angeles Civil Service." He states that his part in formulating and securing the adoption of the system was a minor one, and that the credit properly belongs to the men who drew it up originally and to Mr. Willard, who, with some assistance from him revised it.

Dr. Kellogg was elected a member of the Council of the National Civil Service Reform League at its annual meeting in Baltimore last December. This body consists of sixty men of eminence in public affairs. Among them are Richard Henry Dana, chairman; Charles J. Bonaparte, Everett Colby, Horace E. Deming, William Dudley Foulke, William G. Low, Edward M. Shepard, Everett P. Wheeler, Ansley Wilcox, and our own Charles D. Willard.

Dr. Kellogg spoke in part as follows:

In the evolution of democracy the necessity of public control of public servants is a comparatively recent but already well crystallized principle. There are those who question the right of the public to control its own creatures; who contend that power having been delegated to a representative, the party represented forfeits his right to interfere. The absurdity of this assumption is so palpable that it is difficult to treat it seriously. It is impossible for the public to evade, even if it wished to, its ultimate responsibility for its creatures. Public officials are agents and as such responsible to their principal, the public. But the public has never been able to impress its agents with a proper sense of their accountability and has finally awakened to the necessity of adopting measures of control. The recall is the most recent assertion of this principle.

In filling subordinate positions public officials have shown through all history the inevitable tendency to use such appointments to further their own political interests rather than to secure the best service for their employer, the public. In order to control its servants and put a stop to this abuse, the merit system was worked out. Public control of the public servant is the real object of the merit system. It is a double application of the principle. It controls both the appointing official and the appointee as well and it controls them in the interest of the public. The first, it controls by restricting his power of appointment to a carefully tested list of eligibles in the selection of which his political preference has nothing to do. It controls the appointee by making his tenure to depend upon his efficiency and his efficiency only. It controls him by cancelling all his obligations, if he has any, and making it for his interest to do good work by making promotion dependant thereon. It controls him by prohibiting his political activity and protecting him against political assessments. It is public control because the Civil Service Commission in a peculiar sense represents the public. It certainly does not represent the administration any more than the bank examiner represents the bank. This is so true that unless a commission has the loyal support of the public in its work its position is difficult. The position of civil service commissioner is not a political one. The duty of the commission is to eliminate politics from the public service, hence it is anti-political rather than political. In just the measure that it becomes political it fails of its purpose, and it fails because it ceases to represent the public. Of no other office can it be so truly said that it is a public trust. The civil service commission is trusted to see that the other officials are faithful to their trust. The trust is, therefore, doubly sacred.

"The purpose of the merit system is to substitute efficiency for politics as the basis for appointment to the civil service and advancement in it; to establish the civil service of the city and state upon a business basis" and to secure for that business the best available talent. The system is grounded upon the principle that one motive and one only should obtain in the making of public appointments, viz: the public weal.

The temptation to yield to other motives and make the public welfare secondary is almost inevitable. The motive which tends to replace that of the public weal is private advantage. The appointing officer quickly discovers that he can make his appointments minister to his political fortunes. In the early and palmy days of spoils in the mother country the patronage brokers opened headquarters in parliament, where offices were openly sold to the highest bidder. We tolerate nothing quite so raw as this in this day and country. It is done more quietly as e. g., in the Lorimer case, but it is done just the same. I would not say that there are no public officials who make their appointments with an eye single to the public weal. There are such who can be trusted to do so but so long as the temptation is there it will find victims; the single minded official will be the exception and appointments for private ends the rule. It is the business of the merit system to remove this temptation from the office holder's path. So long as it is left there you can hardly blame the official for yielding to it. The failure to remove it gives quasi consent thereto.

The adoption of the merit system is notice served by the public upon the office holders that the subordinate positions exist for the exclusive benefit of the public and are to be filled on that basis alone. This system establishes a new standard of official ethics. Moreover, there is involved no injustice to the office holder. It is only fair to him that this temptation to capitalize his office at the public expense should be removed from his pathway.

Conscientious officials have no argument against the Merit System. They welcome it. They know that it is their most effective ally in the efficient conduct of their offices. They have no ulterior personal ends to serve. On the other hand, when a public official takes the field against Civil Service, watch him. The presumption is that he scents danger to his private interests rather than to the public welfare.

There are two classes of officials who object to the Merit System. First and foremost the official who is using his appointments to further his political fortunes, and second, the honest official whose motives are pure and who finds himself hampered in what he regards as the most effective conduct of his office. He reasons "the merit system was designed to restrain bad officials. They need it, I am a good official and do not need it, therefore, I should be exempt from its restrictions." "I am better fitted to select my subordinates than any commission is to do it for me." Granted that this is all true, which it is not, what happens when this good man is succeeded by another who has not the strength to withstand the pressure for places, or who has secured his succession by promising them in advance? The good man, if he has failed to abide by and support the civil service because it seemed to hamper him, if he has complained and found fault with it and given the impression to the unthinking that it is undesirable, this good man has made it easy for his unworthy successor to practically annul the system and justify himself in doing so.

But the whole premise of the conscientious faultfinding official is false. The Merit System has been designed to help good officials as well as to checkmate the bad. The good official can make better appointments by its aid than without it. Does it not stand to reason that good men who devote their time and exclusive attention to testing the special qualifications of all candidates will succeed much oftener in getting the best man rather than the head of a department who has other duties to perform than testing applicants, and who is not protected from the pressure of friends, relatives and special pleaders, not to mention the pressure of party leaders, as the civil service commission is protected?

But, it is argued, the head of the department knows better the qualifications required in a subordinate than an outside body can. Possibly, but that special knowledge is by the law at the disposal of the commission and is added to its other advantages. The law recognizes the necessity of and provides for cooperation between the head of a department and the Civil Service Commission. If we admit for the sake of argument that there are certain offices which should be filled by the head of a department, does experience show us that appointees to such offices are generally selected by the department head in the interest of the public? Unfortunately it does not. Hon. Winfred T. Denison, Assistant United States Attorney General, only a few weeks ago made the following statement upon this point: "This plea," (that the head of a department is better qualified to select his confidential subordinates) "experience shows has generally been used as a mere pretext in order to obtain exemptions; and as soon as they are so obtained it generally materializes in practical experience that the appointing officer forthwith goes to the political boss or district leader and receives from him the name of the person to be appointed and appoints him, whether or not he has ever seen him and whether or not there is any personal sympathy or confidence between them." The same eminent official clearly points out why the making of worthy appointments by a conscientious official can never fulfill the requirements of an ideal public service which is the aim and end of the Merit System.

Spasms of virtue never yet produced permanent efficiency in government. Stability is the one essential in which the American systems of government are weak. The old spoils doctrine that offices are something to be passed around is largely responsible. The Merit System of appointment and promotion secures stability. This idea that a man's position has to be insecure in order to get good work out of him is unworthy of intelligent men. Such an incumbent is much more likely to reason in the reverse direction. "I'll probably get my discharge with the next administration, anyway. What's the use of hurting myself." The merit system infuses emulation and stimulation into the service. The system has not yet reached the full flower of its possibilities. Efficiency records as a basis of promotion within the service is an almost necessary corollary to the Civil Service proposition and it is coming, in fact it is already being adopted.

President Charles W. Elliot, who graduated from the presidency of Harvard University to the presidency of the National Civil Service Reform League, makes the following statement: "Civil Service Reform is the fundamental governmental reform on the triumph of which all other reforms in American Governmental administration necessarily depend." In the exposition of this sweeping statement I wish to call your atention to the close relationship which the merit system bears to certain other reforms, also fundamental. These are in order, the Recall, Direct Primary, Public Regulation of Public Utility Corporations, Public Ownership, Commission Form of Government and the Short Ballot. I make the broad statement that the merit system is correlated to them all and is absolutely fundamental as a necessary condition precedent to the last three.

The Recall.

The Recall is the correction of a mistake. The Merit System prevents the mistake. The Recall is a cure for an attack of bad government which should not have occurred. The Merit System prevents bad government from occurring. The recalled official has betrayed his trust. The Merit System removes the principal temptation to betray the public trust. Measures of prevention are much more fundamental and important than measures of cure. But, and this is something to bear in mind, prevention lacks all the spectacular elements of cure. It only shows itself in the general well-being of the individual and the public. In the case in question it shows itself in a clean and economical administration of public affairs, in a healthy condition of the body politic. But that is something that is very apt to be overlooked by the unheeding public and to be taken for granted. In the case of an emergency calling for a cure, the individual or the body politic (as the case may be) has suffered more or less loss of vitality. There has been an impairment of function, a loss of physical or governmental well-being which will require time as well as a specific remedy to repair, but the effect of the cure is apparent to all and the agent credited, as it should be. The civil service by preventing bad government insures good government. That is why this reform is called fundamental. it forms the basis, lays the foundations of good government.

The Direct Primary.

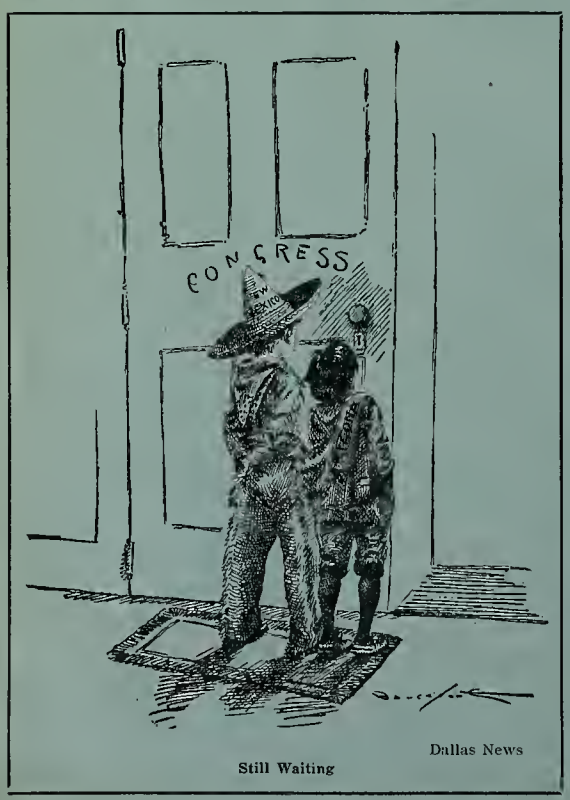
The direct primary is the application in a modified form of the civil service principle to elective officials. We farmed out the selection of our candidates to conventions on the theory that the latter would select them for us on a basis of merit, but we found that it didn't work.

In like manner we have gone upon the theory that appointing officers would make their selections solely in the interest of the public upon a basis of merit and we have been disappointed in that. In fact we have been disappointed so long and so regularly that we have grown callous and careless. We have come to regard appointments for friendship and kinship and for party service as something to be expected and even tolerated.

But the public is waking up to an appreciation of its rights and is becoming more and more jealous of them. Just as through the Direct Primary it has secured its right to name its elective officers and to demand of them their exclusive services, so through the civil service it is bound to enforce its right to select an efficient subordinate service and to demand the exclusive allegiance of its incumbents. Just as we have taken from the conventions and given back to the people the naming of elective officials so we must take from the officials and give back to the people the selection of subordinates. We must do this because experience has taught us that these subordinate positions are otherwise bound to be filled by political appointees. Let me quote you again from the First Assistant Attorney General of the United States, Hon. Winfred T. Denison. In a paper read before the annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League in December and speaking of the practicability and desirability of filling legal positions in the government by Civil Service methods, he says: "Excepting only positions equivalent to Cabinet positions in our various governments, national and local, there are no legal positions which cannot be better filled by competitive appointment and promotion than by the political system, which is the only practical alternative I know of." Appointments which have their origin in any other motive than the public welfare are in a broad sense political.

Regulation of Public Utility Corporations.

Public Utility corporations are to a certain extent public servants. It is because this is recognized that the public is insisting upon its rights to regulate them. We have found that these public servants have also abused the privileges and concessions which they have been granted by the public and that they must be curbed. But we have also found that there are flagrant abuses in the great corporate bodies in which we are all stockholders, viz: the national, the state and the city governments. Is it not the part of wisdom, not to say fairness, to first regulate our corporate organizations before taking up the regulation of subordinate ones? Can we with justice attempt to regulate our neighbor's family affairs until we have set our own house in order? We are very sensitive to the mote in the Corporation's eye, but we are very slow to admit and still slower to remove the beam from our own eye. The civil service system is the only effective means of regulating the working forces of the parent corporation, the state, in the interest of the stockholders, the people.



Public Ownership.

I yield to no man in my devotion to the principle of public ownership of public utilities. This way lies progress and this way our face is set, but let me tell you that the civil service principle is the very bed-rock foundation upon which public ownership must be built. Without a strong civil service, public ownership would soon become a public calamity. By public ownership is generally understood not only ownership, but operation and it is with this interpretation that I use the term. Every extension of this propaganda without civil service will simply mean a multitplication of the spoils army and of the opportunities for its manipulation. There would be danger that the resulting tyranny would be much more oppressive than that at present endured at the hands of private corporations. With the Merit System firmly established and with an educated public sentiment behind it, the door is open and we can safely enter into our inheritance and the enjoyment of all the blessings, privileges and opportunities which are promised in this great public ownership crusade.

Commission Form of Government.

The commission form of government without civil service is quite as dangerous as public ownership without that safeguard. Commission

CALIFORNIA 50 YEARS AGO

Monday, June 10, 1861

At the last session of the Legislature a bill was passed for the construction of a railroad from Los Angeles to San Pedro. The cost is estimated at $400,000, and the bill contains clauses enabling Los Angeles county to take stock in the undertaking to the amount of $100,000 and Los Angeles city $50,000, and to issue eight per cent bonds for the amounts as the road progresses. It is said capitalists down South are willing to embark in the enterprise. The calculation is that the road will pay fifteen per cent per annum. There is also talk down South of a new steamer being built to ply along the coast from San Francisco to San Diego.

Olive oil, to the amount of about 500 gallons, was manufactured last year in Los Angeles county, at the Mission of San Fernando.

Tuesday, June 11, 1861

As quite an excitement is being raised in this State in regard to the new element of wealth recently discovered in Calaveras and adjoining counties, a description of these new mines may not be uninteresting to our readers. There seems to be a well-defined vein or lead of copper ore running from the foot of the Table Mountain, a few hundred yards south of the Central ferry, on the Stanislaus river, in Tuolumne county, bearing in a northwesterly direction through the whole line of the Salt Springs Valley, in Calaveras county, and along the line of the foot hills, in the same direction, across the Calaveras, and as far north as Camp Seco, in Calaveras, and Lancha Plana, in Amador county. . . . The greatest amount of labor has been expended thus far in the Salt Spring Valley, on the east or upper side of which, some six miles north of the Stanislaus river, the town of Copperopolis (Heaven preserve us!) is located.

Wednesday, June 12, 1861

The shock of an earthquake was felt at San Francisco on Sunday night.

Sold—After dark last evening, an enterprising newsboy, who had a few unsold "extras" of last week's issue on hand, brought them out, and made a dash up J street, raising the usual cry to insure their sale. Quite a number of purchasers were duped out of two bits each (sic!) before the fraud was detected.

Thursday, June 13, 1861

The Visalia Delta of the 6th of June, speaking of grasshoppers, says: "Their name is legion," and they are on their way down to Visalia as fast as legs, wings and an occasional fair wind can carry them. . . . They are coming in perfect swarms and eating up every green thing.

A train of six wagons left Stockton on Monday, June 10th, each loaded with about six thousand pounds of freight for Carson City and Virginia City. This is the first shipment of goods by team to Washoe made this season over the Big Tree route.

Friday, June 14, 1861

Los Angeles News—Banning and Hinchman have begun slaughtering at New San Pedro. . . . They expect to be able to kill about two hundred head a day.

We are informed that E. J. Mitchell, teacher of plain and ornamental penmanship, of this city, died recently at Nevada.

"I've took the pledge, Bill. I'm never going to touch another drop as long as I live."

"Oh, well, cheer up! Maybe you won't live long."—Life.

Kahn's Compassion

Hon Julius Kahn of California is speaking in the House of Representatives. He is opposing the admission of Arizona into the Union because its people saw fit to put into its new constitution the initiative, referendum and recall. Direct legislation, Mr. Kahn is saying, impressively, is not compatible with a "republican form of government."

Mr. Lenroot: "Then I want to ask the gentleman this question, as to whether he believes the constitutional provision in our Federal Constitution of guaranteeing a republican form of government is not a continuing duty on Congress?"

Mr. Kahn: "Yes; I think it is."

Mr. Lenroot: "Then I want to ask the gentleman whether his state of California has not proposed a constitutional amendment to be submitted to the people for the recall of judges?"

Mr. Kahn: "I am sorry to say that has been done, but so long as I have voice or breath I shall protest against it with all of the energy and vigor that I can command."

Mr. Lenroot: "Just one more question. I want to ask the gentleman this: If his State of California shall adopt that constitutional amendment, whether he believes it will then be the duty of Congress to exclude California from the Union because it has not a republican form of government?"

Mr. Kahn: "That is up to the Courts and the Congress. I thought, however, the gentleman was also referring to the initiative and referendum. I think the initiative is undoubtedly unrepublican. I think it probable that the recall is not unrepublican. Perhaps I may add that I believe the initiative would ultimately lead to the destruction of all government. It would lead to anarchy."

Perhaps it may be thought a trifle inconsiderate for the Gentleman from Wisconsin to have put the Gentleman from California into so much embarrassment. A congressman who is made to declare in debate that his poor, deluded countrymen back home are running themselves into anarchy, is in no enviable position. But still further embarrassment awaited the Gentleman from California.

Mr. Baker: "Is it not a fact that in the last Republican platform adopted in September by the Republicans of California they adopted the initiative, referendum and recall?"

Mr. Kahn: "They did, and I am sorry for that." * * *

For a representative to feel "sorry" for his party and the people of his State as he sees them running riderless along the path of progress is to stir the sympathies of all men who are moved by political catastrophes. We wonder if the constituents of Mr. Kahn will accept his compassion in the spirit in which he offers it? We wonder, too, if Mr. Kahn, following his own convictions and his own logic as laid down so emphatically in the case of Arizona, will ask the voters of his district to reelect him as their representative on the following campaign issue: "Let Congress exclude our great and glorious State of California from the Union, unless she fixes her government to suit the Money Power—and Mr. Kahn."—La Follette's.

SOME HEALTH PROVERBS

In a few simple, one-sentence sermons, as true as gospel, the State Health Department gives to the citizens of Virginia more direct information on the preservation of health and happiness than ever before since the department was established, and Commissioner Ennion Williams and his able assistants are to be congratulated on their work.

Here are some of the health proverbs which should be pasted in the hat:

"The man who says he had rather have smallpox than be vaccinated, never had the smallpox."

"An open window is better than an open grave."

"Warm rooms have killed more people than ever froze to death."

"If you let the child have measles when he is young, you may save a doctor's bill later on, but may have to pay the undertaker now."

"A good iron pump costs less than a case of typhoid."

"If your milkman brings you warm milk, make it hot for him."

"Wire screens in the windows may keep crape from the door."

"A fly in the milk often means a member of the family in the grave."

"If some people were as much afaid of flies as they are of bad water, there would be less typhoid."

"When you see a child looking like an angel, do not kiss it; you might make a real angel out of it."

"Scarlatina may not sound so dangerous as scarlet fever, but ask the undertaker."—Richmond Virginian.

"I see that scientists have predicted that if the suffragette movement continues, in the course of time all the women will be bald-headed."

"Let's spread the news. We may nip the movement in the bud."—Life.

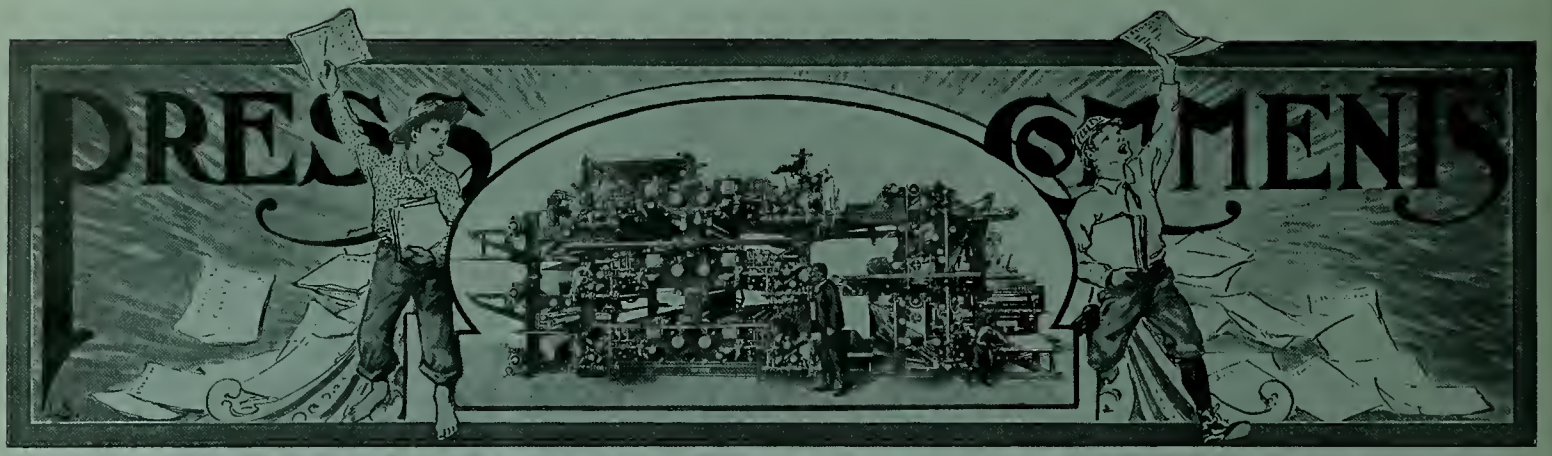
Real Estate Mortgages



THE safest form of investment is a real estate mortgage on improved business or residence property in cities, provided it be selected with care and judgment. Such loans pay interest at the rate of six, seven or eight per cent, varying somewhat according to the amount loaned.

I make a specialty of securing such loans for my clients. My experience in building and knowledge of real estate values assure reliable appraisements and safe investments. I attend to drawing all papers, securing certificates of title, insurance policies and the collection of interest without expense to the investor, the borrower paying all charges.

I have on hand at my office good safe mortgages ranging from $500 to $5000 paying 7% net, secured by improved Los Angeles city property worth more than twice the amount of the loan. Call at my office or write me and I will send you a list.

Pertinent Editorial Extracts From Our State Exchanges

Reactionaries Active

One of the great difficulties with the people that constitute the reform element is the fact that one or two victories, sometimes only partial victories, seem to satisfy them and they settle back into fancied security, as if they thought that there was nothing longer that need to give them concern. It has not yet dawned on our people that a desperate and insidious campaign is being waged by a reactionary press, prompted by the men who for so many years have controlled the political destinies of our State. This compaign is not open or frank in its conduct. Such a procedure would be fatal to the interests of the parties concerned. Their methods are to work by cowardly innuendo and base insinuations which are usually aimed at the leaders of the reform party and often times at its successful candidates. It is said that the constant dripping of water will wear away the hardest stone. This same principle is applicable in political affairs. The constant fault finding and the heaping up of false accusations against faithful public servants do not fail to have their effect upon the minds of an unstable public. Publicity is the only thing that can overcome such methods. An unfettered and courageous press is the greatest factor in insuring the safety of the people's rights. —Pomona Times.

Workin~ in the Ri~ht Direction

The efforts of Senator Works to bring about a curtailment of some of the worst features of the liquor traffic in Washington, have excited some derision among the captives of demon rum; but thus far there has been no denial of the fact that the national capital is disgracefully saloon ridden. It is strange how men will admit an evil and still deride a man who is courageous enough to seek to abate it.—Stockton Record.

"Higher Ups" Should Not Be Immune

President Taft, in deciding that Morse and Walsh, two big bankers serving penitentiary sentences, were not entitled to clemency probably voices the sober second thought of the country. The chances are that if they were train robbers instead of bank robbers nobody would think of pardoning them. It is a satisfaction to have a conspicuous illustration of this sort where the big fellow gets exactly the same dose as the little fellow.—Ukiah Times.

One Way to Stop It

The efforts of the Los Angeles Times to injure the standing of Governor Johnson should meet with instant disapproval on the part of the people. Throughout the nation, no man stands higher in the estimation of good citizens than does the governor of this state. * * * The efforts of the Times to injure him are a disgrace, not only to the paper itself, but to the city in which it prospers and flourishes. Just as long as the public will favor the sheet with its patronage, just so long will it continue its vile and misleading utterances. But let the Times feel in a financial way that its motives and principles do not meet with favor and none need have cause for doubt that the policy of the paper will be changed.—Hollywood Citizen.

Regulating Public Utilities

The new task of regulating public utilities in the United States is stupendous, just how stupendous reports of the census bureau on telephones, street and electric railways, and central electric light and power stations go to show. Seven billions of dollars of capital will be directly and vitally affected if the tidal wave of public regulation goes rushing on. * * * * Governor Tener of Pennsylvania declared his administration in favor of public service commission in that State, giving reasons which are worthy of repetition. "I am convinced that there is a pressing necessity for the regulating of public utilities or public service companies," he said, "and for the creation of a commission before which any resident of the State may file complaint against a public service corporation for violation of the law and to compel those companies to give such reasonable and satisfactory service as the public has a right to expect and which it was intended should be given when those companies were given privileges by charter rights."—Eureka Californian.

Good Roads

The Colorado Senate has adopted a resolution for the submission of a constitutional amendment providing $10,000,000 for good roads. California has approved a bond issue of $18,000,000 for highways. New York voted $10,000,000 for the same purpose. Texas has gone the limit by voting $25,000,000. The movement seems to be contagious, but some states show more wisdom than others in the way they handle this important work subject.—Redlands Review.

Woman Suffrage in New Zealand

New Zealand, generally known as the best governed country in the world, extended suffrage to women in 1894; everybody is of the same opinion: that it has been a great advantage in every way; everything seemed to be much cleaner and there has been a perceptible lowering of the tax rate. The principal element in America that opposes woman suffrage is the beer trust and whisky ring; that is one element the anti-saloon people can depend upon. The woman will vote for home and the children almost every time, while many of their husbands vote for the highest bidder.—Willows Journal.

First Duty of Government

Education is the first duty of government. It means better citizens, more morality and greater competency; it teaches men to think for themselves and cures the curse of ignorance. Every thoughtful person will agree with these propositions except those selfish interests which desire to employ child labor. In these people the criminal instinct and the lust for gold is so pronounced that they cannot see the need of education. Fortunately for mankind, in general the selfish few who have no regard for the general good are in a hopeless minority.—San Diego Herald.

Philosophy of Hard Work

J. C. Stubbs has been for a generation one of the grim and silent forces who has worked out the destiny of the Huntington-Harriman railroad systems. He now retires, at the age of 65, from his place as traffic manager and in doing so drops these chunks of philosophy:

"There is no genius. It's hard work.

"The world belongs to the young man.

"A man must be possessed by his work and then be able to manage it.

"Obstacles create character, just as the resistance of the air currents make the kite fly."

There is truth in these sayings, but they do not represent the whole truth of useful living. How much sweetness and light did you find in this daily grind, Mr. Stubbs? How much time did you have to think of and work for the common welfare while serving your iron masters? And now that you are a tired old man, "turned out to pasture like an old horse," to use your own figure of speech, how much real satisfaction do you find in contemplating the fierce struggle through which you have passed, with high credit to your ability and loyalty, let it be said?

The philosophy of hard work is sound, but it should be supplemented by the philosophy of beautiful living, of human service.—San Diego Sun.

Systematic Tree-Planting

To encourage tree-planting by property owners the city of Everett, Mass., has undertaken to pay half the cost.

Trees are a valuable asset to any city. Without them the city would be a bare and unattractive place, and the streets far less comfortable during the summer months.

Yet many streets are almost barren of trees. Too many persons follow the line of least resistance in home-making, the fashion of getting along with as little work as possible. Some people live in apartments because less labor is required to keep them up. If they have homes, they won't plant trees, and for the same reason. They do not like to rake up leaves.—Sacramento Bee.

Used Up

"So you were introduced to Teddy Roosevelt this morning, eh? Let me shake the hand that shook the hand of Roosevelt!"

"No, sir; that hand's lame."—Lippincott's.

PUBLIC CONTROL OF PUBLIC SERVANTS.

Government involves the short ballot but it leaves to be appointed all the officials omitted from the long ballot. Any measure which increases the number of appointments to be made adds to the opportunities of the spoilsman. It is unthinkable with our experience with the evils of patronage and our knowledge of human nature that five men should be given unregulated power to fill all municipal offices. How could there be devised conditions more favorable for the creation of a machine. Machines are not constructed upon the housetops. They are constructed in the cellar and the temptation to use the materials thrust into the hands of the commission by a too confiding and careless public would be almost irresistible. The recall would avail to remove the commission after its derelictions had come to light, but it could not prevent the demoralization of the public service consequent upon its application and the abuses which led up to it. A civil service board independent of the main commission and honestly administered would render the creation of such a machine impossible and lay the foundation of an honest and effective administration not only for the present, but for the future. I have thus briefly endeavored to show the fundamental relationship of the Merit System to the more recent reforms. The latter are still to a certain extent under trial. The Merit System is not under trial. It has been tested and its efficacy has been demonstrated and if in any given instance it seems inadequate the fault is with its application and not with the system itself.

In closing let me quote once more from the Honorable Assistant Attorney General of the United States. "It is as plain as day that this fight for the civil service system or as it might better be called the public service system, is a fight not only for moral right, but for the good of the mass of the people. It is the most valuable political asset now lying around loose, and why unmercenary political leaders have not seized upon it I cannot understand. It is, to my mind, one of the most effective contributions of our generation to the betterment of our methods of government and the consequent welfare of the people."

THE PEOPLE WANT TO KNOW

If you think that Senators Bourne, Cummins, La Follette, Bristow and a dozen other Progressives are negligible factors of American politics, please note, remarks the Lewiston (Maine) Journal, that the demand for Senator Bourne's great speech on popular government has reached 3,100,000 copies, while his later speech on patronage has already circulated 600,000 copies, so that private secretaries and clerks are busy overtime responding to requests. The speech on popular government calls for popular nominating elections and for the recall of all officers, excepting only the President of the United States, whose nomination is to be effected not by politicians holding in their hands delegations from States that in no case can help elect candidates. The speech on patronage is an unanswerable impeachment of the spoils system.

In the robes of the most Ancient Order of Teachers in the world.

One who has known her intimately for five years and has studied with her, would say to those who have a desire for knowledge; those who are seekers after the beautiful, this:

"If you would learn, you must find a Teacher; having found the Teacher, you must give attention. With this Teacher—Miss Armstrong—subjects which from other Teachers have seemed too obscure, are made clear, penetrating, intelligible. Los Angeles now has an opportunity to hear the wisest and greatest of Teachers the world has known. If you question this, go and hear her and your doubts will disappear and you will forget my advice and think that you were lead by some higher power to the very wellspring of truth. Her teaching is not the wisdom of past ages —not the East speaking to the West—but much better! It is TRUTH which all should hear!

"It is light shining in darkness and having a voice and winged words to tell its meaning.

"You cannot help but be illuminated if you will go and listen. How can I make my meaning clear? I would like to say to all, who by any possibility can do so, go and hear her. She is one of the Teachers of Teachers!"

Intelligent Suffrage Campaign

A good example of the excellent campaign work being done by the Political Equality League of California is shown in the following, which is issued in circular form:

Women in the Home

We are forever being told that the place for women is in the home. Well, so be it. But what do we expect of her in the home? Merely to stay in the home is not enough. She is a failure unless she does certain things for the home. She must make the home minister, as far as her means allow, to the health and welfare, moral as well as physical, of her family, and especially of her children. She, more than anyone else, is held responsible for what they become.

She is responsible for the cleanliness of her house.

She is responsible for the wholesomeness of the food.

She is responsible for the children's health.

She, above all, is responsible for their morals, for their sense of truth, of honesty and decency, for what they turn out to be.

How Far Can the Mother Control These Things?

She can clean her own rooms, but if the neighbors are allowed to live in filth, she cannot keep her rooms from being filled with bad air and smells, or from being infested with vermin.

She can cook her food, but if dealers are permitted to sell poor food, unclean milk or stale eggs, she cannot make the food wholesome for her children.

She can care for her own plumbing and the refuse of her home, but if the plumbing in the rest of the house is unsanitary, if garbage accumulates and the halls and stairs are left dirty, she cannot protect her children from the sickness and infection that these conditions bring.

She can take every care to avoid fire, but if the house has been badly built, if the fire escapes are insufficient or not fireproof, she cannot guard her children from the horrors of being maimed or killed by fire.

She can open her windows to give her children the air that we are told is so necessary, but if the air is laden with infection, with tuberculosis and other contagious diseases, she cannot protect her children from this danger.

She can send her children out for air and exercise, but if the conditions that surround them on the streets are immoral and degrading, she cannot protect them from these dangers.

Alone, she cannot make these things right. Who or what can?

The city can do it—the city government that is elected by the voters to take care of the interest of the people.

And who decides what the city government shall do?

First, the officials of that government; and,

Second, those who elect them.

Do the women elect them? No, the men do. So it is the men and not the women that are really responsible for the

Unclean houses
Bad plumbing
Unwholesome food
Danger of fire
Risk of tuberculosis and other diseases
Immoral influences of the street.

In fact, men are responsible for the conditions under which the children live, but we hold women responsible for the results of those conditions. If we hold women responsible for the results, must we not, in simple justice, let them have something to say as to what these conditions shall be? There is one simple way of doing this, give them the same means that men have. Let them vote.

Women are, by nature and training, housekeepers. Let them have a hand in the city's housekeeping, even if they introduce an occasional housecleaning.

ONE THOUSAND HOMELESS.

A curious and unique memorial of philanthropic activity is in the late Alice Willard Solenberger's book, "One Thousand Homeless Men," published by the Russell Sage Foundation through the charities publication committee in New York.

It is an enduring monument to a brief life spent in housing the homeless and befriending the friendless—Mrs. Solenberger died in December last, just when her work as agent of the Chicago bureau of charities had begun to impress public sentiment with a sense of its reclamatory value.

Tramps and vagrants have furnished many topics for sociolgical writers, professors and sensational magazinists; but this is the first book by a woman in which their life and environment is the main theme. While it has the accuracy of a scientific social study, it is also a human document of compelling interest—an absorbing and dramatic story of hapless mortals whom the author befriended.

In this work, for the first time, the submerged social group classed as "tramps and vagrants" is so carefully differentiated as to reveal its miscellaneous contents of able bodied and sick, young and old, sinned against and sinning. Here, too, new uses are made of a modern charity's "case records," a thousand of which yield up their secrets to an interperter with experience and vision.

Modern organized charity usually accepts the tramp and vagrant as an ugly fact, hopeless of improvement and destined to perpetuity, like a wen on the face of civilization. The record of what this single minister of beneficence accomplished in controversion of this theory and belief is extraordinary and surprising.

In her office was mustered every morning for four years a ragged regiment of the homeless and forlorn. It was her task to deal with them after the method of organized charity, which has for its prime motive the restoring of a man to his home and family.

Beggars and tramps, confirmed in their manner of life, gave her the real facts about their homes and families and transgressions. More than one hardened fellow became her ally and helped her search out the young boys and persuade them to go home to their parents. She had so many sources of information that her power of securing hidden facts from the lodging houses and saloons and dark places seemed almost uncanny.

As this personal, intimate life record discloses, this young, attractive and entirely normal woman was wiser than all the city's rulers, economists and sociologists when the matter in hand was the problem of dealing with homeless men and boys in a vast community.

Her book is, in effect, a guide and text book in practical, up-to-date philanthropy.—Philadelphia North American.

The Los Angeles Investment Co. Guarantee
What the Guarantee Fund is and What it is Not

The Guarantee Fund is the most original and the strongest feature about the Los Angeles Investment Company. It is as positive a protection against loss as could possibly be devised; it is a protection designed especially for the small stockholder. The Fund was originally donated by the stockholders who had become wealthy through buying stock in the Company. The Company has no control over the disposal of this Fund. By the terms under which it was started, it must purchase stock from stockholders who wish to sell and who have never owned more than $500 worth of stock. To date, it has purchased all stock offered, irrespective of amount.

The original fund was very small. It has grown until it totals now more than $55,000.00, and is growing about $1,000.00 per month.

The terms under which the Fund must be managed protect the small stockholder first. It must buy first from those who have the smallest holdings, not from those who first offer their stock to the fund. In this way, the smaller the investment the more thoroughly is it protected. During the recent panic, the Fund was given a severe test, but it bought and disposed of all the stock that was offered to it, or $105,000.00 worth.

The Fund is perpetual. It cannot be withdrawn. In no other corporation are small stockholders able to dispose of their holdings so easily and so satisfactorily. The stock purchased by the Fund is sold at auction weekly.

The Guarantee Fund is not a promise to try to sell your stock after a certain time. Boiled down to bedrock facts, it is just this—a standing bid for stock. The money is there waiting. If you have stock and want your money back, ask for it. The Guarantee Fund has purchased to date $600,000.00 worth of stock. If you want your money back, bring your certificate or send it to the Globe Savings Bank.

Most of the stock issued by this Company is held in amounts larger than $500.00, and is not entitled to protection by the Guarantee Fund. If the Fund had to protect the large ones, it could not do it. The stock coming under its protection is a very small proportion of that issued.

Consider this: Can any possible guarantee be devised whereby an investor can have his money in full returned to him, unless his money in full has gone to the Company to start with? We think not. If an "agent" or an "agency" sells an investor $100 worth of stock and then deducts $25 more or less from that amount as "commission," turning over to the company what is left, can that company arrange a plan to give the investor his money back? Can any company afford to return to an investor more than he actually put in?

The Los Angeles Investment Company does not pay a commission for selling its stock. It never has. The chief reason for this is that the Company wants to make it possible for an investor to withdraw his investment without losing money. Another reason is that an investor who puts $100 into a company is justly entitled to see all of that $100 go directly into the Company's treasury, not partly into the pocket of an "agent" or "agency."

The Guarantee Fund of $50,000 held and managed by the Globe Savings Bank has invariably returned to any investor wishing it, his money in full. This has been possible solely for the reasons outlined above.

California's Progressive Senator

The California Outlook is destined to do a great work for California in correcting political evils and educating the people up to better things in the performance of their duties as American citizens. We need the Truth in politics as well as in religion, and this publication is giving us what we need. It should have the help and encouragement of all good citizens of all political parties financially and in every other way.

John D. Works

Helpers in Politics

THERE IS NO DOUBT that the machine has a great advantage over the forces of good government in the large number of faithful workers it has waiting at its command. To be sure, the motive that impels these workers does not stand analysis very well, but they are none the less a positive quantity that is to be reckoned with. Politics will not do itself. In extraordinary instances, where public sentiment is roused to the point of fury, very little work is needed; but for the average campaign, where the issue is nothing more spectacular than fairly good government against fairly bad government, neither being honestly in the superlative degree, an organized fight must be put up or the wrong will certainly prevail.

If the anti-machine element has won victories of late in California and elsewhere, it means not only that they have had the right on their side—which they have always had—but also that they have learned how to do politics as it should be done—on the square, and yet in a way to get results. For this purpose workers are needed—great numbers of them.

One of the foundation principles of every honest good government effort is civil service both by law and in spirit. Also there can be nothing that leans toward bribery, and the offer of places is bribery. Thus the road is closed to the reformers that is open to the machine for the obtaining of unlimited numbers of faithful help. The machine does not even need to make specific promise. It is known and recognized that it will care for its own and will apportion the spoils among the victors. Reform movements have no such reputation. They must make each fight on its merits, and they carry along no corps of trained veterans and young recruits, all eager to work for the possible reward. Workers in the good government ranks are of two kinds: Those who serve freely because they believe in the movement, and those whose services are paid for out of funds raised by subscription.

Every party organization must have a quota of paid helpers, people who devote all their time to the work, and who, for the most part, are kept busy over mere routine duties. The real political work of a campaign ought not to be done by employees—it should be in the hands of those whose only interest in the matter is a patriotic one. Of course this is not always practicable. Examples can be cited, no doubt, where it is best for the organization, and is just to the individual, that services, even of a day's work at the polls, should be paid for; but they should be considered as decided exceptions.

Good government leaders complain that of late they have noted the growth of a sentiment among an element in the party that political work should command a per diem, like jury service. It is difficult enough to raise by subscription the funds needed for postage and other office expenses, and if to this be added money to pay all or even a percentage of the workers, the financial problem becomes impossible. It is time we recovered from this intense spirit of commercialism that has taken such a hold on all classes of people, and got back to the old-fashioned ideals of patriotism and public service. The patriotism needed today is not that of shouldering a musket, but that of sacrifice of a little time and effort in political campaigns. It is all very well to gush with sentiment about Old Glory and our grandest-on-earth nation, but some one is needed to sit up nearly all night to watch the count—some one who will not come around the next day and ask for $4 for his services. That is the real thing in patriotism.

At this season of the year our schools and colleges are turning out young men who are pretty well loaded up with instruction and advice. But perhaps there is room for just this one piece more. Don't think that it is clever or smart to get pay for political work. It is neither. And under some circumstances it is distinctly unpatriotic.

Entered as second-class matter, March 4, 1911, at the Post Office at Los Angeles, Cal., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

Then Whose Government?

JUDGE GARY, head of the United States Steel corporation, is a-weary. His great corporation has no stomach for facing a competitive market at home or abroad; he dreads the pains and penalties of an everlasting evasion of the anti-trust law; and he mislikes being the target for public criticism and public reproach. He yearns for a snug harbor in a fat land, free from storms where "big money" can be made every day for all time by the biggest of corporations. Man wants but little here below!

Judge Gary proposes that this beatific condition shall come to pass by and through a national incorporation law that shall regulate and control all great corporations on a non-competitive basis, wisely limiting production so that it will always face a hungry if not a starved market—a market willing to pay a liberal price for what it wants but with never a feast or a famine. Whereat the Laird of Skibo also throws up his hat and cries "hooray for a triumphant democracy!"

We shall be trying something of the sort: Taft is for it, the Republican party will pledge itself to it, Wall street will back it, the Democratic party will not dare to challenge it and only Justice Harland, a few cranks and the writer, will protest, and they vainly, most likely. We seem to be in for it.

But whose government will it be when all the great interstate interests shall have been taken under control, when all the great captains of industry are dependent for the success of their enterprises, not upon initiative, not upon the spirit of enterprise, not upon finding newer and better ways for doing things, not upon either a friendly or unfriendly rivalry among generous-minded, upstanding men—men who greatly dare that they may greatly do, but upon control of government? In the light of the apathy of the American voter, that millstone of death that hangs about the neck of democracy, whose government will this be? Can any rational being doubt?

The writer does not know what others may think, and his opinions are not necessarily those of The California Outlook, but detesting state Socialism as he does, he would rather hazard that fortune than any attempt to abolish competition through any such instrumentality as that proposed by Judge Gary and hurrahed for by the Laird of Skibo castle. National incorporation we should have, but not national control of industry. The Sherman anti-trust law was founded upon the eternally immutable law of competition and any attempt to nullify that law of our being will prove as disastrous as any attempt to nullify in mechanical construction the law of gravitation. It spells death to the civilization that attempts it. We may humanize the competitive instinct, and that is the need of our time and the only need. We have practiced it as they practice it in the jungle, to the death, but it is a beneficent and life-giving principle and we must give it free course in our industrial life or perish of ossification and deterioration of tissue.

Transportation is not industry. It is the performance of an act of government and must be controlled or operated by government to insure identical treatment from and to all persons. What we do need is power to put Judge Gary and the Laird of Skibo in prison the first time they restrain trade, take a rebate or demand a rake-off, and they have both of them doubtless violated the anti-trust law often enough to justify their incarceration for a thousand years. This was meant to be a free and not an ordered society, and he is no good Republican, and no good Democrat, who does not swear "by the eternal" that it shall continue so to be. To depart from that ideal is to beat out the hopes of a race.

Democracy and the Expert

LOS ANGELES is one of the most thoroughly democratic cities in the nation in its form of government, and as to the spirit of its people. It has adopted every known device for maintaining a perfectly free circulation between the desires of the voters and the activities of the city administration. But it is not enough that a government be open to the people; it must also be efficient. It has a practical function to perform. Not alone must the tool be perfectly responsive to the hand that wields it, but it must also be fitted to accomplish results. Los Angeles is facing and working out, point by point, the problem of making a democratic city government efficient.

A great deal is involved in this issue—an issue which is not, of course, peculiar to Los Angeles, except that it was the first great city to adopt the democratic system and is several years older in the experience than other places. The charge is constantly made by those who do not trust the people that any government whose law-making processes are open to interference by direct legislation, and whose officers are subject to the recall, must be inefficient. A similar line of argument might even put the republic itself on trial, for while it is not entirely responsive to its citizens, it is partially so; and, as compared with European governments, our own makes rather a sorrowful showing for practical results in administration.

We may, of course, evade the issue by saying that efficiency is only one test of the value of a government to the individual. To follow up the illustration of the tool, we may say that we would rather work with a dull axe that struck where it was aimed than with a sharp one that was liable to chop off one of our own limbs. Absolute efficiency would seem to call in human affairs for control by a single master mind. That means despotism, which we have ruled out. The real issue, therefore, is not whether democracy will give us an ideal administration, but whether it will do as well or better than a form of government which theoretically rests on the will of the people, but in which their wishes are constantly disregarded.

If the matter be put up to the people as an abstraction: Do you wish efficiency in your government? the answer will always be in the affirmative. But in the concrete it is not so easy, especially when the change to an efficient form usually involves, or seems to involve, the surrender of power. Nevertheless, the sudden sweep of the commission idea all over the country is an illustration of how the people stand ready to meet the issue practically. And it is a noticeable fact that it is in the commission cities and the democratic cities that the doctrine of the employment of experts to do expert work has gathered the strongest headway.

Thus, just at the time Los Angeles adopted the democratic system of government it embarked on one of the largest business enterprises ever tackled by an American city—incomparably the largest when the cost and difficulty of the undertaking are balanced against the size of the city. This enterprise is not only great in itself, but it leads out into several allied projects, and these into others, until it is easy to conceive of a day not far distant when Los Angeles will be quite unique among American cities for the magnitude and variety of its municipal undertakings. To the success of these, efficiency in the city government is a sine qua non. Thus far it has been achieved by the employment of experts in every line of the work with compensation at market rates. Whether this called for $10 a day or $50 or $100, it was paid, just as it would be in a private business.

But there is no blinking the fact that the desire for efficiency and acceptance of the expert as a neeessity thereto is not absolutely unanimous. Every community has its share of chronic fault-finders, of fussers and mussers, of the over-suspicious and under-experienced. It has also those who have a concealed special interest or who have a passion for newspaper print. Join these together in a public meeting, and exploit their utterances in the newspaper, and you get an impression, which reactionary journals rejoice to drive home, that "the people" are unstable, when you have, as a matter of fact, heard merely the voice of a few individuals.

Los Angeles has recently had a pronunciamento from a gathering of this kind, a mass meeting of 23 people, which called upon the city council to abolish the charter Board of Public Utilities and do away with government by commission and by trained experts, with which the city was now said to be cursed. Most of those who took part in the meeting are known to be sufferers from the grievance habit, and yet the point of view they present is not to be ignored. It has a following everywhere and its roots go down deep in a certain kind of human nature. There are people who would rather undertake to do things themselves, with however direful a result, than stand by and see them well done by some one else. What percentage are such people of an intelligent American community, whose business interests are at stake in the efficiency of a city government? We believe it to be a small percentage, and have no fear of result when the issue is fairly joined.

One of the best things about good government is that it creates a taste for more of the same. Every time an expert is put to work for a city and gets results—as he will nine times out of ten—he helps the people toward a better understanding of their part in the scheme of government. The voters are the repository of ultimate power. They are the arbiters of disputes and the framers of fundamental policies; but if they desire efficiency they must not interfere with the trained and competent people in their employ except under extraordinary and abnormal conditions.

The Sneer of C. Depew

WHEN THEY LET IN THE LIGHT AND AIR on the operations of the big insurance companies in New York, a number of explosions took place, and among the smaller and less consequential matters that blew up and disappeared was the reputation of Chauncey Depew, System servant in the Senate of the United States.

After the smash-up Chaunc, who, because of his end-man proclivities, is perhaps better known as "alas—poor Yorick," continued on in the Senate, and went through all the motions the part called for, except the funny speeches. Those he omitted. Life did not look quite so humorous to Depew after he had been found out. And the joke about his name being pronounced now with the accent on the last syllable finally got on his nerves.

Just as he is about to shuffle off into oblivion, his press agent manages some how, to get him one more notice for his scrap-book. As he departs for Europe he gives the boys one last interview. Instinctively we glance it through, hoping for some new story or quip or quiddity. Alas! where be now those flashes that were wont to set the table on a roar? Gone; quite vanished. The smile has become a sneer.

Mr. Depew does not agree with Judge Gary—he tells us in this sardonic interview. He has doubts about the national government undertaking to control the business of the steel trust. This would result, he tells us, in the discharge of every man in the works every time congress changed its political complexion.

Discouraging, itn't it—a remark like that? That is to say, it might be discouraging if it came from a Still-is instead of a Scarcely-was like Chauncey. He is extinct even as a reactionary—a stand-patter that is only a hole in the ground.

Judge Gary did not propose that the government take over the steel trust and manage its business. He did suggest that the great interstate corporations should be put under government control, as to prices and such matters, in the same way that the railroads now are, and under the same principle of public welfare. The government has not as yet shown any disposition, under this system, to hire and remove railway employes.

But there is a further answer to the sneer—a more direct answer. It is known to nearly everybody except System Senators, that ninety-five per cent of government employes are now under civil service, and do not change every time there is a political turn-over. The series of enactments that brought about this reform and that placed the business of the government on a rational basis, were passed in the face of constant opposition of stand-patters of the Depew sort. It is no thanks to him and his tribe that the nation is not today in just the ridiculous position that his sneer describes.

A Roving Commission For some weeks The Watchman will be on the go, also upon the lookout with eyes and ears open. He will finger the pulse of the public as far as the public will, unknown to itself, permit him so to do and will try to get "next" to what—if anything—is going on in the public mind. This particular paragraph is being thumped out on a vest pocket edition of a writing machine at Topeka, Kansas, where the public mind is stewing in sympathy with the public body—a moist, unpleasant body—made so by a high temperature and a high humidity in the atmosphere, where it is not needed and not on the ground where it is. In western Kansas the wheat crop looks as though it would have to be harvested with barber's clippers and swept up with a whisk broom, the straw is so short, but the stand was good and the heads are not bad. It is to be observed that The Watchman is as likely to write about other things as about politics, and rather more so for The People are more inclined to talk about other things than politics, for, so far, politics is not preeminently the subject of conversation. The Watchman has to start something going in order to get politics talked about at all.

The Gentleman from Alabama He was born since the Civil War and was nourished on "the great sacrifice." Whenever "company" came to the house the old folks, as soon as the weather and the health topics had been disposed of, settled down to a recounting of the sorrows of the Civil War and reconstruction periods, each one being more eager to talk than to listen to the others. By and by the boy went North to attend a law school, primed to champion and defend the South at all points when attacked but, to his surprise, the subject seldom came up unless he raised it and even then it was lightly passed over, manifestly out of consideration for his peculiar views and environment and the subject of conversation was quickly changed to what was doing somewhere that promised to turn out prosperously. All eyes but his own were on the future. Presently the future began to absorb his own thought. The enthusiasms of the West took hold of his mind. When he returned home and the old themes of conversation were broached he found that they no longer interested him and he began to feel the blight of them upon his spirit. He was looking for a place to locate to practice his profession, but not in a cemetery of lost hopes, so one day he broke it to his father as gently as he could, saying: "Father, we people of Alabama, we who belong to the first families anyhow, are living in the past and it is a dead past, too. We have fancied that the North still cherished resentment toward us. I do not know if the North has forgiven the South or not, but it has forgotten it anyhow and is pressing on to new worlds to conquer. I want to press on, too. If I remain here the pall that is over all will be over me also. I also shall be living in the past and I don't want to. It cannot be pleasing in the sight of heaven. Therefore I am going West to settle down, going where they talk development, where men's minds are concerned for things that are to come. I am sorry to leave Alabama and perhaps I ought to stay here and try to convince it of the truth of the resurrection, but the task seems too big. I am going to try Colorado." He did, almost to the breaking of the parental heart and the estrangement of parental love, but has not in twenty years regretted his choice. He has been with the living, not the dead.

Moi Lee This also has nothing to do with politics, or if anything, then very remotely, merely as being suggestive of possible conditions by and by. It happened in an interior town of California on the great day of the year, the commencement exercises of the high school. The old pavilion was packed to its doors and hundreds stood outside unable to get in. The commencement address was endured, the salutatory and valedictory had been disposed of and, at last, after four years of patient waiting and working, came the passing out of the diplomas. With the calling of each name "Rah, rah, rah! Susie Swiftskillet or Tom Jonesmith" rang out clear and strong from the gallery where were bunched the juniors, now become seniors, and the applause started by them was generously participated in by the audience of anyhow fifteen hundred souls. There were in all thirty-five or more graduates, perhaps twenty of them sweet girl graduates, some of them very sweet and beautiful in their graduation gowns, and very popular, too. The applause they received bore testimony to that. By and by came the turn of Moi Lee. As he arose at the calling of his name sharp and clear rang out, "Rah! Rah! Moi Lee!" Then a perfect storm of applause, anyhow twice as hearty and twice as strong as had been accorded the sweetest of the sweet girl graduates, an applause in which the entire audience participated. Now Moi Lee is a Chinese.

"The same that there is for most of the present day misinformation that is current," was the reply, "the newspapers and the twenty-five-cents-a-word writers for the magazines and none other. There is nothing to it, or only just this and nothing more: Our politicians are desirous to please. If they see, for instance, that the Santa Fe company would like something put through the legislature they do not stop to be asked to put it through. They start things and put them through of their own good and free will for a company that has done so much for New Mexico and, when done, they fetch the results on a silver platter. The same is true with the Catholic church. The church is not, as many suppose, in politics in New Mexico, but the Mexican element is all Catholic and there are, consequently, many thousands of Catholic voters. In order to be in the good graces of this element our politicians fairly tumble over each other in their efforts to do whatever they think the Catholics would be likely to want to have done. The church is not in politics, as the corporations are not, but the politicians are and this condition deceives the newspaper and other writers who always follow surface indications and never go to the root of the matter."

The gentleman spoke as one having authority and he probably has, inasmuch as he is an attorney for the Santa Fe company. The discriminating reader will not fail to note that the explanation of the pro-corporation sentiment of the embryo state of New Mexico is easily accounted for. Politicians are not wont to be beneficiently active except under the stimulus of a lively anticipation of favors to come their way. The nonreciprocating beneficiary is branded an "ingrate" and to be an ingrate is to be politieally damned. Those obliging politicians are not being conspicuously eomplaisant for their healths.

Why New Mexico Is Republican New Mexico is overwhelmingly Republican for a reason not greatly dissimilar to the reason why South Carolina would be Republican if all the "blackbirds" were allowed to vote, which they are not. The Mexicans were hostile to slavery. From father to son the tradi-

The Common Sense Way to Common Sense

An Exposition of the Social Center Movement

By EDWARD J. WARD

Mr Ward is the originator of the Rochester plan of using school buildings for civic centers. The success of that experiment and its almost instantaneous adoption in many other cities prompted the Progressive University of Wisconsin to secure the services of Mr. Ward, who is now "Adviser in Civic and Social Center Development," in that institution. (Editorial Note.)

The Social Center Movement may be defined as fundamentally the use of the neighborhood's commonwealth, to develop the neighborhoods' common sense.

Edward J. Ward

The impression has gone forth that the movement for the wider use of the public school houses as Social Centers in San Francisco and Los Angeles has been delayed, not because there is any lack of agreement that these buildings may well be used for all sorts of wholesome civic, social, and recreational activities during the time that they are otherwise unoccupied, but simply because the complete social center has been pictured as a building equipped with fine large neighborhood auditorium, with stage and comfortable seats for a thousand, where dramatic and musical performances and motion picture shows take place every evening. Equipped also, with a fine neighborhood dancing floor where, with the natural chaperonage which comes through the presence and participation of the older people, the fathers and mothers of the community, the young people may have a chance to dance, not only to fine music, but in an atmosphere, made morally clean and wholesome by the absence of the commercial motive, and the presence of the prophylactic of neighborly acquaintance.

The Social Center has also been pictured as a building equipped with a fine gymnasium, shower baths, and swimming pool for men and boys, and another similar outfit for women and girls. Equipped also, with quiet game facilities and bowling alleys and billiard tables, for those who care for them. Equipped also, with a branch public library, with a refreshment and lunch stand, where the people can procure at cost, food and drink, in whose preparation there is no motive for adulteration. Equipped also, with neighborhood Health office and Dental office, where the physician and dentist who serve the day school pupils may also serve the rest of the community.

And this whole plant open and running seven days and seven nights a week with a splendid recital for instance on the great Social Center organ on Sunday afternoon; the whole plant equipped and open so as to furnish an opportunity for the whole community to spend its leisure time in wholesome ways.

And this idea is all right. The Social Center is the club house of Society, and Society includes all societies, as the whole is greater than any part It is the Grand Lodge of the Brotherhood of Man, and that makes all the other fraternal orders look like tiny sections of the real thing.

Now these ideas of the Social Center are true.

And we can't stop 'till they are realized, for we have waked up to the fact that the vigor and progress of any community depends, not only upon the way its members spend their working time, but as much, or more, upon the way they spend their leisure.

We have come to realize that vice in all its forms is largely a result of lack of wholesome public recreation facilities and leadership.

We have seen the record of investigations, which proved that where such facilities as the Chicago Field houses are provided, vice and crime drop off between 40 and 70 per cent.

We have decided that: "the ounce of prevention is worth the pound of cure," and that it will be cheaper all round, to provide wholesome opportunities for recreation than to increase our police systems and jails.

General Neighborhood Evening.—One evening each week the whole community gathers. The program opens with music by the Social Center Orchestra, followed by a lecture or entertainment, closing with a social hour.

And we are coming to recognize too that the time of greatest need for wholesome recreation opportunities and leadership is the time of greatest leisure, and this is not the day time when parks and playgrounds, and out of door facilities may be used, but in the evening, when buildings are necessary.

And our sense of economy and our recognition that wholesome recreation is educational, is leading us to see that the increased equipment and opening of the school houses is the common sense way to develop Social Centers.

But to fully equip and add to every school house to provide all the service of direction and to keep the plant open all of the time doesn't look like providing an "ounce of prevention," it looks like a ton, and we stick at the cost.

We have been buying recreation at retail in scuttlefuls, as poor people buy coal, until the proposition to furnish it for ourselves at wholesale looks like an extravagance instead of a great economy.

We Stick at the Cost

But listen! The most important part of the whole Social Center development can be secured now with practically no additional equipment in the school house, and at practically no expense. The most important part of the Social Center development is the use of the school building as a common citizens' common council chamber, a meeting place in which the citizens of the community gather and form a Neighborhood Civic Association or Club, whose object is the development of intelligent public spirit through the open presentation and free discussion of public questions, and whose membership includes all of the citizens of the district.

This is not a new proposition, it is a restoration of the old New England Town Meeting idea, or better, of the custom of using the school buildings for the presentation and discussion of public questions, which maintained in the rural community in primitive days, and which still maintains in many a country school house.

If a school building has an auditorium on the ground floor this is the room for the weekly meeting of the neighborhood citizenship organization. If it has no auditorium, but has a kindergarten room on the ground floor, this may be used.

In this case all that is necessary, is the provision of three or four dozen folding chairs. If there is no kindergarten room, then any first floor class room may be used. The fixed seats can be screwed to thin strips of hard wood, and removed for meetings, so that chairs may be set in.

The only expense is for janitor service, light and heat, which most school boards stand ready to furnish, for the average School Board recognizes that this use of the school building for citizens' gatherings, is educational in the best sense, and is perhaps the most needed form of education today—that is, citizenship—self-education.

No supervision is necessary for this work, but it is desirable that the city should have a promoter of civic activities. This man may be the superintendent of Public Recreation, or he may be a man whose sole work is that of civic promoter. He corresponds to the Civic Secretary employed by many city clubs and other private organizations, but he should be a public servant—a community hired man.

It is not necessary, however, to wait for the employment of such a person, for the citizens themselves are competent to form their own organization and by the appointment of a committee on programs to secure speakers and topics which will make the meetings live and interesting.

And, as soon as it is seen that the representatives of whatever rank welcome this gathering of the citizens, such neighborhood organizations are reassured.

For instance, a large part of the immediate success of this neighborhood Civic Organization in Rochester, New York, was due to the fact that the public servants immediately expressed a welcome to this idea of the citizens getting together for the discussion of their own public business.

At the second meeting of the first citizens' gathering of this kind in a school building in Rochester, the Alderman of the ward was invited to speak on the Duties of an Alderman. After he had spoken and his address had been followed by a free discussion of the subject, the association gave him a vote of thanks, the alderman responded by saying: "You have given me a vote of thanks. I want to give you a vote of thanks and mine is unanimous. If every member of the common council and every other public servant had frequently such opportunities as this, to come before the people whom he is supposed to represent, and discuss with them the things in which he is supposed to represent them, it would mean that we would have a better representation of the people's interest, and a better government."

This same idea was expressed by Justice Charles E. Hughes, when as Governor of New York State he said: "I am more interested in what you are doing and what it stands for than anything else in the world. You are buttressing the foundation of democracy," and then he spoke of the inspiration which he as a public official received from the fact that at last citizens were beginning to get together across party lines on the common ground of citizenship, to discuss and undersand public questions and to express their will.

And this same idea was expressed more recently by Senator Robert M. LaFollette in these words:

"Chosen individuals may strive faithfully in meeting and solving the complex problems which arise from the industrial and economic conditions of our time, but lasting results will be achieved through the growth and development of civic interest on the part of the citizens in general throughout the state.

"There is a hitherto largely undeveloped resource for the growth of intelligent public interest in the opportunity which the schoolhouses and other public huildings offer for the gathering of citizens to consider and discuss together questions of common welfare.

"Should this movement become general, it would unquestionably result in the establishment of a foundation of intelligent democracy which would make civic progress not only rapid, but conservative and sure."

There is no reason for delaying in beginning this use of the school buildings for civic gatherings. When any school building is opened for this purpose, whether it be once a week or once a fortnight, the association thus formed, should regard itself as simply the gathering of the whole citizenship. Of course to facilitate the business of the organization, it is necessary to have a president, secretary, and treasurer, and it is necessary to have a committee on programs, and another committee on legislation and improvement, to which may be referred questions regarding the way in which the will of the association may be carried out or expressed, also a committee on publicity, etc. But this drafting of a constitution should be as simple as possible, the idea being that it is a gathering of the whole citizenship. As a rule no dues should be charged, for the people pay their dues when they pay their taxes.

There are a thousand and one questions of national, state and local interest, which need discussion, and which furnish live topics. There are in every city hundreds of men and women who are interested in special reforms or have information which will be valuable for the public, but one of the first things which any such association is likely to take up is the question of providing for the young people a similar opportunity. Here is the need of supervision. The young people's organization, the boys' clubs, should he modeled on the lines of the citizens' associations, as should the girls' clubs. Very little equipment is needed, but it is necessary to have a club leader or organizer. Then will follow the desire for gymnasium equipment, library, and all the rest and the institution will develop naturally, coming in response to the expressed will of the people of the community themselves.

FROM A "MODEST LADY"

(Los Angeles Herald)

Editor Herald: This being taxpaying month I actually had to go and mix up with all those men at the assessor's office, for I am a widow and had no husband to send! I had always been told that it would be immodest and unwomanly for women to come in contact with men at the voting booth, so I knew it must be shocking to go to the assessor's office and get in line with men, and I tried to get them to send a collector to my house for my taxes, as "home is woman's place," but they would not! So I was forced to go and get in line with men! All kinds of men! I even had to pay my taxes to a man! To be sure there were other women there, just as there would be at the polling places, but I had always been told that mixing with men at the voting booth would be shocking to a modest lady, so I know it is immodest for us to go to the assessor's office. I felt so ashamed, shocked and mortified to see all those men! And was so seared that I nearly fainted, and I blushed all the rest of the day, for on my way home I had to stop at the lighting company's office, and at the water office to pay my bills and there were actually men there too!

When I got on the car to come home there were men again; men of all kinds standing close around me. I am a modest lady and I blushed all I could. I try so hard to keep in my sphere but circumstances and the laws prevent. Such things are so shocking!—Clarissa Priscilla.

SENATORIAL SKITS

"The Gray Eagle of Demoeraey"

He is the "Gray Eagle of Democracy," is John Bunyan Sanford, and if you will search the records you may note that he has been gray-eagling around the Capitol for some time, having got the habit of coming to the legislature at the Thirty-first session and skipping only one session since to date—the last session being the Thirty-ninth, as you may recall but don't. In short, it was in 1895 that John Bunyan Sanford first flapped his political pinions toward Sacramento, just one year before the Peerless One peered over the Chicago convention and permanently put the crimps into the Democratic party—unless—unless. Also unless, which will be about all on that subject.

You have only to go far enough back into the life of any great man to find that he was once a school teacher. James Garfield, Tom Reed, Robert E. Lee, John L. Sullivan, Carrie Chapman Catt—all great men, have taught school in their youth. Even Buffalo Bill has taught the young idea how to shoot. And John Bunyan Sanford is no exception. He, too, drank deep of the Pierian spring and then passed the gourd around.

After a time, however, he came to feel that his talents were being wasted. As a school teacher he could indulge his predilection for imparting information only nine months in the year, and have only the children of the community for an audience. This retail dispensing of wisdom in job lots was very well for a small bore man, but John Bunyan Sanford yearned to ship it out in carload lots to the wholesale trade, for universal consumption, the year round. John Bunyan cast a horoscope of this problem and read the answer in the stars: Get a newspaper. Which he did, so that since that day he has been one of the incorrigible advisers of the universe—a sort of irrepressible, so to speak.

Some of this advice has not been so bad. For example, he has been standing for the direct election of United States Senators so long that he has had Bunyans on his feet for years The same with the income tax. Generally speaking, he has stood pretty well for progress and reform right along for the sixteen years of his state experience in politics.

In the Senate—and elsewhere—he is an undismayed and inextinguishable story teller. A few of these stories first saw the light since Noah anchored on Ararat, but the point of all of them is that the real simon pure, hand served, three-quarters Levant and deckle-edged political doctrine is that originally passed over the counter by T. Jefferson, late of Monticello, and ever since handled exclusively by the Democratic party, all others being base imitations or gross infringements of copyright. Wherein he bears a considerable resemblance to most of his Democratic confreres in the Senate, who were a pretty fine body of men who felt obliged to spend a sizeable share of their time reminding their careless fellows that they belonged to a theoretical minority.

Senator Sanford

Senator Sanford wears a large bush of gray hair (hence the "gray eagle" business, despite the notorious fact that eagles are bald), and a large cane, the only one carried by any member of the legislature. He lives in Ukiah. One of his best friends is a Methodist minister, though you would never suspect it.

Men and Matters Before the Public

By Franklin Hichborn

The confession of Mr Frank Shay, trusted employe of the Law Department of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, that he and not William F. Herrin, wrote J. W. McKinley of Los Angeles, of how the Justices of the Supreme Court "without exception," considered the railroad side of the litigation over the California Development Company should be presented, clears Mr. Herrin of "trying out" the Justices in this particular case.

Attorney Guy V. Shoup, also a trusted attache of the Southern Pacific's law department, through whom Mr. Shay made his apology to the court, stated that "The regrettable part of the transaction is that the statemen made in the letter (Shay's to McKinley) had no foundation in fact and could not be justified."

This would appear to clear the members of the Supreme Court of having been "tried out."

And yet the letter written to McKinley by Shay, and signed "W. F. Herrin by M." set forth that, "the Supreme Justices, in conversation with me today, all seemed to be of the opinion that this paragraph should be amended so as to state the facts. * * * * It was suggested that if this could be done between now and Monday it would be an answer to the application. The Justices, without exception, were of the opinion that the appointment of a receiver would be reversed by direct appeal, although it might not be subject to collateral attack."

The many explanations may clear Mr. Herrin and the honorable Justices of the Supreme Court of the State of California. But where does it leave Mr. Shay?

Up to present writing, neither the San Francisco Bar Association nor the State Bar Association, has taken steps in Mr. Shay's case. Mr. Herrin has not appeared before the Supreme Court to make denial. Mr. Shay has written the Court a letter, but has not presented himself for examination or cross-examination. The oral part of Mr. Shay's apology was made by a second attorney.

Nor has there been any cross-examination of the Justices whom Mr. Shay interviewed, according to all concerned, on the day that Mr. Shay dictated the astonishing letter signed "William F. Herrin by M." to Mr. McKinley.

With all the "explanations" that have been made, the incident has not been explained away, nor should it be considered explained away by a profound air of offended dignity on the part of individual Justices of the Supreme Court, or abject apologies from Southern Pacific attorneys.

There is more at stake than the personal feelings of individual members of the Court—or the mere honor of individuals of the Court—the integrity of the Supreme Court itself has been thrown in the balance by the publication of this Shay letter.

The matter should not be dropped—even though this member or that member of the Court may be venerable and above reproach, or that Mr. Shay may be a royal, good fellow—until the facts and all the facts, and all the facts suggested by the incident, are known, published, and such action taken as the facts justify.

Admitting that the Court has been imposed upon, that Mr. McKinley was imposed upon, the question naturally arises, was Mr. Shay sent to the several Justices to "try them out"—without their knowledge of course—on the doubtful points of the case at issue.

In justification to Mr. Shay—he is entitled to all the justification that can possibly be squeezed out of the case for him—if not to the Justices, this should be determined.

If Mr. Shay was sent to the Justices to "try them out"; then the chaste arm of the Supreme Court of California should reach for the men 'higher up," who sent him.

If it be shown that Mr. Shay was not sent to "try out" the Court; that he didn't "try out" the Court; that, to quote Mr. Shay's colleague, Mr. Shoup, the statements made in the McKinley letter "had no foundation in fact and could not be justified," then the case concerns the honor of the California bar. Its duty in the premises is too plain to require amplification or even suggestion.

Should it develop that Shay was sent to "try out" the Justices, the Bar Association — which could very properly appoint a committee to investigate the matter—might very well inquire whether it has become one of the time honored customs of the members of the Court to make suggestions—however innocently made—to Southern Pacific attorneys, regarding cases in which the Southern Pacific Railroad, or any other litigant, is interested. If the members of the Court are being imposed upon, they are entitled to be put on their guard.

A thorough investigation, conducted by a committee of disinterested attorneys, would go far toward strengthening the Court and elevating it in public estcem. If the investigation bore the marks of thoroughness and fairness, and intention to give the facts and all the facts full publicity, no attorney in a losing suit would thereafter have reason for the slightest suspicion that his powerful opponent may have had "inside information," secured by trickery or otherwise.

The Supreme Court would, of course, welcome such an investigation. Mr. Herrin would of course welcome it. And as for Mr. Shay, the most serious charge that has been brought against him, the charge made by his colleague Shoup—that he, Shay, put into the mouths of the "Justices, without exception," statements that, "had no foundation in fact and could not be justified"—is yet to be disposed of. Mr. Shay should be glad of the opportunity to demonstrate in the most public manner possible, that Mr. Shoup overstates this feature of the case.

And as for the law department of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, it, too, is interested in giving all the facts involved the widest publicity. In a way, the honor of the Southern Pacific Company's law department is involved, and the traditional honor of the Southern Pacific Company's law department must be maintained.

During the State primary campaign of last year, the writer discovered a little nest of millionaires and near-millionaires who were making a strenuous, high-grade, automobile-assisted campaign for the nomination of Hiram Johnson. The "nest" lived in a colony of their own, down the San Francisco peninsula toward Santa Clara County, and before the campaign was over managed to cover a large area in their boosting fight for Johnson. Investigation of the cause of this unlooked-for support developed some interesting facts.

In a group of "higher-ups" in question lived a family, a member of which had had the misfortune to become insane.

There followed the usual attempt to treat the case at home, resort to a private sanitarium, and finally, in search of relief, recourse to one of the State Hospitals for the insane.

Within a fortnight after admittance to the State Hospital, the patient's jaw was smashed by an attendant. Complications set in. It was a sad case.

Incidentally, the family of which the unfortunate was a member got the idea that our State institutions are wretchedly managed. The idea spread throughout the circle of the family's acquaintances. Blame for the mismanagement was placed at the door of the "organization." Johnson was opposing the "organization." The group of millionaires and near-millionaires accordingly, without ostentation or display, supported Johnson, that better conditions could be secured, under better administration of our public institutions, at the Hospitals for the Insane.

The clean-up at these institutions cannot come in a day, but corrections of abuses are scheduled in the regular order of common sense management of state institutions. And there is plenty of room for improvement of the methods of handling the insane.

For example, under the present system, persons committed to asylums are not taken there by hospital attendants, but by deputy sheriffs.

In discussing this feature of the system, Dr. Hoisholt of the medical staff of the Stockton Asylum, in a recent interview said:

"The insane person is a sick person. If a man stricken by fever or ordinary disease were to be removed to a hospital we would hardly call in a constable or policeman to have charge of the removal. There is just as much reason why insane persons should be in charge of nurses or physicians, as that those suffering from physical ills should be."

An example of what it means for an insane person to be taken to an asylum by one unfamiliar with the methods of handling the insane was furnished recently by a case of an unfortunate committed to the Stockton Asylum from a northern county.

The deputy sheriff who handled the case, wired his charge to a two-inch scantling. The scantling was some five feet long. The wiring was done with good, strong, heavy, electric-power wire. One of the wires was passed under the patient's arms and around the plank. A second wire was fastened at the hips. The patient's legs were tied to the scantling with a clothes line. To complete the job his hands were secured by steel cuffs.

The subject was five hours on the journey. He arrived at the asylum perfectly rigid, and the dispatches add, "perfectly quiet." When the patient was liberated from the plank by cutting the rope, untwisting the wire and removing the steel handcuffs, extensive excoriations of the skin on the abdomen were found.

It was pointed out by the hospital authorities, that if a nurse had been summoned from the State Hospital to take charge of the case en route, the nurse could have given the patient medicine hypodermically and gotten along with little if any restraint, and in that way would have given the proper treatment to a sick man.

Experts who have looked into the matter, state that $30,000 a year would be saved the State if the insane were taken to the asylums by asylum attendants instead of by deputy sheriffs. On the basis of the insane taken in 1910 to the Stockton Asylum alone, $7,475.50 would have been saved.

And why, as a cold-blooded proposition, leaving the humanitarian considerations out of it, is the practice of sending the insane to asylums in charge of deputy sheriffs continued? Because there is good graft in it for deputy sheriffs.

For example, a deputy sheriff gets $5 a day and expenses for taking a patient to the asylum. A San Francisco or Alameda deputy sheriff takes two days to make the trip to Stockton. This gives him $10 and expenses. If he has more than one patient, he is paid five dollars a day for each. Three patients, for example, bring him $30 for the trip. The industry is profitable—too good to be relinquished to asylum attendants and nurses. These attendants are regularly employed, receive $2 a day, less than half the fee paid the deputy sheriffs.

Two-Inch Plank and Wires Which Were Used in Carrying a Patient to the Stockton Insane Asylum From El Dorado County.

At each session of the Legislature, a bill is introduced to require hospital attendants to accompany patients to the asylums. At each session of the Legislature, representatives of those sheriffs' offices, vitally interested, appear against the measure. At each session the sheriffs' offices prevail.

So the State continues to pay to deputy sheriffs some $30,000 a year more than it would have to pay hospital attendants, to accompany the insane to the asylum. The insane wired to scantlings or hand-cuffed, or both, continue to arrive at the asylums in various states of immobilized quietude. The interested sheriffs and their deputies continue pleased and happy.

Great is the "system" and great is the "time-honored" graft thereof.

But during the four years administration of a smallish-appearing man, who weighs more than 200 pounds and every ounce of his more than 200 a fighting ounce, many time-honored grafts are scheduled to go into the discard.

A few more wire-and-scantling cases of taking of insane persons to asylums, and this particular graft will bid fair to be one of them.

And, after all, $30,000 a year is a saving which is well worth considering.

The rights, comfort and safety of the insane, too, may have some bearing.

The most important position to be filled at any election to be held in California this year is that of District Attorney of San Francisco. The San Francisco people will elect District Attorney Fickert's successor in November.

Mr. Fickert, to put it mildly and with charitable gentleness, has not availed himself of the large opportunities which his office has offered. San Francisco, above all else, needs a man in the District Attorney's office who can and will so avail himself.

And yet, the "reformers," in making up their tickets are, up to date, as good as letting the District Attorney's office go to Fickert by default.

To put an effective fighter in the District Attorney's office would no doubt be taken by the large Public Service Corporations as a personal affront. Nevertheless, many personal affronts of this kind must be offered the Public Service Corporations of San Francisco, before peace, good order, stability and prosperity can be restored there.

Up to present writing the directors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Company have not agreed upon a site.

The status of the site squabble now makes it practically impossible for the directors to decide upon any site without scandal. The personal interest of the several directors in the various sites is, thanks to the publicity given the unpleasantness, quite well known. It makes no difference which site may be selected, some of the directors will, directly or indirectly, profit enormously.

An easy way out of the difficulties has, however, been suggested.

It has been suggested that the Exposition directors turn the problem of the selection of a site over to the State Commission appointed by Governor Johnson to disburse the $5,000,000 state fund provided for the exposition.

The commissioners apointed by the Governor are all disinterested. They are not even connected with corporations which will gain or lose as the exposition is placed on this site or that.

The State commissioners, therefore, could agree upon any of the several sites proposed without scandal. Not one of them will be affected a dollar's worth one way or the other by the selection. This cannot be said of the directorate of the exposition.

POLITICAL RESPONSIBILITY.

In the past, party orators were wont to make many and sundry promises during the various campaigns, and then promptly forget them when elected. A new order of political responsibility has been attained in this state, and in the future the people will demand and expect that their officials will make their conduct in office square with their ante-election promises. We have been prone to look upon the seeker after office as one whose promises were made to break, but the future will ask that they be fulfilled to the letter.—Yreka Journal.

The First Woman's City Club

By Florence Bosard Lawrence

California women, already known for their initiative and force, demonstrated again their right to these two adjectives when they organized May 25 at Hotel Alexandria, Los Angeles, the first Woman's club in the country. Members of this club have come from every source and direction. In fact one of the most important and encouraging factors in its establishment is the fact that the women who have rushed to embrace the opportunities it promises are not alone so-called "club women" already familiar with the wakening forces of federated club work, but in many, possibly a majority, of instances are women who have observed hitherto a particularly conservative position regarding what they conceived to be the duties and requirements of their sex.

That they have come into this new club shows more clearly than any mere verbal arguments that they are fast awakening not only to desire but to demand knowledge. The announcement that this club would require nothing from its members, beyond an open mind and a willingness to be interested in matters pertaining to city, state and national government undoubtedly has proved an attractive feature, since many women, while anxious for information concerning these matters, consider themselves either too busy or too unversed to do active work along these lines.

The organization of this club came as the direct result of a movement started by members of the federation of college women's associations. In this body are many teachers and women of professional life whose duties require their presence at hours when the big clubs for women assemble. In an effort to provide for themselves an opportunity to meet other club women and to draw inspiration and courage from the zeal and accomplishments of experienced club workers, the tentative suggestions for this club were made by a committee from the College Women's clubs, with Mrs. John M. Brewer chairman.

The first suggestion coming to the attention of women generally, brought with it an immediate realization of its potentialities. With remarkable foresight and acumen they seemed to realize that this movement presaged something bigger and more potent than anything yet tried and they were filled with that prophetic foresight which warned them to build their foundation organization upon lines wide and deep. Conscious of the need for a wise selection in their leaders, the little group of women to whom was given the working out of this idea labored long and earnestly.

With a firm determination for democracy in every detail there was a systematic avoidance of anything which might even suggest class, club, religious or political distinction. Prime movers in the first workings of the plan were Mrs. F. R. Brainard, a club woman and business woman of importance in the city, Mrs. Harriet M. Barry, publisher and editor of the Pacific Poultrycraft and associate editor of the Monrovia News, Mrs. D. C. McCan, president elect of the Friday morning club and retiring president of the Southern California Woman's Press club, Mrs. Eliza Tupper Wilkes, a well known educator and public speaker and Mrs. Florence Collins Porter of South Pasadena also prominent in club circles.

At two or three informal gatherings of these women, called together by Mrs. Brewer a canvass of the presidential possibilities left the choice between two candidates of extraordinary executive ability, wide social and civic experience and with a personal following so loyal that nothing but good could come of their election. For various reasons Mrs. Andrew Stewart Lobingier, one of these two women was elected president with Mrs. Oliver P. Clark, retiring president of the Friday morning club, as first vice-president. Mrs. Lobingier had occupied no position of official leadership in the city but by her ability as a public speaker and straightforward methodical planning for her work in the civic associations, especially concerning the Arroyo Seco, she had won a reputation which made her seem eminently desirable as the leader of this organization.

Mrs. Clarke, one of the most popular women ever in the chair of the Friday Morning Club, will undoubtedly prove an admirable aid to the presiding officer, and Mrs. Harriet M. Barry as second vice-president will bring a wide practical experience to bear upon the club workings which will prove wholesome and beneficial in the extreme.

Mrs. M. N. F. Bridgham, secretary and treasurer, is a newspaper woman of several years' experience, with a wide circle of friends and acquaintances along both social and professional lines. In the directorate of the club Mrs. John M. Brewer represents the college women upon whose initiative the club organized, Mrs. R. L. Craig represents that large body of business women of whom she is so successful an example and who feel lack of time for clubs with social or cultural aims, but whose patriotic zeal inspires them to work along the lines of better citizenship and Mrs. Shelley Tolhurst, who might best be described perhaps as a club graduate, since a thorough schooling in official and executive positions in club work, an enviable reputation as a public speaker and considerable diplomatic power have placed her rather beyond further club endeavor of the ordinary type. With such a personnel at the head of the organization the rush for affiliation in the body may perhaps be better understood. Certain it is that not the most sanguine of the organizers of the club expected it to go forward with the surprising speed already shown and the rush of new members takes pause for a moment, because of necessity in force since Wednesday last by the closing at that time of the charter. This was signed however by 550 women and there are now nearly 100 new names waiting action by the board since members now must be elected to membership. The growth of the club from now on will necessarily be slower but indications point to its constant addition of members.

Two luncheons have been held, both of which taxed the capacity of the dining rooms selected for the purpose. At the Angelus the first regular meeting assembled June 6 with 120 members seated and nearly as many waiting for an opportunity to enter and listen to the speakers. This week the Hotel Westminster served 300 women after which John H. Francis, superintendent of public schools, explained to the audience the purposes of the recent bond election and the ultimate purpose to which the million and more dollars voted for the use of the school board would be devoted.

The women listened with comprehending interest and questions which followed showed a general knowledge of educational matters and a healthful concern as to the more modern methods of instruction to be installed in the schools of the city.

THE FRUITS OF COMMERCIALISM

Commercialism as one of the chief obstacles to the application of business methods to municipal affairs is an interesting subject discussed by Clinton Rogers Woodruff, secretary of the National Municipal League, in the North American Review.

Touching upon the manner in which commercialism absorbs developing business talent, Secretary Woodruff says:

"Commercialism has led to the absorption of the best business talent in every community in private business affairs, mainly because the legitimate rewards are larger, and because there is a permanence of tenure not to be found in public affairs.

"The returns in mercantile, manufacturing and professional pursuits have been much larger than the honest returns to those holding equally responsible official positions in our cities. I admit there is a certain honor attached to public office; and that there should be a certain amount of self-sacrifice for the public welfare; but we may not always be able to afford such honors or make such sacrifices.

"So long as the returns from the same amount of application in pubic business are so disproportionate to those received from private business we shall find the latter absorbing the best administrative and executive talent to the manifest detriment of the former.

"Then, again, a young man starting out in private business knows that, with diligence, he will be enabled to improve his position and his emoluments. The result of his efforts will be in a direct ratio to the energy expended.

"Let the same young man enter the public service, and his tenure of office will not depend on capacity or application, but, in nine cases out of ten, upon his usefulness to a political leader or organization. When this ends, his tenure ends. He can retain his place only by subserviency—a course that must always prove distasteful to the conscientious young man.

"Is it any wonder, therefore, that private affairs irresistibly attract young men?

"Is it any wonder that we find the public service in many cities filled with men who cannot make a livelihood elsewhere, and who resort to public patronage when all other sources fail?

"Commercialism robs the public service of its best men and leaves it almost bare; a wrong political system steps in and deprives what little there is left of its value."

Initiative, Referendum and Recall

ADMISSION OF ARIZONA AS A STATE

From a Speech by Hon. John D. Works of California in the Senate of the United States, Thursday, April 20, 1911

I am a new member of this body. There is a belief abroad on the outside that it is an unwritten law that a new member should remain silent in his seat until he becomes better informed as to the affairs of government and be guided by the wisdom and better understanding of those who have been longer in the public service. It would be most pleasing to me to sit at the feet of the distinguished members of this body who have served their country here for so many years and who are so much better informed as to the history and needs of the nation than I can possibly be; but, as I understand my duties and responsibilities as a United States Senator, they commence when I assume the duties of office and continue until I give way to my successor, and during all of that time the people of my State and of the whole country are entitled to the best service I am able to render as their servant.

It so happens that at the very beginning of that service this body is confronted with a great problem in which I personally and the people of my State, yea, the people of every State in the Union, are profoundly and vitally interested. A Territory, constituting a part of the great domain now under the dominion of this nation, is asking to be admitted as one of the States of the Union, and to be allowed to take on the powers and responsibilities of a free and sovereign State. Her plea for admission is met not with the claim that she does not possess the necessary territory or population, or is otherwise not within the constitutional provision authorizing the admission of States into the Union—that has been determined by the enabling act providing for her admission—but solely because her constitution provides for direct legislation.

The Constitution

The National Constitution provides, Article IV, section 3—

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.

This provision of the Constitution, with the exception of the limitations therein stated, which have no application here, leaves the question of the admission of a new State wholly to the judgment and discretion of Congress. Acting upon the authority thus given it, Congress passed an act providing for the admission of the Territory of Arizona into the Union of States. That act, amongst other things, provides for a constitutional convention to form a constitution for the State and the submission of such constitution to the people of the Territory for their approval.

The right of Arizona to be admitted as a State, subject only to a compliance with this act, was established by the act itself. Therefore the only question here is whether the Territory has complied with the conditions imposed or not. The one and only objection urged against its admission is that it has not formed a constitution "republican in form." If it has not done this, it must be admitted that this is a valid reason for refusing to allow the Territory to come into the Union as a State.

What Is Republican form of Government?

The Constitution provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." It contains no definition of a republic or of a republican form of government. This can only be determined, so far as the Constitution is concerned, from its whole scope and tenor. But the assailants of this proposed constitution go further, and maintain that the republican form of government must be a representative form also, and as we shall see a little further along the only objection to the constitution presented here is that it is destructive of or inimical to the representative form of government that they claim is included in the term "republican." As the Constitution throws no direct light upon the question, we must look elsewhere to ascertain, if we can, what is meant by and included in the term "republican form of government" within the meaning of the Constitution. As the Constitution does not attempt to define it, we must assume that it was used in the generally accepted sense, if there be any.

Much learning and labor has been expended in the effort to determine what is a republic. In the general division of the forms of government into monarchies, aristocracies, and democracies a republic is classed with the latter, and is sometimes defined as a representative democracy to distinguish it from what is termed a pure democracy, where the people act directly and as a whole.

No careful observer of the times and the conditions that have led us up to this controversy can fail to see the dangers that confront the nation and the several states if the Federal authorities shall refuse to admit a Territory into the Union of States for no better reason than that the people must be confined to a strictly representative form of government; and any attempt to extend the power of the people to the enactment of laws, under reasonable limitations and regulations, in order to protect them and the State from the corrupt election of representatives, and against the failure of such representatives to perform their duties as such, is an offence against our principles of representative government that must exclude them from entering into statehood. And yet that is precisely what is proposed by the opponents of this effort to bring the Territory of Arizona into the Union.

What Is the Issue?

This controversy presents an issue of transcendent importance to the people of this country. The eyes of the nation are upon us. If the Congress shall refuse to approve the proposed constitution of Arizona on any such grounds as this, it is assuming a grave responsibility. The consequences may be far-reaching and disastrous. The people are aroused and most earnest in their demand for just such legislation as is contained in this proposed constitution. The conditions are such as to call for the most careful and conscientious consideration of the important questions involved.

My sense of the importance of the issue is my excuse for going more particularly into the real issues involved and what I believe may be the consequences of a refusal to approve this proposed constitution.

What is the real objection to the constitution? No one need be in doubt on that subject. It is one phase of the struggle that has been going on in this country between the common people and the privileged self-seeking interests, affecting the right to govern the nation, the states, and the municipalities. The people are insisting that they shall be permitted to govern their own country and that it shall not be corrupted and governed by the power of money in the hands of men who care nothing for the Government except as a means of increasing their vast wealth. They insist that this country shall be a government of the people and not a plutocracy of wealth.

If influences are allowed to control an election to the high office of United States Senator, if powerful influences are at work to control legislation by representatives chosen by such means, and otherwise amenable to such incuences, what is the remedy? Are the people of this country helpless to protect themselves from such results under our representative form of government? Is there no way by which such evil influences may be met and overcome? Some Senators here seem to think not. When the people attempt to limit the power of their representatives and assume some of that power themselves by ignoring the unfaithful representative and acting directly at the polls, or by recalling him and substituting an honest and capable representative in his place, the cry is raised that this effort to control their own representatives and their own government is a violation of the Constitution of the United States and an encroachment upon the principles of our representative form of government.

This is the issue that confronts us today. The proposed constitution of Arizona provides for the initiative, referendum, and recall. Objection is made to the admission of this Territory as a State on this ground and this alone. I assume that no Senator on this floor will maintain that the ultimate power, the sovereignty of this nation, does not rest in the people. Therefore it is not a question of power in the people, but as to how that power may be exercised. We have a written Constitution. It came from the people. The simple question is: Have they by their own act in forming the Constitution deprived themselves of the right of self-government through direct legislation? Are they compelled to submit wholly to the acts of representatives selected, not by them but by the powerful interests that are menacing the life of the nation and forced upon them in many instances by fraud, corruption, and bribery?

Power of the People

This is a grave question that reaches the foundation of the Government and threatens the integrity of our free institutions. It is not only the people of Arizona that are demanding the right to govern their State. Many other States already in the Union have enacted just such laws as are authorized in the proposed constitution of Arizona, and many other States are demanding and will soon enact such or similar laws. In my own State an amendment to the constitution authorizing the initiative, referendum, and recall has been, by the legislature, submitted to the people, and it will be adopted by an overwhelming majority. Congress need not delude itself with the belief that this demand for direct legislation comes from fanatics and radical reformers only. The demand is universal and is supported by the best citizens in the country without regard to party. It is the result of the widespread and well-founded belief that the affairs of state and of the nation are, to too great an extent, governed by interests adverse to the best interests of the whole country and controlled by fraud and corruption. The absolute necessity for some legislation that will put the people in possession and control of their government and drive the interests and the political bosses out of politics and the official life of the nation is too evident to admit of question.

The power to govern exists in the people. The necessity for a more direct exercise of that power is manifest. Therefore the sole question is: Have the people the right to enact and enforce the laws proposed to effect their objects, or are they precluded from so doing by the Federal Constitution?

The town meetings in the several States where they prevail constitute the most direct and democratic action by the people that could be possible. This manner of conducting elections and transacting public business was recognized by the Constitution as a valid and constitutional exercise of the power vested in the people. Its validity never has been questioned and probably never will be. But when a Territory presents a constitution for its government as a State expressly providing for this same direct exercise of power by the people it is denounced as not republican or representative in form. I submit that this objection is wholly without force or reason, and should not influence the vote of a single Senator against the admission of the Territory as a State.

The referendum has been in force for certain purposes in almost, if not quite, every State in the Union from the beginning, and that in the most important of all questions—the adoption and amendment of constitutions—besides many other things.

Direct legislation has been in force in Switzerland for nearly 50 years, and has been adopted in many of the States and made a part of the law of a large number of the cities of the country.

Stability of Government Depends on Integrity of People

For myself I am not expecting the millennium to come in politics if direct legislation shall be universally adopted in this country. After all and in the final analysis the stability of our institutions must and does depend upon the honesty and patriotism of our people. No form of government will save the country from ultimate downfall if the people in whom the power to govern is vested are venal and corrupt. Late developments in some of the States indicate widespread corruption and buying of votes in some localities. If this kind of corruption has become general throughout the country, then indeed is this Republic in deadly peril of ultimate dissolution. The interests and the men who have cultivated this tendency to bribery and corruption are traitors to their country and should be hunted down and surely and severely punished in every community where votes are bought sold. No change in the form of government, no increased power in the hands of the people to the exclusion of their representatives will remedy this deadly evil. The beneficial effects of direct legislation must, at last, depend upon the integrity of the people themselves. If the increased responsibility placed upon the individual voter shall make him a better, more loyal, and more trustworthy citizen, as I believe it will in most cases, then this reform legislation will have accomplished much for the country.

How Far Reform Legislation Should Go

As to the extent to which such legislation should go, I am particularly anxious not to be misunderstood. I do not believe in a pure democracy. It is a form of government too weak and unstable to meet the demands of a nation like our own, with the many great and conflicting interests that are struggling for supremacy, the important problems that must be met with judgment and firmness, and with our relations, as a great world power with the other nations of the world. If our Government should degenerate into a pure democracy it will surely, inevitably, go to pieces. If I believed that the direct legislation reforms I am advocating would bring us eventually to that kind of government, I could not give them my support. But surely there is a happy medium, a middle ground between the unwarranted and corrupt power now exercised by our representatives, under our present system, which has created such nation-wide distrust on the part of the people, and a system which destroys our representative form of government and establishes a pure democracy in its place.

It is that middle ground that will preserve the rights of the people and so control the conduct of representatives as to render them amenable to the source of their authority that I am seeking. There must be some system of checks and balances whereby the people may act in a proper case where the representative wrongfully or corruptly refuses to act, may defeat action wrongfully taken by him in defiance of the interests of the public, and remove him from office and power where he has been unfaithful or corrupt. This much the people have a just right to demand. They are asking no more than this in demanding the initiative, referendum, and recall.

Does any Senator on this floor entertain any doubt as to the necessity for these reforms in legislation? Is there a lingering doubt in the mind of any observing citizen of this great Republic that the power of the special interests and corrupt political bosses must be met and overthrown in some way to preserve the political freedom and independence of the people? Can any Senator suggest a better way than that of giving greater power to the people through the direct primary and the initiative, referendum, and recall?

Boss Rule in California

I speak from knowledge when I say that the corporate interests and political bosses of my own State have been utterly routed, our politics purified, the standard of citizenship elevated, and the confidence of the people in better conditions vastly increased through these reforms alone. They have banished the political caucus and convention, the convenient tool of corruptionists, and made every voter independent to do his own will at the polls. It has enabled them to nominate their own candidates to offices where before the voter had no choice but to vote for candidates nominated by the machine or not vote at all.

I am proud of the people of Arizona who have come here with this constitution, so framed as to protect them and their new State from fraud, corruption, and bribery in elections and in public office. I am glad they had the courage and the manhood to stand by their convictions and refuse to temporize and submit a constitution satisfactory to the interests and machine politicians in order to become a State. Arizona had better remain a Territory for all time than to stultify her citizenship and American manhood by surrendering her convictions and bowing down to the powers that be in the politics of the day. I hope, if the Federal authorities shall refuse them admission under such a constitution as this, they will stand on their manhood, as good and true American citizens, and stay outside until the politics of this country is purified, regenerated, and elevated so that their progressive and enlightened constitution will be their sure passport to statehood. They can afford to wait. The time will not be long. The issue presented here will be fought and won by the people very soon. The American people are alive to the situation. They see the evil that has dominated them and that threatens the very life of their country, and they know the remedy and have learned by the experience of a few of the more advanced States that they have the power to apply the remedy, and they will apply and enforce it.

The Recall

But the recall is singled out as the one indefensible provision in the proposed constitution and the right given to recall judicial officers is denounced as particularly obnoxious. I am in entire sympathy with the objection to the recall of judges. I objected to it in my own State in a letter written by me on the subject.

I still maintain the views then expressed. But neither the governor of my State, whose absolute sincerity and honesty of conviction on the subject no one who knows him will question, nor the legislature, agreed with me. Much to my astonishment some of the judges of the State did not agree with me either, but seemed to want to have the legal right to be recalled. The Legislature of California passed the resolution submitting a constitutional amendment providing for the recall of all officers, including judges, almost unanimously; the governor approved it, and the people of California will adopt it at the polls by an overwhelming majority, in my opinion. They believe in it whether I do or not, and they have a right to it if they want it and believe it to be right, however much some of us may regret it.

But what has the question whether I or any other Senator does or does not believe in the recall of judges to do with the right of Arizona to be admitted as a State? The provision for the recall of judges and other officers is not in violation of the Constitution or any law of the United States. It is not in violation of any provision, requirement, or limitation of the enabling act. It is a question that affects Arizona alone and one that her people have a right to settle for themselves. I have no right to set up my judgment against theirs. It is not a matter that gives me any right to object to her admission as a State, and I shall not allow my own convictions as to the wisdom of such legislation to warp my judgment in so important a matter.

Recall in Los Angeles

In my own city the recall of other officers has been in force for 10 years. I have seen the urgent necessity for it there and have seen it tested. In the beginning I was opposed to it. Experience has convinced me that it is one of the best agencies for the

The Timber Wolf

fulfilled.

Deadly Public Drinking Cup: The Chicago council has forbidden public drinking cups and ordered them confiscated and destroyed. The new law in New Jersey goes into force July 4th, and slot machines containing paper cups will be located in all public places.

Taking an Interest in Public Matters: One objection that is constantly offered by reactionaries to all forms of legislation that show trust in the voters is that people take so little interest in public affairs. That is not strange considering the way the bosses and the machines have rebuked and repressed every effort on the part of the people to take a hand in their own affairs. But here we have two excellent examples of how people do take an interest when they are given a chance. Two hundred business men of Council Grove, Kansas, turned out recently with pick and shovel, to cut down and grade a large hill that interefered with the approaches to the city. When the dam that formed the reservoir that impounded the water supply of McAlester, Oklahoma, was damaged by a rain storm, over two hundred citizens volunteered for a day's work to put it in order.

Washing Teeth to be Taught in School: One hundred years hence our descendants will look back upon the schools of today and wonder how people that were as clever as we are in so many ways could leave undeveloped the great wealth of opportunity for usefulness in our public schools. Somebody in Cleveland had a bright idea, and as a result the art of teeth-washing is to be taught in the schools of that city. Every child will be required to bring a brush and go through the performance under the critical eye of the teacher, and this will be kept up, day after day, until the child learns how. Experiments carried on by a committee of Cleveland physicians in the care of children's teeth show that better work is done by those whose teeth are properly cared for.

Physical Examination of Employes: There has been so much complaint over the use of public payrolls for a pension list for the incapacitated in Boston, particularly in the Public Works department, that it has been decided to hold a special physical examination of incumbents and weed out those who fall below the required standard, or at least give them work that will conform to their limited capacity.

Who owns superfluous street dirt? The Supreme Court of Oregon has held (Sharkey Co. vs. City of Portland) that the abutting property owner owns the soil to the middle of the street, and if it is to be removed for any improvement he may have it delivered to any place as convenient to the contractor as that which he was proposing to use for dumping. But the owner must give reasonable notice.

Cooperation Between Departments: The great advantage of the commission system is that it effects coordination among the various parts of the city government. To secure this in a high degree the commissioners of Spokane have issued a general order requiring all city employees to report not only on matters relative to their own departments but also on anything they observe that needs attention from any other department. It often happens that a man sent to attend to one piece of work notices another that needs to be done, but he hesitates to mention it for fear of getting himself disliked. Under this order he must report the matter whether he wishes to or not.

Public Buildings in Parks: One of the speakers at the City Planning conference, F. M. Day, warned the delegates with great earnestness against the practice which is spreading in this country of locating public buildings in parks and particularly in small public squares. These spaces, he contends, are all needed for open air, and their rural effect is destroyed by their use for buildings. Some of the European delegates did not agree with him; but the reason for that is that most European cities have great numbers of such squares, and can afford to spare a few of them for this purpose, whereas these open spots are few and far between in American cities.

Public Pawn Shops: Ohio is not as a rule, in advance of the procession, but it is the first state to pass a law authorizing cities to establish public pawn-shops. These institutions are very common in European cities, where they are regarded as charitable concerns, and are run either by public authorities or by charitable associations, in order to protect the poor from the rapacity of money loaners. The experiment will be tried in several of the smaller cities of Ohio, and will be observed with much interest all over the country.

Meeting of Fire Chiefs: At Milwaukee, September 19th to 22nd, the International Association of Fire Engineers will be held. Among the subjects which will be discussed at this gathering are the following: A college for educating firemen; motor fire apparatus, gasolene and electricity; caliber of fire streams and method of determining their value; best method of selecting hose; standards of drill and discipline. The chiefs will be taken to Chicago in a special boat to visit the municipal exposition at the latter city.

Next

Excess Condemnation: Lawson Purdy, former controller and assessor of New York City, and one of the greatest tax experts of the country, maintains that a city should pay for all its most important improvements, particularly in opening and widening streets and in getting parks and boulevards by the process of excess condemnation. Frank J. Goodnow, of Columbia University, author of many municipal works, says that we should regard taxation not merely as a means of raising money but as a social instrument.

Of Course, Of Course: The cities of Pennsylvania including Scranton, Harrisburg and Pittsburg petition the legislature of the state that they be allowed to adopt a modified form of commission sysem charters. The bill is reported out from committee at last, with a number of changes the value of which can easily be guessed. First of all out goes initiative and referendum. The people of the boss-ridden state are not to be trusted with direct power, not even in the administration of local concerns.

Apportionment of Lights: The new commission government of Birmingham, Alabama, finds that the city's street lights are seriously lacking in efficiency because, under the old political system, they were placed where they would do the most good to the people that had the most influence. This situation is not unique. When councilmen are elected by districts, street lamps and crossings are used, not for the best interest of the largest number but to placate the kickers that have influence.

Too Many Dumping Grounds: Clean-up day in Racine, Wisconsin, served to bring to light the fact that one reason why the place was not cleaner was that there were too many dumping grounds. It has been decided that permits should be issued for the establishing of such grounds, and that then they should be kept under strict regulation.

Fifty Year Franchise: Gary, Indiana, is the new home and official headquarters of the Steel Trust, but its people are evidently opposed to corporation aggression as they are raising a great row, because the council and mayor propose to give a 50-year franchise to a street car company.

An Industrial Commission: The Mayor of Spokane proposes to establish a permanent industrial commission to hear labor disputes and make public report on them.

The Practical Benefit of Civic Plans

By WILLIS POLK

The Los Angeles City Club members listened to an entertaining and instructive address last Saturday noon on the subject of city planning. The speaker was Willis Polk of San Francisco, an architect of wide experience who has made a study of the art of planning cities and has now in charge some of the most important improvements of his city.

Mr. Polk is a disciple of Mr. Burnham of Chicago, the famous city planning expert, who had charge of the designing of buildings for the Chicago World's Fair. Mr. Polk was for many years a student of Mr. Burnham's and was instrumental in having that gentleman come to San Francisco to replan the city after the earthquake.

Mr. Burnham has recommended that Mr. Polk be appointed chief architect of the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

Mr. Polk's talk precipitated a general discussion of the subject, led by Rev. Dana W. Bartlett, president of the Los Angeles City Planning Commission, who reported the progress that is being made in developing a comprehensive city plan for Los Angeles. Mr. T. E. Gibbon also gave his views on the subject.

Mr. Polk addressed the club as follows:

The subject of city planning is not a new one. It has always engaged the attention of authority. The political power of every city from the beginning of time has, either of its own volition or through compulsion, been compelled to devote some of its energy and ability to city plans. But in the United States the subject of city planning is comparatively new.

Many of our leading cities, Chicago, New York, Cleveland, Buffalo, Minneapolis, Portland, San Francisco, Philadelphia, have tried and are now trying to develop city plans.

The first problem that we meet with is, of course, the property owner, the taxpayer and the merchant.

If the property owner and the merchant could have his own way, there would be only one street in any city, and that street would not be very long, and all the people in the city would be on that street looking into his particular show window.

So the moment you commence to talk about expansion or development of the plan of the city, for no other reason at all but just the idea of expanding or expending or making new streets, you have every merchant and every property owner up in arms, very naturally, in self-protection. That is one of the great obstacles to overcome. Probably the simplest way to clarify the atmosphere in that particular, would be to outline a policy, say, something like this: "We are not going to touch the present streets. We are not going to disturb the present conditions. We are just going to try to imagine what this city will be like in a hundred years from now, or two hundred years from now. We are not going to do a thing during our own lifetime, but we are going to look forward into the future, so that our descendants will have something to be grateful to us for."

Just imagine, if thirty years before anyone had dreamed that Southern California could be converted from a desert into a flower garden, some little group of men surrounding the Fathers that founded the Mission here, had said, "Just for amusement let us lay out a plan here. It will never be carried out. But let us lay out a plan here far better, far grander than Baron Hausman could get through in Paris with all the power of the Napoleonic government behind him." Just imagine that it had been done! Wouldn't you be grateful? Wouldn't every man in this town thank his stars that he could live in Los Angeles, because, in addition to the wonderful climate and all that God has given you here, a few little pioneers thirty or forty or fifty years ago had laid out plans for the city to grow along lines the magnificence of which never was dreamed of before?

That is what you could get without disturbing present property values and present business interests. That wouldn't cost you must. It wouldn't cost over twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars. If you could get yourselves to go that far and say, "We will spend twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars for posterity; we will make posterity a present of a little drop like that," you could get on paper an ideal plan of what this city might be when it reaches a population of two, three or even four,—I have no doubt that Los Angeles city and county in time will have a population of possibly five million people. That might be a hundred years from now. It might be less. It might be more. But wouldn't those five million people be grateful if they had a city here more famous for its beauty than Paris or Vienna or any city ever dreamed of being?

Willis Polk

If you did get that plan, how long would it be before you found it in your budget, in your every day expenditures for the development of your city, along the practical line of compulsion. The only way any city does anything, is when it is compelled to do it. How long would it be before your city fathers, the presidents of your banks, your property owners found out that the natural, beneficial way, the way to benefit business, would be to follow and put in a little link in this wonderful plan?

You can't carry it out all at once. You can make a plan that would be beyond the dreams of avarice in the amount of money that it would take to carry it out. But you are spending money today; you are going to spend money tomorrow and the day after. Why not spend some in carrying out a comprehensive, wide-sweeping plan that in the end will bring about something of that dream which every business man backs away from and says, "No, it is not practical; it will cost too much."

Cities have hardly ever been planned. People have not been wise enough to sit down in advance and plan out cities, because no one ever believes there is going to be a city until after the city gets there. There is an exception to that rule, and that is the city of Washington. Washington is, positively, the only city in the world which was planned in advance of its construction. Nobody would think of building a woodshed or a dog house unless they made a plan. People have wisdom and power enough to plan for their own interests, but for the city they neglect the most elementary duty that anybody would fulfil if he was going to do something for himself.

The city of Washington was planned in advance. George Washington, with the assistance of a young French engineer, Major L'Enfant went and staked out the city of Washington. If there is any criticism to make of the plan of Washington, I don't know of it; but there might be some discussion about the choice of location. However, they did have a good plan. Major L'Enfant was young He had all the enthusiasm of youth. He was fresh from the influence of the celebrated gardens at Versailles and the work of Monsard the great French architect, and the city of Washington is almost a duplicate of the city laid out by Lenote and Monsard. Washington was planned and they commenced the construction of it. They put the capitol in the hub of the place, the capitol forming the center, with the avenues radiating from it. Nobody paid any attention to it. The L'Enfant plan was abandoned. Congress came along and in its wisdom, especially the wisdom of members from the rural districts, commenced to disregard the plan. Congress located the congressional library across one of the avenues radiating from the capitol, askew and out of tune with the whole plan, and they practically put the last nail in the coffin of the original plan of Washington. The plan in the meantime had been disregarded in many other cases. Private property owners, in laying out additions to Washington, didn't know of the existence of the Lafound plan, and they substituted the great plan of the American civil engineer and real estate man. And so we lost the plan of Washington, and Washington, instead of being the city of magnificent distances, was tending towards the ordinary city, with no idea of vistas and such things.

About ten years ago this modern idea of city planning seemed to strike President Roosevelt,—or maybe it was under the late President McKinley's administration. At all events, the National Planning Commission was authorized by Congress at the suggestion of the President, and the President appointed Edward H. Burnham and the late Charles McKim, (perhaps the two most noted American architects), Mr. St. Jordans, and Mr. Olmsted, the landscape architect of Boston. They composed the National Planning Commission. They started in on Washington, and suddenly they woke up to the fact that it was going to be a metropolitan city. It has been growing very rapidly in the last ten years, as everybody knows. They thought they had better get a plan. And this civic planning commission worked for many months; in fact, I think it was nearly a year before they heard of the L'Enfant plan of Washington, when it was dug up in some musty pigeonhole. And when they got it out they were so astonished at its logic and good sense that, when they had completed their plan it was practically a reviving of the L'Enfant plan.

Of course, George Washington, in laying out the plan of Washington, had never dreamed that Washington ever would attain even its present greatness and didn't lay it out as so big a city. It was necessary for the planning commission to prepare to take in Georgetown and all the surrounding country. All the beautiful logic they worked up in that plan is a long story and another story.

That will show you what may become of a plan. That might happen to you. It might be disregarded by the next administration. You can't tell what will happen. But, if you do plan, get a comprehensive plan that is thoroughly worked out by an expert of Mr. Burnham's ability, a plan that is worked out regardless of any present condition.

Regard all the present conditions, but disregard all the present obstacles. Have that plan worked out, and then if there are obstacles in the way of the immediate development of some link in the plan and they are unsurmountable at the present time, I wouldn't advocate any special bond issues to put a yoke on the necks of your children; but in your ordinary budget carry it along.

I believe that Pericles, perhaps the greatest of all the Greek rulers or rulers of Athens, not from any desire of having a city beautiful, but merely as a matter of pure statesmanship, asked his wise men the question, "What can we do to retain our supremacy?" The result was that the Acropolis and all that we know of Athens was created then and there and almost all the world has been taught to pay deference to the skill and ability of Fabius Nicdenus and the great architects and sculptors of that day. They made the city so beautiful that even now, 2000 years after, people still are spending their money to go and see these wonderful works.

The amount of money that is drawn into the merchants' tills and into the coffers of the banks in Paris every year is estimated to be over $100,000,000, and people don't go there primarily because Paris is the capital of France. They go there because of its fame as a beautiful city and because of the pleasure that a man can have or a family can have in visiting that place, because there are so many things to attract the eye and to make you prolong your stay.

You might say that you don't need to do that in Los Angeles, this magic city that has sprung from the desert. You might say that you don't need to do another thing; that nature has done it all for you. But nature didn't do anything but give you a chance. It is the people down here that have made this place so attractive.

Of course you didn't make the climate, but twenty-five years ago we didn't know so much about staying here on account of the climate. We stayed here because we were sick and the climate would make us well. The desert wasn't attractive. But now it is attractive. No one can ride through these avenues and gardens that you have, and not feel protected and relieved from the toils and burdens of life.

Can't you go further than you have done and make this city always attractive?

I didn't come down here to Los Angeles to tell you men anything. But you have many enterprises under way. Your aqueduct that is going to bring your water down here will give you limitless possibilities. They can turn the fountains on at Versailles only once a month and at an enormous expense; and even then the opposition abuses the government for waste. When the fountains at Versailles are flowing, the transportation facilities from Paris to Versailles can't carry the crowds that want to go and see them. Here you are building an aqueduct that should pour torrents of water into this town. You can do anything you please in a municipal water way.

You are planning to revise your transportation system, and you will have to. You have many other works under way, and you will be doing work that you don't think of now in the natural order of things.

I would strongly urge you, before you get too far in those projects, that you really try to get a comprehensive plan for everything. I don't think it will be sufficient merely to have the transportation expert advise you on transportation facilities, or the hydraulic engineer advise you on your water. I think it is really an architect's job, and if you could get Mr. Burnham, or his very able assistant, Mr. Bennett, to spend a year or two among you,—I don't think it would take more than two years, and it certainly wouldn't cost more than twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, you will get something that will mean much to the future of this city.

Dr. Bartlett spoke, in part, as follows:

I appreciate this opportunity for saying just a word for the city planning committee which has been working necessarily very quietly, because there were no funds at our disposal to do anything very great. We have been at work in a campaign of education—with some success. It is utterly impossible, it seems to me, in the next year or two to get from our city council, from our city government, money sufficient,—even twenty five or thirty thousand dollars,—to bring Mr Burnham or any other expert here But the speaker has suggested that it might be possible to secure private funds to that amount that would bring such an expert here.

We have just succeeded in raising in this city an amount of money something like $400,000 for the extension of one institution, the Y. M. C. A. Now, $25,000 is a very small per cent of $400,000. If that amount of money could be raised here in the city. I believe it would be possible privately to secure this sum of $30,000, and we have decided in our committee that very little can be done locally until such a time may come that we can invite Mr. Olmsted or Mr. Burnham or any other, or perhaps Mr. Robinson, although there is perhaps a feeling that he has done everything that he can for the city.

Since Mr. Robinson came tremendous changes have taken place in the city, and it seems almost impossible to carry out the original Robinson plan.

We cannot have this thing settled in a month, as we tried to have it settled when Mr. Robinson was here. One month's study by a stranger, no matter how expert the man may be, is not sufficient. He must catch the spirit of out-of-doors, such as no man can who comes here from the cold east. He has got to live here long enough to understand what is the beauty of Southern California. He has got to understand how to work out the great industrial districts.

Why shouldn't every factory build in this new city for beauty? A building beautiful is not necessarily something built like a cathedral or anything that is formed along well known architectural lines.

We should have a warehouse district and industrial district so beautiful in the lines of building, so cleanly, that we will be just as proud to take our people there as we are to show them Figueroa or West Adams or the leisure district.

I contend that, with men who have given thought to the beautiful side of architecture, it will cost no more for these men building the factories to make their buildings beautiful than it does now to put up the common old type that soon degenerates and that we wish was out of the way.

Some of you have visited the great factories in the old world, perhaps at Leipsic. I could name hundreds, almost, where they have the lawn roundabount and the flowers in the window boxes, and then inside, the welfare work and rest rooms, and they have these safety devices on every bit of machinery.

This is to be a great manufacturing city; one of the great manufacturing cities of the United States. We can't help it. It is going to come. Between here and the ocean we are going to have the factories, and then we are to have the housing of our working people. And when we have a hundred thousand foreigners coming through our Angel Gate every year, it will be a great question. So the time has come now to consider these questions.

We must have money in hand to bring at the very first moment possible an expert here to labor with us and become a citizen.

I am glad that this subject is before us. Let us work until we can raise money necessary to work out a comprehensive plan.

At the suggestion of Mr. T. E. Gibbon, who presided at the luncheon, a resolution was unanimously adopted providing that the directors of the City Club be requested to submit to the club at their earliest convenience a plan for the purpose of raising a fund sufficient to secure the services of the best expert in city planning to plan for the future growth and development of Los Angeles.

A petition, requesting the City Council of Los Angeles to provide by ordinance for the appointment of a City Forester and an efficient forest service, was referred to the Board of Governors of the club.

Real Estate Mortgages

THE safest form of investment is a real estate mortgage on improved business or residence property in cities, provided it be selected with care and judgment. Such loans pay interest at the rate of six, seven or eight per cent, varying somewhat according to the amount loaned.

I make a specialty of securing such loans for my clients. My experience in building and knowledge of real estate values assure reliable appraisements and safe investments. I attend to drawing all papers, securing certificates of title, insurance policies and the collection of interest without expense to the investor, the borrower paying all charges.

I have on hand at my office good safe mortgages ranging from $500 to $5000 paying 7% net, secured by improved Los Angeles city property worth more than twice the amount of the loan. Call at my office or write me and I will send you a list.

Pertinent Editorial Extracts From Our State Exchanges

What Irrigation Will Accomplish

The national reclamation act, adopted by Congress in 1902, has given the country twenty-five projects, representing the reclamation of 3,198,000 acres of land at a cost of more than $50,000,000, while thirteen projects, held in abeyance until the completion of the foregoing, will add 3,270,000 acres more to the crop-producing area of the United States. This total of 6,468,000 acres will furnish homes for 3,500,000 persons and add several hundred million dollars to the taxable property of the various States. * *

Planted to wheat, producing an average of thirty bushels an acre, this irrigated area would yield 90,000,000 bushels; or 24,000,000 tons of hay, if planted to alfalfa, while if in apples, as grown in the Northwestern States, the yield would be 30,000,000 tons.

This enormous tonnage would call for more railroads from the Great Lakes to the Pacific Coast, millions of dollars' worth of new equipment and the employment of hundreds of thousands of skilled mechanics and laborers in mills and factories all over the country. It would also mean more business for the banker and the merchant. * * —Lompoc Record.

To Lessen Desert Dangers

Senator Works has introduced a bill directing the Interior Department to locate the springs and water holes in the arid regions where prospectors go in search of mineral wealth. The estimated cost, $10,000, is insignificant compared with the good that will result in reducing the dangers of the desert by indicating where water may be found.—Redlands Review.

Supreme Court Delegating Its Functions

There is one feature of the recent Tobacco Trust decision by the Supreme court that is peculiar and a bit disturbing. The opinion handed down by the court provides that after the dissolution of this trust, it shall have opportunity to reorganize under the immediate supervision of the Circuit court of the United States for the Second New York District, so that there may be re-created "out of the elements now composing it (the trust) a new condition, which shall be in harmony with and not repugnant to the law." * *

It is a mighty power as well as a most important trust that Chief Justice White has put into the hands of these four men. When the Tobacco Trust is reorganized under their censorship, the limit or "dead line" will have been defined beyond which great business combinations will not be permitted to go under the present anti-trust law of congress. Within the limits they see fit to define there can be no infraction of law. This is indeed an example of judicial legislation such as was never before attempted.—Pasadena News.

Seymour as a Sacrifice

The efforts of Mayor McCarthy to oust Chief of Police John F. Seymour have been supplying San Francisco its latest political diversion. Well informed San Franciscans who have visited this city within the past few days declare it to be their opinion that, by his fight on Seymour, McCarthy has done himself great political injury. They believe McCarthy has strengthened the position of Rolph, who will be his opponent at the next municipal election.

The efficiency of Chief Seymour has long been recognized, while men of all classes, who have had occasion to know the man, believe thoroughly in his honesty. His reputation for truth and veracity in the community in which he resides—to use the phraseology of the lawyers—is excellent; and even San Francisco is getting to the point of believing that there is, after all, some need for honest and decent men in public life. * * —Humboldt Times.

Should Detail Troops to Protect Forests

Secretary of War Stimson has informed the California Congressmen that it will not be possible to have Federal troops stationed in the national forests during the months of July, August and September to prevent and fight forest fires. He argues that it would make an abnormally expensive body of forest rangers, that it would be establishing a troublesome precedent and that it would be subversive of military discipline.

These reasons may appeal to specialized military intelligence, but they fail to appeal to common sense.

The regular troops stationed in California are certainly no less expensive while idle in barracks or engaged in imposing but unimportant maneuvers than they would be if they were engaged in the necessary and important service of protecting the forests.

It would be establishing a precedent, yes; but is there anything objectionable in asking that this expensive army perform some useful service in return for the millions that the people lavish upon it? The sooner such a precedent is established the better.

Lastly, the Secretary of War says, it would be bad for discipline. To the thoughtful citizen this sounds foolishly academic. Such difficult work as guarding the forests and fighting the fiends of fire ought to be the finest kind of discipline, the most heroic sort of training. Moreover, anyone who has observed the United States calvarymen stationed each summer in the Yosemite National Park knows that these troopers have not suffered in efficiency or military discipline.

The whole future of the nation is involved in the preservation of the forests. The nation's need demands that the troops give a little of the time now wasted in forced marches to nowhere, after imaginary enemies, to this necessary and imperative work of fighting a real enemy, the forest fire. Secretary Stimson ought to reconsider his ruling.—San Francisco Bulletin.

The Wrong Guess

If You Were in Prison

If you had gone wrong, been sentenced to prison, put in stripes and shut up in a cell, and then if the warden came along with a suit of citizen's clothes for you, took you into the country, put you at work at your trade, or on a farm and left you without a guard—what would you do? Run away at the risk of being captured, put back in stripes, and locked up in a cell? Or would you just do the square thing by working faithfully until your term expired and you were regularly discharged?

Which would you do?

At Guelph, Ontario, the public authorities are making just that experiment. Carpenters and masons are put at work on farm buildings, and farmers set to ploughing. They wear no prison badge. They are not guarded. They are well fed, and sleep in large, clean dormitories. They are doing useful work. And they do not run away. They joyously serve out their time.

Perhaps the prison is as great a crime against the prisoner as any he has committed against society.—San Diego Sun.

The Proof of the Pudding

The Wall Street Journal recently stated that California olives are "tough and acrid." In commenting on this criticism the Press suggested that some California packer of ripe olives ought to send some samples to the Journal office. The suggestion was acted on by a packer at Fair Oaks, in Sacramento county, and the excellence of the olive and the oil which were sent so impressed the editors of the New York paper that they apologized handsomely and sent an order for 50 jars of ripe olives.—Riverside Press.

A Good Argument for an Income Tax

William Waldorf Astor, expatriated citizen of the United States, and now a Member of Parliament, has partially forestalled the inheritance tax collectors by transferring one-half of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York to his son, Waldorf Astor, also a British subject.

Other transfers are expected to follow, and in this way the entire Astor estate of $300,000,000 will be distributed, so it is said. The State will lose the $15,000,000 to which it would be entitled if the estate were to be passed by will or descent.

The injustice of this is apparent to everyone. The richest landed estate in America will escape paying its dues to the government that has assisted it to get that wealth, while others less able to afford it must forfeit the lawful share. * *

Herein is another argument for an income tax law. When the owners of riches make a practice of hiding personality to escape the tax collector, and deed their realty in contemplation of death, to save the inheritance tax to their heirs, there is no hope of getting even with them except through a tax on their incomes that they cannot avoid, unless they devise some unheard-of means. It is the one effective way there is of compelling those who profit most by the labors of other men to pay a just share of the cost of government.—Sacramento Bee.

The proceedings of the Republican State Convention yesterday attracted a large number of spectators, and were, in themselves, spirited and generally harmonious. L. Stanford has received the nomination for Governor; J. F. Chillis, for Lieutenant-Governor; T. G. Phelps, for Congress, and Edward Norton for the Supreme Bench.

The Republican Convention concluded its sitting yesterday. . . . For Attorney General, Frank M. Pixley was nominated. Pixley is a man of decided ability as a lawyer, writer and public speaker. There are few men in the State who can make themselves more dreaded in a discussion.

Saturday, June 22, 1861

In conversation yesterday with one of the oldest and most substantial merchants in the city, he stated that he had never voted at a primary election. We presume a majority of our business men, real estate owners, merchants, mechanics, etc., in the city and county, would make the same reply if asked the question. That is the great reason why primary elections have fallen into the hands of scheming politicians and reckless party managers.

tion that the Republican party is the party of freedom has been handed along without a break. Then, there is the wool tariff. The New Mexicans keep or work with sheep. Whoever touches the tariff on wool is their enemy. They speak little English for the reason that American immigrants learned Spanish instead of teaching the Spanish English, and it is not easy for the Democrats to reach the voters with their proselytism. The public schools are making headway, however, and opening the minds of the Mexican element to a more liberal thinking, and yet the vote is controlled by the few to whom the mass look up. The old grandees have, generally speaking, fallen low in all save pride, but the folks or the lower levels are rising higher year by year in education and possessions. All as explained by the "Man from Mexico."

A Big Pill and a Bitter

He was a fine old Yankee gentleman and he lived in Topeka. He had one of those smooth shaven, sharp, clean cut Joe Cannon visages that proclaimed him shrewd and keen witted. This is the way he sized up the Kansas situation. The Populists went back into the parties out of which they came and they will stay there unless a succession of bad crop years drives them out again, in which event they are likely to be Socialists. All the socialism there is in Kansas is in the country and among the few Populists who did not go back to their old parties. The Republicans are divided and the Democrats are ready to do business with either wing of the Republican party against the other as events shall warrant. The insurgent Republicans are on top now, but they are not Democrats. They will stand for Taft if they have to and they expect to have to. He will be a big pill and a bitter one to swallow, but their mouths are made up for the gastronomic feat and they expect to down with him without a grimace. But the national convention will not be progressive. It will probably nominate Taft because it will not dare to do otherwise, but not because the standpat element likes him. That element will prefer Harmon and the Democratic party, not because Taft is not essentially a standpatter, but because he wobbles, whereas Harmon is warranted not to wobble from a straight standpat course. The fight next year, therefore, looks like Taft vs. Harmon with no question as to Kansas standing for Taft. If by any chance Woodrow Wilson should be the Democratic nominee against Taft it would take tall hustling to save Kansas to Taft, but it would be saved for him for the reason above given, that the insurgent Republicans are Republicans and not Democrats and for the further reason that the progressiveness of the Democrats is neither deep nor lasting. At every turn of the road they hark back to old traditions and are much concerned to keep open a clear line of communication to the rear in the event that they should want to beat a retreat to the sheltering folds of a traditional Democracy. We can look for real progress, the Republican progressives affirm, only from those who possess a genuine progressive spirit and these are to be found, and found only, in any considerable numbers, in the Republican party of this country. This is the way this fine old Yankee gentleman of Topeka sized the situation up after fifty years of observation and participation in public affairs. He probably is not far wrong.

Governor Stubbs

Opining that he might be a coming man The Watchman worked the wires to get an hour's confab with Governor Stubbs of Kansas at his home on the hills back of Lawrence to which he had retired for a fortnight's much needed rest. What was said is not for publication, but how the Governor of Kansas "stacks up" in the estimation of The Watchman is. He is not a politician. Until eight years ago he had not attended so much as a county convention. He was a large contractor in construction work, including railroad building, and dared to undertake anything in the construction line however hazardous. He is preeminently a man who dares. That is his chiefest characteristic. He is unafraid. His knowledge of public affairs may not be profound but his knowledge of men is and he knows how to find the man who knows the thing that he needs to know but does not, with the least possible delay and also how to get the fact out of that man and the possessor of it out of his way so that he can attend to the next thing on hand. He forms his judgment quickly when the needful data is once in his hands. In this he is much like Roosevelt and, like Roosevelt, is accused of being precipitous, which he is not. His mind works quickly and it does not take him all summer to make it up. He is a man of action with a conscience. He made a fortune in construction work and was busy making that fortune bigger, when the truth was borne in upon his mind that The Interests were, without realizing it, (being busy with making money and with nothing else), destroying free government. Convinced of the truth of this he knocked off on the money-making job and devoted himself to the redemption of his state from the corporation clutch, which drove the corporations to the Democratic camp but, likewise, enough Democrats to the Republican camp to break the clutch. He is not unambitious. The Watchman did not get it from him but learns that he is ambitious to occupy the seat in the United States Senate now occupied by Senator Curtis, a contest to which many are looking forward with great interest as likely to be about the biggest fight Kansas has ever seen. The Governor will not only have to go up against a Big Injun in Curtis but against the combined corporation influence of the nation, for The Interests are mightily concerned through fear that their citadel of power, the United States Senate, may fall into the hands of the "demagogues" and "agitators," meaning by these terms of endearment all of those of us who have been fighting for Right Things from Roosevelt down to—well, what—The Watchman.

The Drouth Is Broken

This is written at Lawrence, Kansas, where The Watchman landed, stranded, at the age of seven months, October 10, 1854, with a New England colony he squallingly kept awake o'nights, a colony come to keep slavery out of the territory. This morning, out of a sky that was clear at midnight, there hurtled more thunder and blazed more lightning than The Watchman has seen in California, put it all together, in the nearly thirty years he has lived there. Gee, but it did split things! But the drouth is broken, anyhow, at Lawrence, this June 7, 1911.

The bird delivers from his heart

Or scolds about his pay.

INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM AND RECALL.

purification of politics and the elevation of the standard of official duty, obligation, and integrity that has yet been devised.

The recall is not a matter of speculation or experiment with us. We have tried it and know its value and efficiency in dealing with corrupt public officials.

It should be admitted and carefully borne in mind that these are all extraordinary remedies, and should be resorted to only in extreme cases, and then with deliberation and caution. The one great danger to these great reform measures lies in the too frequent and unnecessary resort to their use. So far with us this has not been done, and I hope will not be in the future. Our people know their value, and nothing would induce them to surrender the right of their own free will.

There is one other phase of this question of the admission of Arizona that I wish to consider very briefly. It is maintained in some quarters that because the enabling act provides that Congress and the President may "approve" the proposed constitution, either would be justified in refusing to admit the Territory if there is any part of it that does not meet with their approval; for example, if the President shall not approve the recall of judges, it is claimed that he can not consistently approve the constitution or consent to the coming in of the Territory thereunder. In my judgment this is an unwarrantable construction to place upon the enabling act, and the refusal to approve the constitution on any such ground would be entirely unjust and illegal. The enabling act provides specifically what shall be done by the people of the Territory to entitle it to be admitted as a State. That statute is the full measure of its absolute right to admission. No official or representative of the National Government has any right to impose any other, further, or different condition or limitation of the right. It is too late now to impose new conditions. If the people of the Territory have complied with the terms upon which they were allowed to form a constitution, the Territory is entitled, as a matter of law and justice, to have the constitution approved, and no representative of the Government has any right to refuse to "approve" it. He has no right to impose any other test.

A PROGRESSIVE EDITOR

HARLEY W. BRUNDIGE OF THE LOS ANGELES EXPRESS

Two weeks ago we printed the picture of Fremont Older, editor of the San Francisco Bulletin. This week we take pleasure in presenting Harley W. Brundige, editor of the Los Angeles Express. The Express in Southern California and the Bulletin around the Bay of San Francisco undoubtedly stand as the two greatest forces among the newspapers of the state that have made possible the establishment of a People's Government. We especially commend to our readers Mr. Brundige's thoughtful article in this number, "Democracy or Autocracy—Which?"

Roosevelt and the Times

THE NUMBER OF PEOPLE in this country who have learned to look upon the Los Angeles Times in its true light as a sordid and bigoted concern at war with progress, justice and human rights, will be greatly increased by the recent utterance of Theodore Roosevelt in the Outlook of New York. It is a most fortunate circumstance that this nation possesses such a force ready for instant service in the cause of righteousness as is presented through the intelligence, experience, courage and judgment of the great ex-president. When he speaks the nation listens, and back of his argument there is the enormous strength of a personality that the people know and understand and love.

We cannot agree with those who express regret that he advertised the Times by noticing it. The destruction of its plant and the loss of life among its employes, and the subsequent arrest of labor leaders charged with the destruction, has given the paper a kind of national notoriety, and has made its attitude toward labor something more than a mere local issue. The entire country is awake to the importance of this trial, for any deviation from a frank, fair and honorable course by either side will tend to increase the bitterness of class feeling and widen the breach between the organized wage earners and the remainder of the people. If it be true that there were technical irregularities in the manner of the arrest of these men, that was a bad start on one side, and the rather frenzied utterances of some of the labor leaders made a bad start for the other side. But the kidnaping matter will be threshed out in court, and the labor leaders—the larger ones at least—have adopted a more temperate tone. When, under these circumstances, the Times alone of all the factors in the matter choses to take a stand in favor of prejudging the case, a pointed rebuke from Mr. Roosevelt is entirely befitting.

In the 6th of May issue of the Outlook Mr. Roosevelt commented on and condemned the public utterances of some of the labor leaders, made immediately after the arrest, and protested against the effort to bring class feeling to the defense of the prisoners. He did not attempt to go into the merits of the case itself, but assumed, as every fair-minded person must do, that nothing is settled, one way or the other, until the evidence is shown before a court. Thus he used the phraseology customary in all such discussions: If the men should be proven guilty, if such a crime was committed, if the Times building was blown up by dynamite, etc. Incidentally he remarked that the attitude of the Times on labor and other matters had no bearing on the case, and that while he personally did not agree with the Times in its position on certain questions, he would not of course, allow that to affect his judgment in the matter.

The entire article was couched in the fairest and most temperate language and no one, it would seem, could take exception to its spirit and purpose. As it was primarily a criticism of the utterances of the labor leaders, it might be supposed that if any objection was to come it would be from that quarter. But Los Angeles people were not at all surprised to discover that it was the Times and not the labor people that protested against Col. Roosevelt's appeal for fair play. They were not surprised, because they have long recognized the fact that this paper is vastly more bigoted, more brutal and unfair and more utterly conscienceless in what it undertakes to do, than the most radical labor union to be found in the country.

The Times replied to Mr. Roosevelt in characteristic fashion, which means that it first misstated his position, then argued savagely against it, and finished by a tirade of personal abuse. It tried to make it appear that in leaving all the elements in the case open to be tried out in court, Col. Roosevelt thereby favored the defendants—an attitude that would be amazing in any other newspaper, but is mild and commonplace for the Times. It names Col. Roosevelt "Mr. Facing-Both-Ways." That paper, by the way, is perfectly happy when it has cooked up some silly epithet for the person it attacks, usually some feeble pun on his name. This particular title is in reality a tribute to Col. Roosevelt's fairness for, as used by the Times, it means that he is willing to consider both sides of a question—a thing of which that paper is absolutely incapable. What the rest of the world looks upon as a virtue, viz., a sense of justice, figures as a vice in the Times category.

Now Col. Roosevelt replies by contrasting the fair and generous spirit in which his article was received by Labor-leader Gompers with the narrow and bigoted attitude of the Times. And in the interest of truth and to make it clearer to the public what is the nature of the publication attacking him Col. Roosevelt makes a few pointed remarks that are very welcome reading at this end of the line.

For example, Col. Roosevelt says that the editor of the Times "is guilty of conduct which could not be too severely denounced if the offender were a labor leader, and which therefore cannot be too severely denounced when the offender is a violent opponent of organized labor and a consistent enemy of every movement for social and economic betterment—just as he has shown himself the consistent enemy of the men in California who have dared resolutely to stand against corruption and in favor of honesty."

And this further: "It is due to the labor men to say, however, that Mr. Gompers shows in his article that certain of the capitalist newspapers of the stamp of that owned by General Otis have been responsible for far more brutal utterances than can be attributed to any recognized labor leader. The attitude of General Otis in his paper affords a curious instance of the anarchy of soul which comes to the man who in conscienceless fashion deifies property at the expense of human rights—no less surely than it comes to the man who in the name of human rights wars on all men good and bad."

And again: "It may be quite true (context shows he thinks it is true) that the Los Angeles Times has again and again shown itself to be as much an enemy of good citizenship, of honest and decent government, and of every effective effort to secure fair play for working men and women, as any anarchist sheet could show itself to be."

How familiar many of these phrases must look to readers of the California Outlook! And for that matter, to the readers of every independent and progressive newspaper in this region. There was a time when few people or none told the full truth about the Times—indeed, its true inwardness had not unfolded to the public view. Its attacks on working people and on individuals who were fighting the cause of humanity and decent government were treated as mere eccentricities on the part of its owner. Gradually the real significance of the paper's policy began to appear and to be understood by wider and wider circles of people. Except for a small group of flatterers and sycophants, who "work" the paper for the various corporations and interests they represent, the Times is practically without friends in this community. Men speak of it only to damn it and disclaim all alliance with it. And if anything more was needed to shut it absolutely outside the pale of public regard, the frank and forcible utterance of the people's best friend. Theodore Roosevelt, ought to do the work.

What Is a Man Worth

JUDGE GARY, of the United States Steel corporation, has been giving testimony before the Stanley investigating committee at Washington concerning many things of interest to our industrial life. An analysis of one of his recent declarations showed that, during the life of this corporation, and out of its issues and profits, there had been set apart for the benefit of capital, in one form or another, as dividends, as betterments or as undivided surplus or reserves—things that redounded to the advantage of the shareholders one way or another, one and one-half times as many millions of dollars as had been paid out in wages.

Now in capitalizing any ordinary industrial enterprise the rule is to allow $1,500 of capitalization to each man employed, or, rather, to each employe whether man or woman. Railroading is supposed to require a somewhat larger investment and the United States Steel corporation does some railroading. Therefore, in order to be liberal to Judge Gary and his corporation, let us assume that the total investment in capitalization, real, not water, of that corporation is $2,000 to each employe. The writer has it from a large employer that this estimate is ample. Then and in that case each holder of $2,000 worth of ownership in the United States Steel corporation has been benefited, directly or indirectly, on an average, one and one-half times as much as though he had been an average hand in the employment of that corporation, has received one and one-half times as much of profit as the average employe has received in wages and that without having paid any toll in nerve strain or muscle exhaustion.

Now in one and one-half there are three halves, whereas, in one there are only two halves. Hence an average employe of the United States Steel corporation has an earning capacity equivalent to only two-thirds of $2,000 or $1,333.33 and that, according to the sworn statement of Judge Gary, carried out to its logical conclusion, is the cash value of a man. In other words $1,333.33 invested in that corporation can earn as much as an average employe, with this difference: the employe will be old at fifty and a burden to his family in fifteen years more, while his cash equivalent will be as fresh as a daisy and as perennial as a dandelion.

Of course the capitalization of the United States Steel corporation does not bear out this calculation. It has been obscurated to prevent it, but to get at the truth no better means can be employed than to demand answers to these three questions: How much of the joint earnings of capital and labor goes to capital? How much goes to labor? How much actual, cash capital does it take in the investment to employ a man? Bonds and shares and debentures, undistributed surpluses and betterments, are mere details of distribution more useful for producing confusion of thought and delusion of fact than for purposes of elucidation.

Judge Gary, as manager of this stupendous corporation, has expressed great solicitude for the well-being of the labor employed by his corporation and well he may when for every $1,333.33 he can invest in the business he can make as much clear money every year as an average employe can earn. But was ever flesh and blood held cheaper than that? Certainly not in slavery days when the average price of slaves of a working age was $1,500 or more.

We hear much of the necessarily stupendous proportions of our modern industrialism, but its compelling reasons, upon investigation, will be found in wholesale opportunity for exploiting the race rather than in any so-called economies that are made possible through combination. And the Supreme court of the United States, through its "rule of reason," has obligingly opened the door to a wider and more centralized exploitation of mankind than even that of the United States Steel corporation. If we are to have publicity let it be thorough. It may bring out the truth regarding this age of peaceful bloodthirstiness and the truth may set the poor Pennsylvania "hunkies" free. Nothing else can.

Editor Gibbon Resigns

SOMETHING in the nature of a civic disaster to Los Angeles is the passing of the Herald from the control of T. E. Gibbon, Esq., back to its owner, the Times, with the fate in store for it of dismemberment and ultimate complete wrecking. Four years ago Mr. Gibbon took the paper over with an option to purchase under which he would have undoubtedly come into full ownership but for the intervening panic and bad times. When financial peace was restored, his option had expired, and he has not since then been able to get it renewed. Nevertheless, the agreement under which he assumed control, viz., that he was not to be interfered with in choice of editorial policy, still held and was maintained to the end.

It was due to this peculiar circumstance that the people of Los Angeles were able for several years to behold the extraordinary anomoly of a newspaper whose actual ownership was vested in a group of men that are enemies of progress, haters of working people and toadies to the rich, while the paper itself pursued a policy of liberality, justice and civic righteousness. There were some who were inclined to criticize Mr. Gibbon for his apparent alliance with the powers of evil. For our part we consider that he followed a brave, honorable and public-spirited course, that makes a fitting chapter in a career full of achievement for his city's good. We owe to Mr. Gibbon the freedom of the harbor where the deep sea commerce of this city will be transacted, we owe to him the existence of a railway connecting Los Angeles and Salt Lake, but great as these are on the commercial side, they are fully balanced on the civic side by the work he has done in the past four years in helping to establish good government in Los Angeles. With courage and ability he fought one fight after another, always on the side of progress, decency and justice. His name should be long honored in his city.

The people into whose hands passes the wreck of the Herald, shorn of its Associated Press franchise, which Hearst takes over, and transferred to the afternoon field, are unknown to the public. They will in all probability remain unknown. That is the method used in San Francisco and elsewhere by the Calhoun-Southern Pacific interests when they capture any agent of publicity. They put up a dummy and let it go at that. It is to follow Times policies we are told. Well, the dummies have our sincere sympathy.

Led Into Temptation

THE case of Frank Palomares, assessment clerk of the Los Angeles Board of Public Works, is a sad one. Short in his accounts in an amount nearly $17,000, he returns the money, or it is returned for him, so the city is no loser, but he himself is ruined. A member of an old Spanish family, of a charming lovable nature, he is to a considerable extent the victim of circumstances. It is even a matter of grave doubt whether he actually received and spent the money. Much of the deficit is believed to be nothing else than bad book-keeping, and not a little represents money owing the city that he was induced to enter up as paid, so the debtors could evade time penalties, and of this he afterwards lost track.

Nearly all this embezzlement took place during the Harper administration and while Mushet was auditor. These were the years 1907, 1908 and 1909. In 1910 when Myers was beginning his work as auditor, Palomares continued to take the city's money, but as the auditor, having cleared up his own office, was able to give more time to the general city hall system, Palomares found it more and more difficult to work his schemes, and by 1911 had ceased entirely. And as soon as Mr. Myers got around to the checking of that office and the inauguration of a proper system—which should have been done years ago—the defalcation was discovered. Very wisely, however, the matter was kept a secret by the mayor and auditor until all the money was restored.

We have headed this article "Led Into Temptation" because it is an example of what happens in many cities. There are few men who are safe to be trusted with large sums of money with no system of checking against them, least of all an open-hearted, generous, thoughtless kind of a fellow like Palomares. Why was he allowed to go on year after year in this way without any show-down? We know that Auditor Mushet had the expenses of his office practically doubled by council to allow him to do checking work of this kind. And yet here was an atrocious piece of business done right under his nose. No doubt by the time this appears Mr. Mushet, who is now candidate for mayor on a "personal liberty" platform, will have made his explanation. It will be read with interest by those good government people who originally backed him for auditor—and who lived to regret it most profoundly.

Contributed by Arthur J. Pillsbury

(Mr. Pillsbury, while travelling in the "East," is jotting down his impressions of men and things. The "Watchman" is a keen student and a great extractor of information. The readers of the Outlook who follow him in his peregrinations are bound to be entertained and will surely secure a good grasp of conditions generally throughout the country.—Editorial Note.)

A Texan Republican The Watchman had heard of such things but never, to his knowledge, had seen one,—a Texan who was and is a Republican, and not for office either. He was true to the Texan type, of ample presence and clad in broad clothes that gave him room and he was surmounted by a broad brimmed hat. He spoke Texan and he was filled with an undying faith in Texas finally becoming a Republican state. He was letting his wife take charge of the religious education of their sons, but he was seeing to their political education himself. He thought that northern immigration would finally do the work if the faithful in Texas would keep the embers burning so that there would be Republican hearthstones for the newcomers to gather around upon their arrival. He was a protectionist, not a high one but just high enough, and he wanted Theodore Roosevelt for president, believed that half of the Democrats of Texas would slide in a vote for him if he were to be a candidate. What Texas and all the South needed, he thought, was a breaking away from the troubles that afflicted a bygone generation and had no business to make this generation miserable also.

An Estimate of Mr. Bryan He was a Democrat, had always been a Democrat and a great admirer of Mr. Bryan. He believed in his courage and his fidelity to party and country, but he was afraid that Mr. Bryan was getting to be too much of a zealot and was binding himself too closely to the traditions of the ancients. In politics as in religion he is too orthodox. In both realms of thought the world is moving on to newer and better things, leaving Mr. Bryan far behind, discontented and complaining. He is in danger of becoming a common scold. Less and less attention is being paid to what he says and more and more to the counsels of such men as Woodrow Wilson and Champ Clark. Bryan searches the Scriptures sacred and profane, to learn from them what to do. These other men study the times and the needs of the people NOW in order to find the Right Way and they are more likely to find it than is Mr. Bryan. Mr. Bryan has served his party faithfully and well and so deserves a good place in the history of Democracy, but the best service he can now render his party and his country, if he cannot keep up with the procession of events, is to go away back and sit down and keep still and not try to run things on the old lines, thought this Democrat.

The Case of Folk Former Governor Joseph W. Folk is extremely well thought of in Missouri, in so far as he is thought of at all, but he is sort of an old story, a good deal of a has-been. Other men have come to the front since the days of his triumphs and have usurped attention to his cost. Then, instead of jumping into state affairs, he is traveling the country over in the service of a lecture bureau, seemingly making the most of the reputation his celebrity in a former time gave him. Like Bryan he has been cashing in his reputation to good advantage and somehow that does not strike people just right. They say that there is no positive harm in it, but every touch of the mercenary spirit seems to tarnish the reputations of those men who make profession of zeal for the common good. These critics feel that they would like these champions better if they were to throw themselves into public work, as Francis J. Heney did in San Francisco, without money or price, and yet how hard it was to make Californians believe that Heney could be working without pay when he was, absolutely. By the way, circulars have fallen into the hands of The Watchman announcing Mr. Heney as the star attraction at a Chautauqua assembly in Western Kansas. Well, if any patriot deserves to recoup his fortunes on the lecture platform it is Francis J. Heney and there are few better drawing cards than Heney. All have heard of him and all want to see him and hear him. His reputation is now national

Some Ugly Survivals Of course The Watchman wants "pointers" and so falls into conversation with all his seat mates in the cars, but he cannot always pump without being pumped and, when he is being pumped, it runs something like this:

"Well, you got that rascally Ruef into prison if no one else, but why did you not get any of the bribers as well as the bribed?"

"We couldn't. They debauched the press and the people so with their great wealth that the people lost their bearings and so forgot right and wrong that they could not tell one from 'tother. And then they intimidated or bought off and spirited away our witnesses and so bamboozled our courts of appeal that the machinery of justice was broken down."

"Well, then, why didn't you let the mob string them all up to the lamp posts the night that Heney was shot?"

"Because the prosecution and its friends were trying to uphold the law and not to destroy it."

"Yes, that is all right but there are times when the only justice is the justice of the mob, terrible but swift and effective. It seemed back here as if such a time had come to you out there. You must be a tame lot after all, but it is to be presumed that the Higher-ups, as you called them, keep themselves pretty shady."

"On the contrary they force themselves to the front upon every occasion."

"They are not taking prominent parts in the Panama-Pacific exposition are they?"

"Indeed they are, right up in the amen corner of it, so to speak, while the men who were foremost in sustaining the prosecutions, men like Spreckels and Phelan, are left out altogether. In fact the faithful and not the derelicts, are receiving the punishment of ostracism."

"Well, all I can say is that you people must be a damned queer lot out there. Suppose they will steal your exposition fund to a finish, won't they?"

"No, I think not. We have an honest state commission appointed by an honest Governor expressly to see to it that they do not."

"Well, you certainly need something of the kind. Good day."

St. Louis Unhurt The Watchman was somewhat surprised at being informed by persons on the ground that St. Louis really was not injured by reason of having held the Lewis and Clark exposition. They thought it remarkable that they were not and confidently expected that they would be and so were conservative in their business ventures contingent upon the fair. They overdid as little as possible and they flatter themselves that they got on with less of a reaction than any other exposition city in America. The explanation is this: St. Louis is largely German and the Germans are conservative, almost unenterprising, the effect of which was that, when the exposition was started, St. Louis was far behind the stage of development warranted by its back country in industry and trade. The forging ahead as a result of the exposition merely brought the city up to a standard that fitted its environment and there was no slump. In Democracy or Autocracy—Which?

By HARLEY W. BRUNDIGE

Managing Editor Los Angeles Express

Do you believe in democratic institutions? Are you thoroughly convinced that the people not only have the right to manage their own affairs, but that they have the wisdom and the ability to manage them better than any one else can manage for them? Do you further believe that it is the duty of the people to exercise to the fullest degree that power which inherently is theirs?

If you believe these things and are willing to do what you can to perpetuate and to perfect democratic institutions, then you are a Progressive.

The antithesis of democracy is autocracy.

If you do not trust the people; if you feel that they lack either in wisdom, ability or honesty to govern themselves, then you are a reactionary, and consciously or unconsciously favor an autocratic form of government.

Between democracy and autocracy there is no middle ground. The people either must rule or be ruled. When the people rule themselves you have democracy. When they are ruled by some power other than their own, then you have autocracy.

The outward form is immaterial in determining whether a government be democratic or autocratic. Many so-called republics in fact are autocratic, while some governments that still cling to the old monarchical forms are most democratic. Mexico under President Diaz had a republican form of government, yet it was a pure autocracy. The Caesars exercised almost unlimited autocratic powers under a republican form of government. England on the other hand still preserves the ancient form of an hereditary monarchy, yet the people exercise a more complete control over their own affairs than do the citizens of any republic now existent save Switzerland.

It is not the form under which the government is organized that marks the distinction between autocracy and democracy but the measure of power that the people exercise in controlling their own affairs.

The foundation upon which the American republic is builded, as laid down in the Declaration of Independence and the federal constitution, is essentially democratic. These documents invest supreme power in the people. But the old autocratic idea of distrust in the wisdom and ability of the people has served to restrict their full and complete exercise of the power which is vested in them.

To enable the people to exercise full authority over the conduct of their own affairs is the first object and the definite aim of the Progressive movement in California and the nation.

President Lincoln defined democracy to be "the government of the people, by the people, for the people." The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, which has succeeded in rendering the Republican party of California truly Progressive, took for its cornerstone these words of the Martyr Statesman. It has labored that democratic institutions might "not perish from the earth."

Insofar as democratic institutions have been broadened as a result of the Progressive movement here and elsewhere; insofar as the people have been given an opportunity for a more perfect expression of their will, and in the degree that government by the people has been brought more nearly into the hands of the people, in that same degree has the Progressive movement been successful in accomplishing its objects.

The initiative, referendum and recall are the most perfect instruments yet devised by which the people may exercise full and complete control over their own affairs.

Through the initiative the people may propose and enact laws that their agents or representatives in the various law-making bodies fail or refuse to enact.

An obnoxious or repugnant law may not be imposed upon the people when they have the power to revoke such enactment by recourse to the referendum. Wherever the referendum (the right of the people to veto obnoxious legislation) exists, there the "consent of the governed" either is implied by the failure of the people to repeal or is expressly given to every law.

The recall enables the people to discharge a public servant who proves unfaithful, incompetent or dishonest. It merely writes into the contract between the people and their agent a clause empowering the people (the employer) to discharge for cause the employee before the time when the contract would otherwise expire. It is a contract that is good for the employer (the people) and it also is good for the employee, for it has a tendency to promote a greater degree of loyalty and devotion to the interests of the employer. This means increased efficiency in the public service.

California soon is to vote upon the question whether the initiative, referendum and recall shall be extended to all branches of the state government. The adoption of the constitutional amendment proposed by a progressive Governor and progressive Legislature, and supported by the progressive sentiment of the state, will definitely and finally place in the hands of the people that supreme power which theoretically (but not actually) has been theirs ever since the government was founded.

In some quarters a great outcry now is being raised against direct legislation, and particularly against that provision which would include the judiciary within the operation of the recall. Most of this opposition comes from those who are against all forms of direct legislation, from those who find that their private and special interests thrive better under a system of government in which the people have the least possible voice. Those who seek unjust privileges or immunities, those who wish to wrest from the public something to which they are not fairly entitled, all are opposed to permitting the people to have any actual participation in the conduct of public affairs. They would tear down democratic institutions. Whether conscious of it or not, they are doing what they can to establish an autocracy.

Some others there are who believe themselves genuinely to favor democratic institutions and who would most bitterly resent any implication that they do not trust the people, yet are fearful that evil results will follow from the application of the recall principle to the judiciary. While entertaining the highest respect for the sincerity and honesty of these persons, believing them to be actuated only by the highest motives in advocating that which seems to them to be for the public good, I cannot but feel that they are both timid and illogical.

If the people are wise enough to propose and make laws through the initiative; if they are intelligent enough to veto laws through the referendum; if they have the ability to elect to the bench untried men who can be trusted to apply the laws properly, then it follows that they are capable of determining whether a particular judge, after he has had opportunity to demonstrate his fitness or unfitness, should be continued or removed.

"But," urge those who would limit the people's power, "the people are not learned in the law. They are not even familiar with the statutory law and know nothing of precedent and legal reasoning." This is only in part true. But suppose it were entirely true, then, what of it? The point is not, whether they will act justly or unjustly, but should the people have the power to act at all. Because they might in one instance act unjustly would you deny to them the right to act justly also? Should they or should they not have the power to remove an admittedly unjust, tyrannical or corrupt judge?

Seriously, do you think it more likely that the people would exercise the power of recall justly or unjustly? Are the people in registering their judgments more often right or wrong? Do they make more or fewer mistakes than those citizens of high intelligence—judges, for instance? Because the people may be mistaken in one instance and right in many is that any reason for denying to them a power that rightfully belongs to them?

Why is it that so many men demand infallibility on the part of the people? Is it a quality that is expected of individuals? If all judges who have made one or more mistakes were to be swept from the bench there would be left none to administer the law.

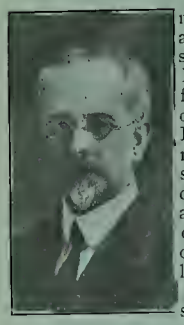
"The fear of the recall would tend to influence the decisions of judges in favor of the people," urges another timid one. If there be any such grave danger hidden beneath the recall then why is it that we do not now suffer from so great a calamity? Under the present elective system in California we have a stated recall applied to judges every six years. If danger there be from this source, it already exists. Yet the people are not aware that in the interpretation and application of the laws they have been unduly favored. There probably is not to be found within the confines of this State a single member of the bench who would not spurn the suggestion that he ever colored a judicial decision for the purpose of influencing votes for himself at an impending election.

The trouble with too many well-meaning, intelligent and honest citizens is that they only half believe in a democratic form of government. They are willing to have a "limited democracy." They do not have an abiding faith in the average intelligence or the sober sense of the people as a whole. They look upon the people as an unenlightened and vicious mass that must be held in check by some higher order of intelligence lest they do injury to themselves. These persons are willing that the people should think they rule themselves, for the thought pleases them and puts them in humor the more easily to be ruled. But they look only for chaos if the people really should rule.

These persons are believers in autocracy, and not in democracy. They believe that government must come from without, not from within the body of the people. They cannot see that the people when exercising the fullest powers correct their own mistakes, and that they are less liable to err than any autocratic ruler. This is but natural, since when the people govern badly they themselves suffer from their own evil rule. They therefore more quickly correct their own mistakes, and because of their experience are less likely to err again.

With the adoption of the constitutional amendments providing for the initiative, referendum and recall, California will have placed in the hands of the people complete power to rule themselves. Will the people then rule themselves wisely and justly? If there is virtue in a democratic form of government they will. If the people are incapable of ruling themselves then the sooner that fact is proved the better it will be. Then our reactionary friends might be able to set up their autocratic (or plutocratic) government. Anyway, let us be honest about it and have one thing or the other.

The citizen who believes in democracy as against autocracy should vote to place in the hands of the people those instruments that give them the power to rule themselves.



MACHINE AT WORK TO BEAT RECALL

Although no general election is to be held this fall, the Southern Pacific political machine is setting the wheels in motion in every section of the State. The cause of this activity is plain. A special election on constitutional amendments is set for next October, and the Southern Pacific machine wants an early start in its fight to beat the recall.

This means it is time for progressive voters to become active in behalf of the good cause. Already many corporations, among them numerous banks, have been asked to use their influence with their patrons, and some of these corporations are now doing all in their power to carry out the machine program. The needed counteracting agencies can be supplied by voters who have kept in close touch with the progressive movement. Such voters should at once inaugurate a busy campaign for the recall among their neighbors, telling the truth about the question under discussion and laying emphasis on the fact that the recall is not a blow at the courts, but at incompetent and corrupt judges, which is quite a different thing. As for the prediction of "thinly disguised mob law," the men who make it have no such fear, but are really afraid that the proposed check would have the effect of making all litigants equal before the law. About all the money that will be spent in this fight will be spent by the other side. And there will be considerable money invested in the effort to defeat the recall. The machine, which now, as always, represents the allied special interests, is extremely anxious to save from embarrassment and possible disaster those judges who, in the past, have rendered decisions that proved their unfitness for judicial honors and judicial responsibility. That anxiety bas been capitalized. Hence the early launching of the machine's "campaign of education."—San Francisco Bulletin.

Men and Matters Before the Public

By Franklin Hichborn

Continued examination of the piers and seawalls constructed on the San Francisco water front during the days of Southern Pacific machine rule in California, stacks up evidence of the wastefulness and the costliness of the machine's domination of public affairs.

The State has spent millions in developing its San Francisco water front property. Of recent years, on the plea that permanent construction is desirable, enormous sums have been provided for the work. The biennial report of the State Harbor Commissions for the two fiscal years ending June 30, 1910, sets forth, that, "it has been the policy of the Board during your (Gillett's) administration * * * to replace worn-out docks on modern pile foundations with new steel-framed piers, all steel protected by reinforced concrete, making the roofs, walls and floors monolithic and resting on foundations of reinforced concrete cylinder piers, whose integritv of construction has been absolutely assured."

Similar announcements had been made by other boards. The idea conveyed in such reports has been that of permanency of construction on the water front of the principal city of the Pacific Coast. And this idea the people of the State have backed generously, voting millions in bonds for solid concrete construction.

This "solid concrete construction" is now subject to the inspection of a Board of Harbor Commissioners whose members do not owe their appointment to the political bureaus of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. The developments are startling.

One wharf, for example, for a distance of 100 feet, is found to be a foot lower than when it was originally constructed.

Examination shows that the sinking of the structure is due to the fact that the solid concrete cylinders which are supposed to hold up this wharf have sunk from one to three feet.

In places, attempts have been made to meet this sinking of the pillars by driving wooden blocks between the sunken piles and the timbers above. But this scientific method of repair has not proved successful, as the settling of the wharf demonstrates.

Under one portion of the annex of the Ferry building, a space fifty-feet square was found to be without a supporting pile. Naturally, the caps and beams which spanned this void had sagged and bent. One beam had been "repaired" by tacking a 3x12 plank on one side and a 2x12 plank on the other.

The aprons of the ferry slips were supposed to be supported by great concrete blocks four feet across.

Inspection of some of the aprons shows that the supporting blocks have settled leaving generous space under the construction they were supposed to support. Into these vacant places, starfish, mussels, barnacles and other sea life have made comfortable homes. The homes were quite unsafe, however, for had the unsupported aprons given way, the sea life on top the "supporting" blocks under the aprons would have been killed. So would the human beings whose weight upon the aprons would have caused the unsupported construction to give way. The sea life and the human life would have gone out together.

A diver, sent down to inspect one of the "solid concrete pillars" that had not floated away, found holes in the pillar into which he could shove his arm to the shoulder. The bottom of one "solid concrete pillar" that has been removed had been made by throwing gunny sacks filled with concrete into a wooden mold. Another "concrete pillar," supposed to be resting on piles surrounded by concrete was found to be resting on three sticks 2½x5-inches about which there was no concrete at all.

This astonishing condition of the construction on the San Francisco water front has not developed in a day. It is the result of years of machine rule. The condition in a general way, has been known by those in touch with State politics and conditions.

On November 12, 1910, the writer in a syndicate letter published throughout the State, showed the character of the San Francisco water front construction and placed the blame for it at the door of the machine that had taken upon itself the duty of conducting the business of the State. In articles written a year or more ago and printed in the Sacramento Bee, the fraudulent work on the San Francisco water front was also pointed out.

It is not contended that the Board of Harbor Commissioners supplanted by Governor Johnson's appointees is responsible for the actual construction that, under rigid inspection, must be condemned and replaced by honestly built piers. But the retiring board is responsible for the fact that the exposure of today was not made a year, or two years ago.

Instead of leaving blocks between sunken pillars and the overhead beams, and bent stringers "spliced" with 2x12 planks, the retiring board should have exposed the dangerous condition of the construction.

In view of recent revelations the following statement, contained in a report given out by the old board of State Harbor Commissioners last September, to show the ability of the harbor to pay interest on $9,000,000 additional bonds for harbor improvement, is interesting to say the least:

"The steady reduction of old wooden dock area," reads the report, "will reduce the enormous repair charges, and will leave a corresponding revenue to meet interest on bonds."

And when that statement was made, the boasted "solid concrete pillars," which were not in need of repair, and were never to be in need of repair, had sunken in some places three feet; in other places they were mere wooden shells through which a boatman's oar could be shoved; in still other places they were resting on 2½x5 inch sticks.

Exposure of these conditions then would, of course, as it has done now, reflect upon the effectiveness, not to say integrity, of the machine's domination of state affairs. The "honor of the organization" was at stake. No good organization man could be expected to "show up" discreditable work of the organization's servants on the San Francisco water front. The unpardonable sin in the estimate of political organizations such as that which the Southern Pacific Company headed in this State, is in being "found out."

That such considerations prevented the members of the last Board of Harbor Commissioners making the needed exposure, the writer is not prepared to say. But it is inconceivable that the last board failed to make exposure because it was ignorant of the conditions.

That the exposure has come, it must be admitted, is due to the fact that Governor Johnson has placed the affairs of the San Francisco water front in the hands of men who do not divide their allegiance between the State and private interests which seek for gain to exploit either the resources or the politics of the State. Governor Johnson, in his inaugural address, promised to give the highest efficiency in the public service. He is keeping his pledge.

As the result of the efficiency promised, in the management of the San Francisco water front, we have the exposure of the faulty construction, and promise for repair and solid building for the future. With this efficiency necessarily comes more able representation of the State in its dealings with the large interests that have extensive connections on the San Francisco water front.

And this is just what the private interests bent upon exploitation do not want.

The political representatives of the private interests realize, however, that under the present state management, which, with the backing of the Interior, is likely to continue, there is no way to head off honest administration of the State's water front property at San Francisco.

This being the case, the next move that can be looked for will be an attempt to turn the State's water front property over to the city and county of San Francisco.

The political managers of the Southern Pacific Company and affiliated organizations may be long in recovering lost ground in State politics, but the control of San Francisco politics is not so difficult. To turn the State's water front property at San Francisco over to that city at this time, would be a long step toward restoring to the interests the opportunities for exploitation which they lost when Hiram Johnson become Governor of the State.

The air of offended dignity assumed by members of the Supreme Court over the Frank Shay letter is almost pathetic. However, there has been as yet no searching cross examination of Shay; nor have Shay's superiors been examined, nor have the members of the court whom Shay interviewed.

It will be remembered that Mr. Shay wrote the letter to J. W. McKinley, the Southern Pacific attorney at Los Angeles. In the letter, Mr. Shay pretended to set forth how the Justices of the Supreme Court, "without exception," considered the railroad side of the litigation over the California Development Company should be presented.

Mr. Shay has apologized to the court for his letter. One of Mr. Shay's colleagues, Mr. Shoup, has stated in open court that Mr. Shay's statement had no warrant in fact. And there the matter rests. It is unthinkable that nothing further is to be done to get at the bottom facts. As was stated in these columns last week, here is a matter which the Bar Association, in justice to the members of the Supreme Court; could very well take up.

It is unfortunately true that the events of the last few years have tended to shake the confidence of the public in the upper courts. Not to go back to the Fresno rate case, the comparatively recent Supreme Court decision in the Schmitz-Ruef extortion matter, which saved former Mayor Eugene Schmitz from the State prison term to which he had been sentenced, and freed Ruef of a felony charge, to which, able lawyer that he is, he had entered a plea of guilty, brought forth a storm of criticism from one end of the country to the other.

Then came the decision in the

The Public Magazine says of Hichborn's forthcoming book on the California Legislature of 1911:

To have read Franklin Hichborn's story of the California Legislature of 1909, and then to have considered the course that California politics has taken since, is to be in a state of mind to think of the two as having in some degree at least the relation of cause and effect. That story is a masterly exposure, by a competent observer and writer, of government by misrepresentatives. And now California is far on the way toward putting the People's Power check upon her representatives, whoever they are and whatever their functions. Mr. Hichborn's purpose, therefore, of publishing a companion book on the California Legislature of 1911, if copies enough are subscribed for at a dollar and a half to pay the expense of publication, will doubtless receive ample encouragement. Local interest alone should insure a large circulation for these books in California; but the methods of misrepresentative government are so much alike everywhere that Mr. Hichborn's true stories will be educative in any other State of the Union as well as in California.

Mr. Gompers, General Otis and the Dynamite Charges

Theodore Roosevelt

in The Outlook (New York)

In an article in The Outlook of May 6th on the dynamite outrage which, it is charged, was perpetrated against the Los Angeles Times, I called attention to the fact that certain labor men had tried to create a public opinion in favor of those arrested simply because the crime was committed against a capitalist, and because the men charged with committing it were members of a labor union. I urged that we should all, as good citizens, confine ourselves simply to trying to secure a just and fair trial, so that no innocent man might suffer and that every guilty man might be punished. The Los Angeles "Daily Times," edited by General Harrison Gray Otis, has published an editorial on the article in question, presumably written by General Otis, and for which, at all events, he assumes editorial responsibility; and Mr. Gompers has quoted the article in full and written a long editorial on it in the "American Federationist," the official magazine of the American Federation of Labor, a magazine published in the interests of the trade union movement. These two articles offer an instructive contrast, to which I am all the more glad to call attention because I do not agree with Mr. Gompers as to the need of writing the article which I did write. One sentence of my article in The Outlook ran as follows:

"If the explosion was not an accident, but the deliberate act of any man or men, it was an outrage of dastardly iniquity, for it was one of those crimes in which the murderer, in order to gratify his spite against an individual, not merely wrecks that individual's property, but with callous indifference takes the lives of scores of innocent people as an incident to the achievement of his sinister and criminal purpose."

On this, General Otis, after stating that in this article the writer (myself) had "endeavored to make himself solid with the labor unions, but has only succeeded in provoking a roar of anger from them, all the way from Gompers to Tvietmoe," comments as follows:

"If the Times Building was dynamited, says Mr. Facing Both Ways, then those who did the work should be punished. The labor unionites are angered at this suggestion, because they do not want the dynamiters punished even if they are guilty; and the Times . . . feels that the 'if' is an upholding of the cause of disorder, and a distinct aid to the villains who incited and procured the murder of twenty innocent men and the destruction of $500,000 worth of property."

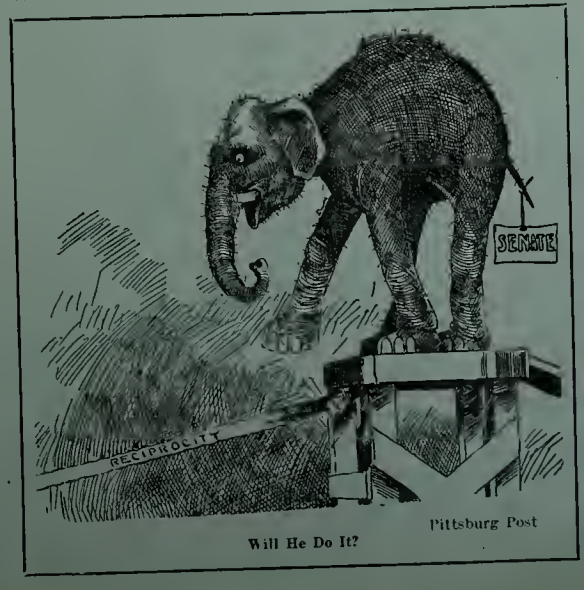
General Otis in this article thus takes the very position against which all good citizens should protest when taken by the labor men. That is, the purpose of my article was to protest against assuming before the trial what it was hoped to prove or disprove at the trial; and in this way General Otis is guilty of conduct which could not be too severely denounced if the offender were a labor leader, and which therefore cannot be too severely denounced when the offender is a violent opponent of organized labor and a consistent enemy of every movement for social and economic betterment—just as he has shown himself the consistent enemy of the men in California who have dared resolutely to stand against corruption and in favor of honesty.

The article by Mr. Gompers in the "American Federationist" offers the most striking contrast, in tone and temper, to the article of General Otis. Mr. Gompers' editorial is an article of the type which any magazine should be glad to have appear in its columns. It is a fair and honorable statement of a position with which I only in part disagree, couched in language which warrants respectful and careful attention. On the point that General Otis raises, i. e., his own contention that the building was dynamited, Mr. Gompers takes the opposite side. In my article I confined myself to stating what was the rightful path to follow if it proved that the building had been dynamited, and if any labor union man were implicated in the crime; this is the only right way to look at the matter. After reading Mr. Gompers' article carefully, I still feel that at least some of the labor men so framed their statements about the explosion as to convey the impression—and, I fear, to excite the feeling among their followers—that this matter was to be treated as a case of class conflict, and that the labor men were to rally behind the accused as a matter of class duty and loyalty. It is due to the labor men to say, however, that Mr. Gompers shows in this article that certain of the capitalist newspapers of the stamp of that owned by General Otis have been responsible for far more brutal utterances than can be attributed to any recognized labor leader. The attitude of General Otis in his paper affords a curious instance of the anarchy of soul which comes to the man who in conscienceless fashion defies property at the expense of human rights—no less surely than it comes to the man who in the name of human rights wars upon all men of property, good or bad.

In concluding a noteworthy article, Mr. Gompers writes as follows:

"We could well wish that Mr. Roosevelt might devote some little time to reading current trade union literature in order to ascertain real union sentiment. . . . We should like him to read, for a time at least, the leading publications of the trade-unionists. He will not find in them the harsh words which disclose a virulent spirit toward the opposing side. We would be most willing to place a file for the last year of these magazines in his hands and have him candidly express its effect upon him. We give no space to inflammatory teachings. We try to bring the faculty of common sense to bear on all matters with which we deal. We have no room in this magazine for vituperation, heated denunciation, or groundless accusations. We do try, of course, to tell the truth plainly and to lay claim to all of labor's rights fearlessly."

This is an honorable invitation expressed in an honorable way, and I shall certainly take advantage of it. Now, let me answer directly the questions he puts to me, implicitly rather than explicitly, in this article. Mr. Gompers says that the trade-unionists only wish a fair trial. That is all I wish. Let us find out who is guilty and who is innocent. I said in my article that it was entirely proper to provide money to secure such a trial. Mr. Gompers claims that illegal and improper action has been taken in kidnapping the men. That is a matter which can be settled only through the courts, and I shall welcome any effort that is made thus to settle it. Now let me most earnestly ask Mr. Gompers and those associated with him in the cause of labor—a cause of which I hope I may say I am a very earnest and sincere friend—that they, in their turn, make it equally evident that they do not intend to stand by the men right or wrong, that they wish them to have an absolutely fair chance to prove their innocence, but that they will join with every other citizen in hearty condemnation of them, and will endeavor to bring them to punishment, if they are guilty. No feeling of hostility to the Los Angeles "Times" must be allowed to interfere with this. It may be quite true that the Los Angeles "Times" has again and again shown itself to be as much an enemy of good citizenship, of honest and decent government, and of every effective effort to secure fair play for working men and women, as any Anarchist sheet could show itself to be. But that has nothing to do with the question. If, instead of the newspaper of General Otis, it was the newspaper of the late Herr Most, I should strive just as hard to bring to punishment the murderers, whoever they might be; if the paper dynamited had been a Socialist paper in Milwaukee, I should strive just as hard to bring to justice the wrongdoers as now when the paper dynamited happens to be a capitalist newspaper in Los Angeles. I ask merely that all good citizens, whether wage-workers or not, shall take the same view. Mr. Gompers must remember that I have seen a good many of these things from the inside. I spent much of my time in Montana when the Western Federation of Miners was in its heyday of wrong-doing there and in Idaho, and I felt that the labor leaders did grave injustice to themselves, and furnished capital to the most violent and unscrupulous enemies of labor, by their failure to denounce the general attitude and some of the specific deeds of the Western Federation—and to show this attitude and the character of these deeds I refer to the official Government reports of the investigation made while I was President. Too many labor men adopted toward the responsible leaders of the Western Federation just the attitude that certain capitalistic papers controlled by Wall Street adopt toward the great trusts which are known to do grave wrong but which just keep clear of the clutch of the law. I shall always protest against accepting "law honesty" as warrant enough for supporting a business man or politician, and the ability to escape conviction for murder as warrant enough for upholding a labor leader when the outside circumstances are such as conclusively to show that either the politician, the capitalist, or the labor leader is an undesirable citizen.



Mr. Gompers and those associated with him are taking the lead in a great movement which may be made, and I believe will be made, a movement for incalculable good. My desire is to co-operate with them and help them in every way, and I very earnestly hope that they will steadily so conduct themselves as to make it not merely the duty but the privilege of all decent citizens thus to co-operate with them.

As It Should Be—A Hard Way Up But an Easy One Down

The Municipal Newspaper

By George Baker Anderson

Secretary of the Good Government Organization of Los Angeles

Is there in America, the boasted home of "free speech," such a thing as an independent newspaper? Or is the institution to which some of us are wont to "point with pride" as the "free press" naught but a myth?

About three years ago the editor of a newspaper published in the Middle West read before a local press association a paper advocating the founding of a school of journalism. His suggestion called forth from a fellow-journalist an expression of opinion to the effect that the chief aim of the newspapers nowadays is money, and that all else is and must be subordinated to that end.

"The owners of newspapers are business men," declared this editorial critic of the plan proposed. "They want dividends. They want the business, the commercial ideal upheld, at all hazards. All the rest is 'leather and prunella.'

"Where is there one newspaper," he inquires, "that does not, at the first faint symptom of an attack upon the source of corrupt wealth with which its proprietor is in sympathy, immediately fall back upon the so-called constitutional guarantees of property, and check progressive democracy with the cry of conservatism?"

After citing a number of instances in support of his contention that the "free press" is a myth, this cynical critic tells us he is inclined to the belief that the time has about arrived "when we shall have to return to the use of the pamphlet, if we are to have any such thing as free utterances of heretical opinion."

At the time when these strictures were unloaded upon the press of the country, without discrimination, they were doubtless more nearly justified than now. Three years have witnessed a great change in the field of daily journalism in America, particularly in the West. Synchronously with the rapid growth of the progressive political spirit there has developed an increasing tendency toward freedom of journalistic thought. If the counting-house still is king, it rules with deftly hidden hand on occasion.

I have in mind at this moment a newspaper of wide circulation and great influence printed in a great California city. Its proprietor is a man of great wealth. At a time when associated vice dominated the city government, a movement for the closing of the saloons was started. It was palpably a desperate attempt to punish the liquor interests for their pernicious interference in municipal affairs.

The managing editor went to the proprietor about the matter. "The movement is confined to a relatively small number of persons, apparently," said the editor. "If we back it, it will probably cost us thousands of subscribers and a big lot of advertising patronage."

"Do you believe it to be the right thing for us to do?" inquired the proprietor.

"In principle, yes."

"All right, then. Go ahead and make the fight, win or lose. If it is right, never mind the business end of it."

The fight cost the newspaper what the editor predicted it would. "Stop" orders poured into the circulation department by the hundred. Heavy advertisers, quailing before the big fist of whiskey and its partners in the campaign, certain public utility corporations, withdrew their patronage.

The fight was short, sharp and decisive. Whiskey won at the polls. Within a couple of weeks the newspaper lost practically all the ground it had gained in a year's struggle. But when the hour of the popular sober second thought arrived practically all the rebels returned to camp, and with them came recruits in double or triple the number.

This paper probably exerts more influence today than any other published upon the Pacific coast. People have learned that its editorial policy is not governed by its business department. Here, at least, the counting-house is not king.

It appears necessary to write all this to clear the way to what may prove to be a solution of the very important question: How shall we manage to get a newspaper which will treat all political parties, or considerable factions of parties, or organizations of voters, with equal fairness? In the answer to this question may lie the solution of the "free press" problem.

The citizens of Los Angeles apparently believe they have discovered the correct answer to the question. At the special election held last winter they wrote into their charter a provision conferring upon the city power "to publish a newspaper, and to sell and distribute the same." The City Council now has before it a proposed ordinance establishing a "municipal newspaper commission" of three persons to be appointed by the Mayor, in which is vested the duty of establishing and, through a general manager selected by the commission, conducting a municipal newspaper.

Other cities have their municipal publications, but if the City Council adopts the ordinance before it, or one drawn along more or less similar lines, Los Angeles will be the first American city, if not the first city in the world, to enter upon the experiment of publishing a newspaper.

Certain restrictions regarding the character of the news to be printed are imposed by the ordinance, but they allow great latitude. Under the terms of the ordinance the publication must conform to the following specifications:

"In the publication of news it shall endeavor to publish the facts with the strictest available accuracy.

"It shall give particular attention to municipal news.

"It shall refrain from any argument, presented as its own, concerning any religious question, or any political question pertaining essentially to national or state political issues.

"Any argument of said paper upon municipal issues shall be in harmony with those principles and measures which have been approved by the voters of Los Angeles city, either by direct vote thereon or by charter provision, or by public platform or statement of principles approved at an election and not subsequently rejected, or by ordinance or resolution of the Council not suspended in its operation by a referendum petition."

Nothing in these restrictions will prohibit the publication of the public utterances of individuals or interviews with them, or of special signed articles, when such contributions are published as matters of news and not for the purpose of propaganda.

From the viewpoint of those who believe that a newspaper, to be fair, must allow its columns to carry to the people every essential legitimate truth regarding things political, and any reasonable argument on any side of an important public question, and a reasonable degree of publicity regarding any candidate for public office, the most important feature of the project lies in the proposed open columns of the municipal newspaper. The ordinance provides that any political organization polling three per cent of the vote of the city shall have the free use of one column in every issue of the paper, in which to present the views of that organization upon public questions, or any news items it may wish published. Provision is made also by which independent candidates not affiliated with an organization may have a definite amount of space assigned for their use, also free of charge, if it appears that they have received three per cent of the votes cast. The ordinance also empowers the commission to sell advertising space and to determine the classes of advertising that will be accepted.

A crooked administration can be elected by organized vice, without newspaper support. This has been done in Los Angeles. But no reform administration can be placed in power without newspaper backing. Unfortunately the average administration begins with the suspicion, in some quarters, that it will be more or less influenced by the newspaper or newspapers which backed it during the campaign.

George H. Dunlop, former president of the Good Government Organization of Los Angeles, is the originator of the idea which has taken form in the ordinance proposing to establish the Municipal News. The need for such a medium became apparent to him during the municipal campaign of 1909 and the state and county campaign of 1911. In each case nominations were made by petition. In the city seventy-seven candidates for nomination to the City Council secured places upon the primary ballot. Voters looked for guidance to the daily newspapers, which, while advocating a free-for-all race in certain instances, ignored all but their favorite candidates. The result was that certain good men secured practically no publicity.

With the Municipal News in the field each candidate may secure as great a degree of publicity, so far as lies within the power of such a medium to give publicity, as any of his rivals, on precisely the same terms. Further than this, the platform and principles of the smallest organization of voters will receive precisely the same consideration as that accorded the platform and principles of the organization having the greatest numerical strength. The voter seeking authentic information regarding all candidates for office and the principles underlying any political movement will find such information in the Municipal News, and he will not find it elsewhere.

There can be no playing of favorites. A Socialist, a Prohibitionist, a a Republican, a Democrat, a Good Government Organization candidate —if such candidates there be—all will find themselves on exactly the same basis. Predatory wealth may have its say—if it organize politically—in a column parallel with that occupied by the toiler. The candidate who walks to his daily work, carrying his dinner pail, and the candidate who rides to his office in a six-thousand-dollar automobile, will be on a common level, provided they keep within the libel laws and employ decent language in doing so. The administration may defend itself from the attacks of the "outs"—and the opposition may handle the administration as roughly as it will, provided its literary offering is fit for publication.

The privately-owned daily newspaper serving special interests must get off the center of the political stage after the municipal newspaper gets into action.

ROYAL ARCH NOT FIGHTING WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The California Outlook,

Gentlemen:

In your issue of June 3, 1911, you devote a portion of your valuable space to an item regarding woman suffrage; and you make the charge that the Knights of the Royal Arch is fighting it and has put a woman speaker in the field to oppose the cause.

Permit me to inform you that your conclusions are erroneous. This organization has taken absolutely no action regarding this question and is not going to. Many of our members are in favor of it and many oppose it. However, it is worthy your attention that those who oppose it do so not from a fear of the consequences to the liquor business. We long ago made a thorough investigation in the states where woman suffrage has been tried and we learned that the liquor busines has NOT been injured the least by the women's vote. The statement of the Prohibitionists, "Woman suffrage will kill the liquor business," seems to be founded on theory only. All the facts point to the contrary. Mabel Craft Deering, a well informed suffragette who is contributing articles to the Pacific Graphic, a magazine receiving its support from the Anti-Saloon League, says that in states where women vote the women have taken no more interest in the liquor question than have the men.

Therefore, while we are absolutely indifferent as to the outcome of the question, we dislike to be accused of fighting it when we are not. We have been blamed for circulating an unspeakable piece of literature sent out from Los Angeles by some crank. The article was signed "Veritas Vincit" and contained more ridiculous rot to the line than any pamplet I ever saw.

In view of the fact that a most casual investigation would convince anyone of our position on this question, is it not pretty dirty politics to attempt to make friends for the cause of woman suffrage by circulating unfounded rumors that this organization of liquor men is against it? There are enough good reasons why women should be given the suffrage without stooping to such despicable methods to gain that desirable end.

Yours Very Truly,
L. L. DeBra,
Editor Publicity.

The Telephone Situation in Los Angeles

By Kempster B. Miller

The following is the substance of an address delivered last Saturday before the City Club of Los Angeles by Mr. Kempster B. Miller, one of the most prominent telephone experts in the United States. Mr. Miller has been connected in prominent capacities with the United States Patent Office, the Kellogg Switch-board & Supply Company and other large concerns. He is the author of a well known text book on American Telephone Practice and has specialized in this work for upwards of eighteen years:

In introducing Mr. Miller, Mr. Lissner, President of the City Club, and also of the Board of Public Utilities, said:

Gentlemen: You remember that the Board of Public Utilities last year, after an investigation made by the telephone expert of the Wisconsin Railroad Commission, Mr. Sloan, recommended certain rates for telephone service for the ensuing year. You remember that the Council saw fit to disregard our recommendations and adopted other rates, lower than those we recommended. One of the companies, under protest, acquiesced in the ordinance and collected the rates prescribed; the other, the Pacific Company, took the matter into court and secured an injunction against the enforcement of the ordinance and the collection of the rates prescribed, and the court ordered that the company might collect the old rates, which were higher, and impound the difference between the old rates and the rates fixed by the council, to await the result of the action. The City Attorney was instructed to defend the action on behalf of the city, and at his request was authorized by the Council to find and employ the most competent available expert for the purpose of trying to make a case on behalf of the city.

The City Attorney made an independent search for a telephone expert and selected the speaker of the day. The hope on the part of the Council and the City Attorney was that Mr. Miller's report might justify the Council's rates.

After a number of months of careful investigation, Mr. Miller's report when made showed that the rates fixed by the Council for the Sunset Company would only give them a net return of less than one per cent on the physical valuation of their property, and, of course, on that showing, although the city has not finally acted in the matter, and the court proceeding remains in statu quo, we all know that the city will not be able to make out a case in court, and eventually the case will have to be dismissed, so far as the city's defense is concerned, and the moneys, something like $50,000, impounded in court by the company will have to be returned to the company, which will be permitted to keep that amount; and the city is also out, or, rather, has had to expend a number of thousands of dollars for the investigation made by Mr. Miller for the Council and the City Attorney's office.

After Mr. Miller had concluded his report for the Council and the City Attorney, he was available for the purpose of the Board of Public Utilities. We had made no independent investigation this year, because the matter was all up in the air, so far as we were concerned. We were justified in resting the case where we submitted it last year. But all of the data and information that Mr. Miller had secured in a number of months of very careful work was at our service, and at a very small expense, comparatively, we had the benefit of that and such further investigation as Mr. Miller could make within the last ten days or two weeks, in order to recommend rates for the following year, which he has done. The rates suggested by him have been adopted by the Board of Public Utilities and are now before the people.

Attitude of Utilities Board

Before introducing Mr. Miller, I want to say on behalf of the Board of Public Utilities that, of course, we would rather lower a rate for any public utility than to raise one. It isn't a pleasant thing at all to have to suggest a raise in rates. But, after we have made careful investigation and found, on the basis of the physical valuation of the property and the returns that the company is receiving, that they only receive a fraction of the minimum net earnings they are legally entitled to, it is just as much our duty, I take it, to fix a rate that will give the company at least a living percentage on their investment, as it is to reduce a rate when we find that charges are excessive.

If we didn't have the courage to do that, gentlemen, we wouldn't be fit to hold our positions and our work wouldn't stand. For example, if we would reduce rates for the telephone companies this year in the way the Council did last year, the result would undoubtedly be further litigation. The matter would again be thrown into the courts. The citizens who paid for telephone service would again have their money impounded in court, and eventually the money would have to be returned to the companies, and the city would be up against it again; a state of demoralization which it isn't pleasant to contemplate.

Now, if we are going to have regulation of public utilities at all,—and that we must have, we have got to give the companies, as well as the people, a square deal. (Applause.) And that has been the aim at all times of the Board of Public Utilities of the City of Los Angeles.

Mr. Miller said in part:

Mr. President, and Members of the City Club of Los Angeles:

I assure you that the task that I have performed here has been an interesting one, and a pleasant one, even though it may have resulted in some unpopularity for me personally. As Mr. Lissner said, to have done otherwise than we have done would not have been a brave thing to do, and to have done as we have done was the only reasonahle thing that we could say could be done.

I haven't found that Californians are lacking in appreciation, in general, of what they have. But I am inclined to think that, perhaps, some of you do not know what a town you have here, from the telephonic standpoint.

I will give you a little history. In 1886, 25 years ago, Los Angeles had 218 telephones.

In 1897, 14 years ago, the number was 2500.

In the beginning of 1904, only 7 years ago, an enormous increase had taken place, bringing the total up to 15,020.

About the middle of 1904 the Home Telephone Company entered the field. As I recollect it, they had about 4000 telephones when they opened up about April, 1904. In the middle of 1904 there were probably about 18,000 telephones altogether operating in this town; seven years ago.

Today, or at the first of this year, there were over 80,000 telephones in this city. That means that there is a telephone for every four people. It means there are 25 phones for every 100 inhabitants. Such a development is unheard of anywhere in the world, so far as I know.

To show you what this means in the way of telephone business, telephone traffic, I will say that there are about 750,000 calls made in Los Angeles daily. That means over two calls per day for every man, woman and child in this city.

Summarizing rate history, I will say that until about 7 years ago, with a single company in the field and with a relatively small telephone development, rates that were in the aggregate much higher than at present were charged, the Home Company coming into the field in 1904, starting with rates about half those charged by the old company. Since that time, in spite of the unparalleled growth of the two companies, there has been, partly due to competition and partly to ordinance requirements, a great reduction of the old company's rates.

Independent Companies

It has been generally true throughout the United States that the independent companies, or Home Companies, as you call them here on the Pacific Coast, have, with much enthusiasm,—born, I think, of ignorance,—charged too low rates. They have figured on the actual costs of labor and material, salaries and wages, rent, light, heat, and those things that are tangible and which are readily grasped by any business man; but they have neglected to figure on those intangible but nevertheless real expenses, which are not so apparent, at the outset, at least. I refer particularly to depreciation of the plant.

As a result of this neglect to count on depreciation, many of the companies have been able to realize large apparent profits in the early stages of their business. But history shows the time of reckoning has invariably come in those cases where depreciation of the plant has not been reckoned with, with the result that the companies have been forced to raise their rates or adopt any one of the other necessary but unpleasant alternatives.

Increase in Telephone Rates

The statement is often made that the cost of giving service increases per telephone as the number of telephones increases. That statement is true sometimes, but as usually made and as I have just made it, it is altogether too broad to be true. It is true, without question, that it costs more per telephone to give service in a large community with a large number of telephones than it does in a small community with a small number of telephones. For instance, in a small town a telephone plant may often be built at a total expense of not more than 40 or 50 dollars per telephone. On the other hand, a plant in a city like Los Angeles will cost in the neighborhood of $125 to $150 per telephone; sometimes a great deal more. In referring to costs I am not including promotion costs or anything but the legitimate expenses for buying the material, putting it in place, and overseeing the work as it is being done.

In a small town, the average length of line may not be over a third of a mile. In a large city the average length may be several miles. Or in a large city the average length of the lines may be reduced by putting in many central offices, instead of one, thus effecting a saving in the length of the lines themselves, but incurring, on the other hand, a great expense in the matter of trunk lines between the central offices.

In a small town the switchboard may be put in the back room of a residence or store. In a large city, costly buildings are required.

The same sort of comparisons may be made on operating charges as well as on investment charges, and the conclusion is inevitable that the cost per telephone of giving service in a large community is very much greater than the cost in a small community. There are a great many telephone companies operating in little towns of four or five hundred inhabitants, with a hundred telephones, perhaps, that are doing a nice business at a dollar and a half per month per telephone. On the other hand there are big cities where companies are unquestionably losing money on their flat-rate service with rates of $100 per year or more.

It is not true, however, as often stated, that, with a given plant, the cost of giving telephone service goes up per telephone as the number of subscribers increases. The reverse is likely to be true. Plants are ordinarily built for a greater ultimate capacity than their immediate requirements, and as the number of telephones grows up to the ultimate capacity of the plant, the cost per telephone of giving service is more likely to come down than to go up.

Building for Future

The trouble here in Los Angeles is,—and this is no exception,—that no one has been able to guess successfully what the future growth of the city would be. It was not possible for the Home Company or the Pacific Company either, seven years ago, for instance, to build a plant of ultimate capacity equal to the present requirements, for two reasons: First, they didn't have the money; second, they had no idea of what this town was coming to and it would have been a bold man then to have guessed what it has done. What the companies in this city have been doing is to build their plants as fast as they could in an attempt to provide for the present and for the future as far as possible, and they have constantly been brought face to face with the fact that they had underestimated the growth and failed to build large enough.

These conditions do not make for decreasing the cost per telephone for service, but rather for increasing it. Telephone people all over the country have been watching Los Angeles in particular, and the great cities in general, wondering where this telephone development was going to stop. Just to give you an idea of what has happened in recent years in other places, I will say that New York City during 1908 put in more telephones every six months, added that many more to its plant, than it had in the whole first 17 years of its existence. Every six months they added more telephones than they had at the end of 17 years. Chicago's experience is similar. This city is much worse,—or better, whichever way you want to look at it. Telephone men all over the country have been wondering how long the companies here in Los Angeles could continue giving service at rates so extremely low as they were here.

As a result of the suit brought by the Pacific Company against the city, to enjoin the enforcement of the rates prescribed by the Council, I have had the opportunity of investigating the situation with the utmost care in respect to one of the companies, and to review the situation in a very general way with respect to the other company. The results of my findings have been made public in a measure. I have found that the exchange business of the Pacific Company for the year 1909, when viewed from the most favorable point of view for the interests of the city, resulted in a net profit of about one per cent of my estimated reconstruction cost of the plant within the city limits at that time. My analysis of 1910 operations of the Pacific Company showed a slightly increased rate of return on a considerably larger investment.

The company's books showed a loss of $49,000 for 1909, and a loss of $23,000, for the exchange operations during 1910. I revised those figures considerably, with the result that I showed a profit of something like $149,000 for 1910, a calculated or estimated profit, with the revenue and the expenses adjusted in a way that I thought was more nearly proper.

Service

Let us look a little into the matter of service. In 1904 the single company that was then operating here had about 15,000 telephones, and a great many of them were on that abominable thing for city service, a 10-party line. They were charging for 10-party line business telephones $2.50. For 10-party line residence telephones, $1.25. I can speak with direct knowledge of the situation here then.

From the bad service that existed here in the early part of the last decade, shortly after 1900, there has been very great improvement. I won't say that the service here is the best that I know of, because it isn't; but I will say that there is more of it than I ever saw before.

I mention that thing in passing, gentlemen, to bring out a lesson that I think should be taken to heart. I have made municipal investigations to a considerable number. If it was a gas investigation, the quality of gas was concerned. If it was electric light, the quality of the service and what the subscriber was receiving was concerned, the regulation, the steadiness of the light and so forth. Telephone investigations almost always are made on the basis of how much it costs, and people do not seem to realize that there is just as much difference in quality in telephone service as there is in price.

My conviction is that Los Angeles has been getting about as good a service as it could expect for the rates that it has been paying.

It is interesting to note, in connection with this service matter, the tendency of the times with regard to the use of the various grades of service. Take a rough analysis of the Pacific Company's business: For 1906 I find 1535 single party business lines; 3924 single party business telephones today. On the 4-party there were then 1827; now 526. The number of 4-party business telephones since 1906, you see, has been quartered. With the residence telephones it is even worse,—or better. Then there were 772 1-party residence in the Pacific Company; now 3,244. There has been a great increase in the 2-party business, which is a good class of service: Then 700; now 6079. There has been a falling-off in spite of the great net gain of the company, in the 4-party residence. Then 14,261; now 11,116. Of 10-party residence telephones there were, even as late as 1906, 350 left. They have all disappeared. There is, therefore, a tendency among the telephone-using public toward the use of the better grades of the service offered.

That is not the only sign of the times that we can see. A few years ago, when state and municipal investigation and regulation of public utilities were brought so strongly before the public, the public service corporations couldn't see it with a telescope. They ridiculed it. They didn't propose to stand for it. Today they have seen the handwriting on the wall. They are either gracefully or otherwise submitting to it, and I think they are beginning to realize that intelligent, fair regulation is a good thing for the company as well as for the public.

Rates

The rates that have been proposed by me have been prepared with extreme care. I found that some of the classes of service here that were sold the cheapest were costing the most. Some of these so-called sending lines that now operate in your drug stores and banks, put in the most attractive surroundings, where they invite free use by the public, have been costing less, much less than the average business man is paying for his telephone. What was the result? Some of those lines show 49 calls made over one line in one hour. To handle traffic like that, gentlemen, costs money. Who is paying it? Not the person who subscribes for the telephone, because he is paying only $4 a month for it. It's the dear public, the other subscribers, who pay. Quite a number of these lines were measured up carefully, with the result that they show 109 calls average per day; and if I didn't have pretty good faith in the man that made those observations, I wouldn't believe it.

The net results of the proposed rates, as near as they can be determined,—and I will confess frankly that they can't be determined exactly,—is an increase of revenue of about $90,000 to the Pacific Company and $174,000 to the Home Company. This is as near an estimate as I can make. The reason I can't make a more accurate one is because the adoption of new rates will, in itself, produce a state of unstable equilibrium among the subscribers, and it is a matter of psychology rather than of engineering to know just how the subscribers will redistribute themselves.

You may ask why we give the Home Company a greater increase than the Pacific Company. We could see no reason here for establishing a differential system of rates. As the Home Company was operating under most violent protest, at much lower rates than the Pacific Company, and yet had about the same number of telephones, inevitably any uniform higher system of rates should result in a greater increase in revenue to the Home Company than to the Pacific Company.

Stocks and Bonds

One more point: The matter of stocks and bonds. Stocks and bonds have absolutely not entered into the investigation that has been made here. If a company's plant cost it twice as much as it ought to have cost it, I have allowed in my basis of figuring the plant the amount that it ought to have cost. I have estimated the actual cost as nearly as I could determine it of reproducing the physical property of the plant as it exists. The rate of return allowed is only on what my estimate says that it ought to have cost.

Mr. Lissner: I would like to ask Mr. Miller, before any other questions are put, to state a little more fully than he did the comparative rates between the rates in this city and the rates in other cities of about the same class in telephones.

Mr. Miller: I had intended to mention that fact. The rates as now proposed are lower in the aggregate than those of any city in the country or in the world,—well, I don't know about European rates, so I won't say that—but lower than those of any other city in the United States that could with any reason be compared with Los Angeles. You will still have, gentlemen, the cheapest telephone service that I know of, considering what you are getting.

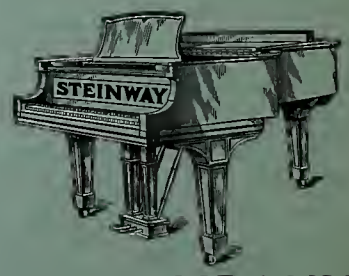
Mr. Johnson: Mr. Miller, I notice the rate of 25 cents extra for portable phones. Does a portable phone cost any more to purchase than a wall phone?

Mr. Miller: I dealt with that subject in my report. The cost is not widely different. The portable telephone costs a little more in some cases; about the same in others; and I presume for the automatic it costs considerably more. How is it, Mr. Cass?

Mr. Cass: About double.

Mr. Miller: About double in the automatic. Well, in relation to the increase and the higher rate for a portable telephone than for a wall telephone, the reason that I have is this: You can't justify 50 cents or 25 cents on the mere ground of maintenance, or what it costs to own and operate those telephones. The fact, though, that those distinctions have been made here has resulted in the telephone companies having a large number of wall telephones in service and in stock, larger than they would have had had things taken their natural course and the decision been made merely on the preference of the subscriber. Now, to wipe out that difference, or to very greatly reduce it, would throw out of service for both companies a very large number of wall phones, probably. This would mean that they would have a large amount of money uselessly invested in telephones that were good enough for service but useless because relatively unpopular.

Now, it has been my theory,—and I am sure it is right,—that that distinction should be made to apply uniformly over the general classes of service in which it had heretofore existed; with the 50 cent charge reduced to 25 cents where the 50 cent difference has been maintained. I believe that in the future it will be policy and it will be proper gradually to wipe out that distinction. Not all at once. Not in five years, and perhaps never wipe it out, because there is a difference from the standpoint of maintenance and from the standpoint of first cost of the instrument. But I think on the maintenance ground alone the 25 cents is not justified. The result would be if we wiped out that distinction now, the companies would have to greatly increase their investments in portable telephones and suffer a great loss on wall telephones and the public would have to pay that bill.



Mr. Dromgold: There is a question of the practicability of switching from our Home system to our other system: I want to ask Mr. Miller if that is practical in the device of the telephone.

Mr. Lissner: Since the organization of the Board of Public Utilities, since we gave any consideration to telephone matters at all, we have been trying to work through some arrangement between the companies whereby a person who had a telephone of only one company could talk through his telephone to a subscriber of the other company. We took this matter up with the companies and we found an unwillingness on the part of both companies to consider the matter. They said it was not practicable, and that the cost of it would be almost prohibitive. We weren't entirely satisfied with that, and have been studying the situation and making some investigations, and we still have an idea that the thing can be worked out. We had Mr. Sloan make an investigation upon the subject; and I have to confess that his investigation was not very comforting from our point of view. Nevertheless, we have been keeping at it. I tried to secure the adoption of a measure through the last Legislature, which provided that utility corporations or companies furnishing the same class of service should be compelled to interchange their service with other companies, upon the payment of a fair compensation to be fixed by mutual agreement or by the authority having jurisdiction over the question of rates. I am very sorry to say that that bill, which was introduced by Senator Hewitt very late in the session, got lost in the shuffle along with a lot of other good things. They couldn't do everything. And the matter, of course, will be agitated again, and we hope to have such a law passed eventually. The same idea would apply to street car transfers, so that we could compel one street railway company to transfer to another, so long as there was adequate compensation.

Now, we took up this matter of interchange with Mr. Miller and tried to make an arrangement to get a report from him upon the subject, and we are just sending a communication to the Council today to which we inclose and attach Mr. Miller's communication, in which he refers to the necessity of a thorough investigation and fixes his price; and undoubtedly, in order to make a report upon that which would be worth anything, it would require very careful and extended investigation. If Mr. Dromgold still desires to ask Mr. Miller whether in his opinion telephone interchange in the city of Los Angeles at the present time would be practicable, we will permit him to ask the question.

Mr. Dromgold: Mr. President, I don't wish to place Mr. Miller in any embarrassing position with regard to his work for the city here. The question I wish to ask was not one that I thought would do that. But I raise the question whether it is practicable.

Mr. Miller: There is no embarrassment whatever, gentlemen, and I will tell you in just a few words what I think about it. As to whether or not it is a physical possibility, there is no doubt about it. It can be done. As to whether or not a scheme can be worked out which will be legally possible and commercially possible, I say I don't know.

Mr. Lissner: Before dismissing you, I would like to make one point a little clearer than it has been made. Figures have been given showing the increase of the Pacific Company and the increase of the Home Company; and it appears that we have increased the gross earnings of the Home Company a great deal more than we have those of the Pacific Company. That is true, based upon a comparison between the new rates and the rates charged last year by the Home Company; but, of course, you must remember, gentlemen, that the rates charged last year by the Home Company were very much lower than those charged by the Pacific Company and were accepted under protest, and it is claimed by the Home Company that they did not pay a fair return upon the investment; and that is the attitude of the Board of Public Utilities, because the rates that were suggested last year by us were just sufficient to pay six per cent upon the investment, according to our calculations. So if you want to make a fair comparison, you must assume that the Home Company charged last year the same rates that the Pacific Company did; and if you did that, you would see that the apparent increase for the Home Company as compared with the Pacific Company would be obliterated.

I hope we are all going away feeling that a fair, conscientious investigation has been given, which I know to be the case, and we thank Mr. Miller very much for his clear presentation and able address.

Canadian Reciprocity and the Tariff

From an Article

By H. E. MILES

Chairman Executive Committee National Tariff Commission Association

Good as is the proposed treaty of reciprocity with Canada, it is a mistake to think of it only in itself. Rather it is to be considered as the first definite step in a program of International Trade Expansion quite beyond present calculations.

McKinley Rates Excessive

The McKinley Tariff was in many respects the highest our country has ever known. Said Col. Geo. Tichenor, general appraiser, and right hand man of McKinley in the shaping of the McKinley bill: "The controlling idea in the preparation of the McKinley bill was to dispose of, and prevent, the accumulation of surplus revenue. It was in that view that duties upon certain articles were made prohibitive, upon others higher than they otherwise would have been." The actual rates in the bill support this statement. The marvelous development of our great industrial aggregations and their profits confirm it. The defeat of McKinley's party in the next election showed what the people thought of it. This action by McKinley forms an interesting answer to those ultra protectionists who urge high rates as necessary to the securing of necessary revenue. McKinley knew that high rates (excessive rates) decrease revenue by decreasing imports, in many cases to the extent of prohibition.

Dingley Rates Especially Provide for Reciprocity

Notwithstanding the McKinley rates were excessive, the Dingley rates were made much higher. Mr. John Ball Osborne, head of the treaty making division of the State Department, has said that the Dingley rates were made just 20 per cent higher than the McKinley for the purpose of trading them off in treaties of reciprocity. The statement is not quite exact, however, as I found by an exhaustive comparison of all rates in both bills. The Dingley law did, however, provide that the President might negotiate treaties of reciprocity with all nations and lower the Dingley rates at his discretion up to 20 per cent in those treaties. The Dingley law was made with that in view. Senator Dolliver declared upon the floor of the Senate, in substance: "The Dingley rates were made high for the purpose of trading them off. I was a member of the committee that framed the bill and know whereof I speak." Confirmation is unnecessary, for the text of the law specifically so provided.

McKinley Sought Reciprocity

With these Dingley rates unnecessarily high, Mr. McKinley, then President, entered eagerly upon a program of trade expansion. He declared that he expected that these trade treaties and the consequent enormous increase of our foreign trade would be the chief accomplishment of his administration. He was greatly grieved and disappointed when the Senate refused to confirm the several treaties which he submitted, known as the Kasson Treaties, and especially as he found no reason to believe that other attempts, however successful, would be ratified by the Senate. The over-protected interests, having gotten the 20 per cent increase, were unwilling to return any part of it to the people for any consideration. The Dingley law limited to two years from the time of its enactment the period within which the treaties could be made. The Interests had therefore only to prevent the ratification in the Senate for these two years in order to benefit by the unintended increase from that time to this.

Few utterances in our history will be longer remembered than McKinley's last pathetic plea for reciprocity at Buffalo, immediately preceding his assassination. A century hence it will be better appreciated than today, as will also the greed of those who have stayed the nation's progress these fifteen years.

The Payne Law Amply Provides for Reciprocity

The Payne Law is, in substance, the Dingley Law re-enacted. The changes, whether "upward" or "downward," are mostly immaterial, like the reduction on sugar, from 72 per cent to 71 per cent. We are substantially on the Dingley basis of fifteen years ago, with the 20 per cent still in, though our manufacturing efficiency is greater and our need of high rates is less and our need of foreign outlets is greater.

On the other hand, our population has wonderfully increased, while our natural resources have been much depleted. At this particular moment our factories are running short handed and many of them short hours. This is no time for aught but confidence and optimism. It is nevertheless true that our factories need orders and their operatives will be short in wages this year by hundreds of millions of dollars.

For these and other reasons President Taft, and with McKinley's later and broader vision, and quite of his own motion, has opened again the door of opportunity, and it is inconceivable that Congress and the people will for a moment think of closing it again.

Canada First

It is particularly fortunate that the first treaty is with Canada, which best deserves it. With only 8,000,000 population she is our third best customer, and if cotton is excepted she is our second best, surpassed only by Great Britain with its 50,000,000 of people. Mr. Osborne estimates that this treaty will almost immediately increase our trade with Canada some $200,000,000. * * * *

We Are Novices in International Trade

There are only four great manufacturing nations in the world—England, France, Germany and the United States. In volume of product, the United States is far and away in the lead. Outside these four nations there are one and one-half billion human souls who look to these nations for their manufactured supplies. The rewards offered in this world trade are beyond comprehension. They are to be measured in money, in intellectual advancement, in national spirit, in heightened civilization, and yet in this world trade the United States has, until now, refused to participate. We have made our tariffs not protective, but prohibitive in the majority of items, and in many ways we have served notice upon the nations that it is our policy to restrict international trade, rather than to promote it.

Natural Resources Depleted

We are not in the race. As a people we are ignorant of foreign trade. Lost in the by-places of England, I have learned more of world trade from notices on the walls of little postoffices than I could from the officials of some of our largest cities.

It has been aptly said that America is little else than a huge stevedore, bearing down to the ships of the sea crude and semi-crude materials for the employment of the capital, labor, and intellect of foreign nations. Exportation of these partly manufactured materials is a depletion of our natural resources, the heritage of the ages in mine, forest and soil fertility, never to be restored. Those who are best informed see within a period, which to the far-sighted is only as a day, our wonderful country importing these same materials, and our producers handicapped by excessive cost.

We Must Export More of Finished Products

Now, we must use every effort to send our products abroad ready for consumption, carrying the maximum and not the minimum of American labor, and skill. Think of the difference in the amount of labor carried by a typewriter and a bar of iron; a planter and a billet. We ship our cotton abroad raw at 14 cents per pound. We buy some of it back in fine handkerchiefs from the thrifty Swiss, at $40.00 per pound, all labor. The exports of England, Germany and France are finished products, mostly labor; most of ours carry only enough labor to make them fit for ship's cargo.

Our labor is in many respects the most efficient in the world. We are proud of our "men behind the guns;" their brothers, the men behind the machines in our factories, have no less of ability and the courage of accomplishment. There is brains in a Remington typewriter, a Singer sewing machine, and in American shoes. These are already exported in volume, and point the way for tens of thousands of other products which can be made as welcome in foreign markets. These show, too, that high paid American wages are cheap wages.

As then-President Roosevelt said to the writer three years ago: "We have become an industrial nation, and must acquire world markets for our finished products." Such markets broaden the industrial base of operations, and will infinitely lessen the hurt of domestic stringencies and panics, which in the world sense are often local.

The Ocean No Barrier

The ocean is not a barrier to trade. Rather it is the easiest, cheapest and freest of all highways. Instead of separating the nations, it now makes them all neighbors.

Freight has been carried from Pittsburg to Liverpool as cheaply as from Pittsburg to Chicago. Mr. Hill has carried foodstuffs from Minnesota to Japan at as low charge as from Minnesota to New York. Coal is carried from Cardiff to Port Said for 75 cents per ton, some 6,000 miles. Ocean charges are about one-fifth those of the railways.

Governments all barter through Trade Treaties—or, as we call them, Treaties of Reciprocity—for nations now invariably assist their citizens in these ways. Germany is the perfect example, which we are the last of all her competitors to follow. She made a high tariff (one-fourth as high as ours!) and then by special treaties of twelve years' duration she secured special trade privileges in all countries and she has had peace with honor and great prosperity ever since.

The English alternative of free trade is impossible to us, and abhorrent.

Let us to a man support the administration in this tardy action and make it impossible for unfriendly influences to again shut the doors of opportunity.

Candidate for Mayor in Los Angeles: W. C. Mushet has announced his candidacy for the office of mayor of Los Angeles. He served one term of three years as city auditor, and in 1909 ran for mayor in the direct primary but fell a little short of votes enough to get on the final ballot. His candidacy this year is not to be regarded seriously, as it represents little else than a misplaced personal ambition. Two years ago he had some following among business men, but that seems to have evaporated. There was also then an active push among the saloons and the tough element who eagerly accepted Mushet's reckless talk about personal liberty as meaning a wide-open town. But this year the saloons will keep out of politics. They are no longer hunting trouble; they have all they need in trying to keep straight and hang onto their licenses. The Union Labor people will probably have their own candidate. Mushet's only political asset apparently is the Times, and that is a liability. He will not go very far.

Banks Stand by City: Birmingham, Alabama, which is the Chicago of the Southern States in point of growth and future promise, has suffered a good deal from bad government. Recently it came under the commission form and excellent men were chosen —something that is probable under the short ballot and almost impossible under the long ballot. These men, after a thorough study of the financial problem by which the city was beset, laid the case before a committee of the local banks. Although the showing of school conditions was very bad, the city having a floating indebtedness of a million dollars, the report showed such an understanding on the part of the commission of the way to handle the situation, and such a determination to work it out economically, that the banks agreed on their part to take care of half a million of the debt at 3¾ per cent, which relieves immediate necessities and puts the city's credit on a sound basis. This illustrates the fact that even capital, which is rated as one of the most cold-blooded things on earth, has plenty of patriotism when it is given a fair chance. First of all, make our city governments honest and efficient, instead of subservient to bosses and parties, and everyone will be glad to aid and sustain them in good work.

Dusty Roads Problem: In the small cities of the Eastern States that are situated on turnpikes that carry a large through automobile traffic, sprinkling or oiling of roads has become a serious problem. Many of them have not been in the habit of sprinkling their roads as rains occur often enough to keep them in fair order under the use of horse drawn vehicles. But as soon as the surface is dry the swift automobile tears the road to tatters. Some of these cities lack the necessary water storage to meet the problem, and they are resorting to oil. Others are letting their roads go to wreck. The situation seems to call for state aid for all through roads that are used for automobile traffic.

Shy of Garbage: There are about 5000 cities in the United States that are in more or less trouble and expense because of the amount of garbage they produce; there is one city, however, that is put to a great deal of trouble and expense because it does not produce garbage enough. This is Dayton, Ohio, which some time ago entered into a foolish agreement with a reduction company that if the latter would set up a plant the city would provide a certain amount of garbage. The amount was a gross over-estimate, and in course of time the company brought suit and actually got a judgment of $79,000. Later the company began another suit, this time for $89,000 more.

> WE will never bring disgrace to this our city by any act of dishonesty or cowardice, nor ever desert our suffering comrades in the ranks; we will fight for the ideals and sacred things of the city, both alone and with many; we will revere and obey the city's laws, and do our best to incite a like respect and reverence in those above us who are prone to annul and set them at naught; we will strive unceasingly to quicken the public's sense of civic duty; that thus, in all these ways, we will transmit this city not only not less, but greater, better, and more beautiful than it was transmitted to us.

Division of Cost of Crossings: Youngstown, Ohio, is beginning on a general plan of excluding grade crossings. The cost is fixed at two millions of which under the State law the city must pay 35 per cent and the steam roads 65 per cent. The street car company will bear a portion of the city's expense, reducing the total to $500,000. Bonds will be voted for this purpose.

Redlight System: The chief of police of Reading, Pennsylvania, in his annual report, speaks in the highest terms of the red light police signal system now in use in that city. Many important arrests, he says, have been made through this system. Men can be dispatched instantly to the spot where they are needed. He has been able on several occasions, he states, to place seven men in three minutes' time at the spot where a crime has been committed.

New York Public Library: The beautiful building that contains the public library of New York was recently thrown open to the people of that city. It was erected at a cost of $10,000,000 on ground which is valued at $20,000,000. The unique feature of the building and its arrangement is the perfect facility with which the books are put at the disposal of those who would use them.

Cleaning Sidewalks: In a paper read before the New York State Conference of Mayors, A. Prescott Folwell, editor of the Municipal Journal, contended that every argument that could be offered in favor of street cleaning by the city applied with even greater force to the cleaning of sidewalks, which should be made a municipal function and not left to the individual, by whom it was frequently neglected.

School Children Hunt Mosquitoes: The Board of Health of East Orange, New Jersey, has enlisted the school children in its fight against mosquitoes. Any child that discovers and reports a natural breeding place for the wrigglers is rewarded with a dime. The children are taught how to detect these places, and as soon as they are discovered they are either drained or treated with oil.

General Wreck of Streets: Chicago is applying itself with great vigor to the problem of getting its streets in order. It is said that two-thirds of the down town streets are in shocking condition, some of them being practically impassable.

Maintaining Lawns: Eastern park authorities find that it costs on the average $160 an acre a year to maintain a lawn in good condition.

Handling Meat for Sale: The Board of Health of Indianapolis reports that its inspectors find many meat shops where customers are allowed to paw over the fresh meat lying on the counters, with hands that are sometimes very dirty. This is a vile practice that should be reached by some form of legislation.

Portland Considering Commission Plan: Portland, Oregon, has established a charter commission to consider a new form of government for that city. One of its members has been sent to Spokane to investigate the workings of the commission plan which many Portland people strongly favor.

Night Collection of Garbage: After several months of experiment with the collection of garbage and waste by night, Street Commissioner Edwards of New York city declares that it is a success and it will be continued and extended. The chief objection the practice has met with was on the score of noise.

Fire Alarm Boxes: After a long and thorough test of the Gamewell system against that of the Star Electric Company made by the fire authorities of New York city, a contract for 150 new stations was awarded to the latter company. A large number of officials were present at the test and the vote was unanimous.

Municipal Subways: The new administration in Chicago has declared in favor of the city's constructing and operating an entire system of subways for passenger business, in accordance with the general plan outlined in the Bion J. Arnold report.

Housing Code: Columbus, Ohio, has adopted a new housing code which is said to be the most complete and thoroughly up-to-date law that has yet been developed in any American city.

Grade Crossings: Pawtucket, Rhode Island, has a report on what it will cost to get rid of grade crossings in that city. The sum fixed is $1,200,000, which will be divided between the city and the railways.

Automobile Street Cars: A company has been organized in Indianapolis to run a line of automobiles through some of the principal streets in competition with the street cars. A fare of five cents will be charged.

California Fifty Years Ago

Monday, June 23, 1861.

The greatest lumps of pure gold ever found in California were taken out by Messrs. Brown, Beach and Perets, on Scott's bar (Scott's river) within a few weeks past, the value of one is $3140. Our informant, who has examined the specimen, pronounces it by far the most beautiful he has ever seen; there is not a particle of quartz mixed with the gold, and the entire lump is free from spot or blemish.

The New Postage Law—This law goes into effect on the 1st of July, and as our readers may not all be posted upon the new rates established by the government, we subjoin them.—On all prepaid letters to and from the Atlantic States, postage six cents. On unpaid letters, twelve cents. On prepaid letters to any part of California or Oregon, three cents are charged, and on unpaid letters, six cents.

(Editorial). Great Conflagration in San Francisco.—We have never been called upon to perform a more melancholy duty, than to announce another destructive conflagration of this ill-fated city—a conflagration made doubly severe from the rapidity with which it has followed upon the heels of the dreadful fire that occurred on the third day of May last.

Adams & Co. have sent us specimens of the new postoffice three-cent pieces.

Recorder's Court.—Yesterday there was but one case before his Hon. An hombre was brought up charged with larceny, but as no evidence appeared, he was discharged from custody.

Thursday, June 26, 1861.

The mercury in the shade on yesterday reached the highest figure of any day this season, standing at 2 p. m. at 103 degrees.

Robbery.—The sum of $1,000 was stolen night before last by some rascal, who, however, was soon after compelled to disgorge his ill-gotten treasure, which the rightful owner again received. The man was permitted to depart, and the police have not as yet succeeded in arresting him.

Messrs. Camp & Co., expressmen, are authorized to act as agents for the "Union." Persons in the mines wishing to have the paper sent to their friends on the Atlantic side, can have them regularly mailed from this office.

Special care should be taken in reading our special notices. The lovers of good things can there see what will suit them best. Today Roman Punch can be had at the "Fountain of Roses," opposite the Crescent City Hotel, and Clam Chowder at the Auction Saloon, on Front street.

Hymenial.—We regretted an indisposition yesterday morning which prevented our attending the wedding of Mr. J. Neely Johnson, Esq., and Miss Mary Zabriskie. We are informed by persons present that there was quite a large company to witness the interesting ceremony, and that nothing could have exceeded the felicity with which the Rev. Mr. Benton tied the silken knot, or the fine appearance and complacent demeanor of the company present.

(Editorial). The Death of Mrs. Birdsall—Under most all circumstances, death is a most unwelcome visitor, working all its movements with the severest indications of human misery and distress; but especially is its course one of embittered and unutterable affliction when it visits a little circle that is just being warmed by the most pungent affections and purest expressions of the love of parents and children—when it takes its victims from scenes in which hearts long separated are commingling together the holiest and sweetest sentiments that can spring from the fountains of human sympathy. Thus has it been with death in the household of our esteemed townsman, Dr. Birdsall.

NIAGARA

The Sierra Club has endorsed the following circular issued by the American Civic Association, Washington, D. C.:

To the Real Owners of Niagara Falls

Your property is in danger. You must act quickly if you would save for yourselves and the nation one of the most magnificent pieces of scenery in the world—Niagara Falls—which draws each year more than a million visitors—a great army of travelers who spend twenty-five millions of dollars there and on the way. This vast income will increase if the Falls remain as a great spectacle. Would it be good business to destroy the source of such an income?

Here Is the Danger

The Falls have "unquestionably been seriously injured by the diversions already made" by the Power Companies, to run their giant turbines. This is the formal report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, after two years of accurate measurements and records. And he reports that "additional diversions, now under way, will add to the damage." The American Fall is very thin in places. The Bridal Veil is less in volume. Hundreds of feet on the Horseshoe Fall are barely covered. Portions of the Rapids are much less impressive.

The Power Companies, seeing an opportunity to increase their income more than five million of dollars annually, are fighting the reenactment of the Burton Bill, which expires June 29, 1911. They want now the maximum limit of water allowed under our Waterways Treaty with Canada. This would mean an increased drain on the Falls of sixty-eight per cent beyond the amount of water now taken by these corporations. They also want the limit removed on the transmission of power from Canada.

It is to your interest to have Mr. Burton's Senate Joint Resolution 3 passed without amendment, thereby preventing the passage of measures that would benefit only a few private corporations at the expense and the shame of the whole American people.

The Burton Bill, passed in 1906 and extended in 1909, was more than fair to the Power Companies. It gave them all the water they could then use or were preparing to use. It did not stop any going enterprise. The Burton Resolution will continue permanently these fair just and protective provisions of the original Burton Bill.

Will you help to save this great National asset from the aggressions of forty millions of power-company capital? Write or wire your Senators or Representatives in Congress. Do it today. Write for further facts to the American Civic Association, which first called President Roosevelt's attention to the National ownership of Niagara. Send us copies of the replies you get. We are fighting for your rights and we need your assistance. Protect your own interests by using a dozen postage stamps. Tell your friends.

ARIZONA'S CONSTITUTION

We suppose that not even Senator Bailey would insist upon putting Oregon out of the Union because she has amended her constitution to provide initiative, referendum and recall. Other States have adopted some of these democratic features.

In still others, movements are afoot to secure them by constitutional amendment. If Arizona came to Congress with a copy of the constitution of Rhode Island, say, and immediately after admission as a State substituted, by due amendment, the constitution that her people want, nobody would pretend that Congress or any other State had the slightest right to interfere.

Opposition to the admission of Arizona with the constitution that her people have deliberately adopted is mere soreheadedness. A technical situation arises, which gives reaction an opportunity of expressing its grouch against the democratic advance. Reaction seizes the opportunity. That the people of a State may elect their judges in any way and for any term that pleases them, no one thinks of denying. In some States the judiciary is selected by one or two sets of party managers; and, though the results of that system are often not admirable, no one suggests that it is any affair of the Federal Government. Neither should any one suggest that Congress has the right to prevent Arizona from adopting a method that every State in the Union is admittedly free to adopt. To say that a method of judicial election is not "republican" within the meaning of the phrase in the Federal Constitution, when the same method of electing a Governor or any other State officer would be "republican," is manifestly absurd.

Perhaps reaction is all the more anxious to take a kick at initiative, referendum and recall in the Arizona constitution because reaction has an irritating suspicion of its helplessness to prevent their advance elsewhere.—Saturday Evening Post.

Real Estate Mortgages

THE safest form of investment is a real estate mortgage on improved business or residence property in cities, provided it be selected with care and judgment. Such loans pay interest at the rate of six, seven or eight per cent, varying somewhat according to the amount loaned.

I make a specialty of securing such loans for my clients. My experience in building and knowledge of real estate values assure reliable appraisements and safe investments. I attend to drawing all papers, securing certificates of title, insurance policies and the collection of interest without expense to the investor, the borrower paying all charges.

I have on hand at my office good safe mortgages ranging from $500 to $5000 paying 7% net, secured by improved Los Angeles city property worth more than twice the amount of the loan. Call at my office or write me and I will send you a list.

Political Table Talk

fact St. Louis has kept right on growing ever since.

Unionism in St. Louis In St. Louis only the building trades are thoroughly unionized and yet there have been few labor disturbances since the great street car strike of years ago. The conservatism of the city has made it conservative in this also. It has built up a great manufacturing business, not by trying to force labor down in wages, but by forcing unfit labor out and making it to the interests of the fittest to stay in St. Louis. The employers deal with their men individually or collectively as they prefer, the shops are open or closed according to circumstances, and not in accordance with a fixed rule, and the labor leaders often advise the discontented to quit their jobs where they are not satisfied and hunt jobs that suit them better, a matter of no difficulty if they are competent men, for the manufacturers of St. Louis are behind with their orders. In short neither the employers nor the employed in St. Louis are hunting trouble. They are hunting business, and one of the best fields open to them is the Pacific Coast from Los Angeles to Seattle, especially in the shoe traffic and in electrical machinery.

More About Missouri The Watchman started to tell about the Missouri situation and former Governor Folk but got switched off. The Missourians like Folk and four years ago promised him that he should have the next delegation from Missouri in the national Democratic convention. It was a rash promise and Democratic politicians are looking for a way to crawl out of it. They want to give the delegation next year to Champ Clark, whom they look upon as being strictly a live wire, and yet, curiously enough, they neither want nor expect that Champ Clark shall get the nomination. They want Champ Clark to have the cards all in his hands so that he can give the nomination to Woodrow Wilson in the belief that Wilson can beat Taft and sweep the country. This will make Champ Clark a power in national politics and Missouri a strategic state in party affairs. They seem to be a long-headed lot in old Missouri and as likely to "show" as to be shown how to turn a trick.

How It Is In Illinois What a splendid State is Illinois! Not all alike, to be sure, but all good if not equally good. The Watchman chanced to have for a seat mate an assessor. Asked about land values his reply was, "Out of sight. They scared me and I sold my farm and concluded to try water instead of land, that is I sold my fine farm and got enough down on it to enable me to buy a poor one with a hole in it that I could throw a dam across and fill with spring water, a swimming pool in summer, a skating resort in winter and a fish pond always, ten acres of it, and every acre of water will produce as much in fish alone as two acres of land. No, there ain't no way in the world, that we here know anything about, that can enable the farmer to do more than make a living and keep up his interest on $150-or-$200-an-acre farm land. He can't hope to pay out on it unless it goes still higher so that he can sell part and clear the rest and so save something out of the deal, but if land should go down, gee! that would ruin everybody who has paid more than the land was worth. Those are the ones who are afraid of reciprocity and that's why. They are mighty uneasy. Then there are the renters. They look at it differently. We are now just about half renters and half land owners. Up to ten years ago a renter could reasonably hope to own by and by. He can't now. He used to give the owner of the land one-third of the crop, now he has to give two-fifths; next jolt it will be a half, and then the renter will be up against it sure enough. If reciprocity or anything else can stop this going up of the price of land we ought to have it. The land owners are getting richer and everybody else is getting poor. I know. I see the people in their homes and know just how they feel about it. It ain't doing the land owners no good either. They are getting to be so doggoned rich that they don't want to ride a plow any more nor do their sons or their women folks want to work. They want to skite around in their automobiles and discuss the servant problem with their likes. It ain't healthy, it ain't healthy, but here's my station. I must get off here. Good bye."

Is Lorimer Guilty? "Of course he is guilty! You will have a hard time in Illinois trying to find a sane man who thinks he is not. If he did not handle the stuff himself he knew what was doing and was willing to profit by it. I don't know what that business is going to result in at Washington, another whitewash most likely, too many other Senators in the same kind of a boat, Stephenson of Wisconsin for instance. The people are feeling a good deal worked up over political affairs, but, Lord, what can they do? Their legislatures all fall down on them. We could carry the initiative, the referendum and recall (don't know about the recall of the judiciary, that seems to be going some) five to one, but we can't get a legislature that will let us vote on them. The big interests won't let them. The party that stood for that wouldn't get any campaign fund next year and the politicians of both sides are fixing for the fight of their lives in 1912, although the people don't seem to care shucks which gets it. Never saw them manifest so little interest. The hands of the Democrats ain't no cleaner than those of the Republicans so we shall go into the fight with honors fairly even. That baby yells so I think I'll go into the smoker. This is mighty hard weather on babies traveling. They ought to be home in their shirt tails crawling on the grass under the trees in their own dooryards. That is the place to be when it is hot like this. Good bye. Glad to have met you."

Just a Touch of Real Life "May I sit with you so that I can lay my baby out on this seat? She is so tired and sort of uneasy I'll be glad enough if she sleeps 'till we get to Chicago, and my arm is tired holding her, too."

"Why certainly, come right along. Sorry I had not looked back to see how you were getting along." She was a slip of a girl, seemingly, and yet had two children. When she got settled by the side of The Watchman and was resting her tired, perspiration-bathed face languidly against the plush of the back of the car seat, The Watchman ventured to observe that she looked rather young to be the mother of two children as old as those.

"Yes, I suppose so," was the reply. "We were married before we were either of us twenty-one, but he complained of being so lonesome without me that I up and married him to stop his yawp, and there are the consequences; one is seven and the other is four. She is a cute one, that four-year-old. I never let her touch the telephone, but the other day she watched her chance and took down the receiver just as I came to the door. I thought I would see what she would do, and it was about like this: 'I hain't got any number. I want my daddy. I hain't got any nickel, mamma won't give me any even to buy candy. Why, mamma talks to daddy in here most every day and sometimes I hear him talk back, too. I think you are real mean.'

"Well, it made me feel mean, too, not to be able to let her have a nickel to buy candy or talk to daddy, but I only get money a driblet at a time and have to account for every cent of it. I think it is such a mistake for people to marry so young. My husband is a good man, too, has no bad habits that I know of, but he pinches me to help his old mother that don't really need it, and we ought to be saving up something. It scares me when I think that these babies of ours will soon be young ladies, and will need to be educated and to have nice clothes or be led into temptation to get them, but I declare we can't seem to save a cent. Rent costs $30 in a stuffy little flat away out three-quarters of an hour from my husband's work, but, bless the Lord, there is a little back yard for the children to play in. And then I was dreadfully sick when the last baby came and have hardly gotten over it yet and we have to have the doctor sometimes for the babies. What with the lodge dues and the insurance, and maybe a little vacation trip once a year to the cheapest place we can find—it does the children so much good and I get so low spirited if there is never a break of the monotony from year's end to year's end. And so it goes. You see my husband only gets $100 per month, and it cost us $37 just for coal last winter, and I don't have a bit more fire than I have got to to cook our food and keep the children from freezing. Oh, I think it is such a mistake to marry young. If I had it to do over again I wouldn't marry at all, I just would NOT."

"Then you wouldn't have had these pretty little girls to comfort you," The Watchman ventured.

"Well, of course that is so, and I don't know what I should ever do without them, the blessed little dears. I don't see how that could have been arranged, don't you know, but if only one could have them and not all the rest, or a little more money or something! It seems to me sometimes that if employers really and truly felt what a little more pay would mean to their help they would perhaps pay more if they had to get on with fewer automobiles and grand things themselves. But I must get the children ready to get off. We have been down to see my aunt for a few days. She sent us the money to come on. Oh! those fields and the woods were so green and clean. I do wish we could live on a farm but my husband is a telegraph operator and has a crippled hand, had tuberculosis in it, and heaven only knows when it may come back on him and he'll have to have it taken off. And then, oh! God, I don't know! I'll go crazy if I think of it. I was brought up on a farm, a little one, and when we sold it, heavens! there were nine of us, and what did it amount to? a little furniture for a flat, that's all, for our share. Well, we get off here. It will save us something. Thank you ever so much. Won't you shake hands with the gentleman, Pet? Hope you will have a pleasant journey. Good bye."

The Watchman wonders if such benevolent gentlemen as Judge Gary, J. Pierpont Morgan and their associates have such persons in mind when they fix salary lists and wage scales. What a little more money, or a little lower cost of living would mean to so many! For answer read the editorial in another column entitled, "What Is a Man Worth?" It tends to throw light on the subject. It is

The Truth in Politics

U. S. Senator, John D. Works, Says:—

"The California Outlook is destined to do a great work for California in correcting political evils and educating the people up to better things in the performance of their duties as American citizens. We need the Truth in politics as well as in religion, and this publication is giving us what we need. It should have the help and encouragement of all good citizens of all political parties financially and in every other way."

Nothing Doing

The popular lethargy regarding next year's politics is almost unbelievable, if one may judge from the lack of interest manifested by one's fellow travelers. They nearly always begin by saying, "Nothing doing in our section. Seldom hear a word said. Of course there are some politicians around fixing things up or trying to, but I don't hear the farmers or mechanics or storekeepers saying anything about next year's campaign any more than I do about next year's crops. The weather interests them more. Everybody is talking about that. Oh! I reckon the politicians will get things fixed up so that we shan't have much to say about it. Taft? Oh, he's a pretty good fellow. We've had heap worse men than him in that office first and last. Yes, Wilson is a mighty popular man. I hear quite a little said about him. People are kind of wondering if he is to be the coming man. Sort a looks that way. He might give Taft a pretty good run of it, but Lord, the country is Republican safe enough. We don't have to worry none about that. When votin' time comes the Republicans will turn out and vote the Republican ticket just as they have done heretofore and that will settle it. Meantime I wouldn't be surprised if you heard very little said one way or 'tother." The foregoing would seem to be a fair exposition of the prevailing attitude, a superficial unconcern with a deeper seated conviction that things are likely to go on about as they have been going.

Harmon In Ohio

This from a friend and admirer of Harmon, but more affiliated with labor than with capital: "No, I am afraid that Harmon may not be able to command a solid Ohio delegation. Wilson has a good many friends in Ohio and he is likely to take some of them into the national convention. Sorry, but I don't see how it can be helped. Yes, I know that a good many people think that Harmon is with the interests, but for one I don't think so. He ain't neither a progressive nor a reactionary, as I look at it, but he is fair. I have always found him judicial minded and fair. He is a good deal another such man as Taft in that respect, will work with anybody and everybody to gain his purpose, and I have found his declared purposes about fair. No, I call Harmon just a fair man, a man who will hold things level and then let them slide. Safe and sane and fair, he would make a good deal another such President as Taft, only he would probably take program better and pay more attention to his machine.

FORCE OF GOOD EXAMPLE

We can't afford to waste any time on such a fool proposition as this universal arbitration business, said Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg a few weeks ago to the Reichstag, or words to that effect. The scheme was too utopian, too hopelessly impracticable to deserve serious attention.

John Bull and Uncle Sam went on planning and figuring, quite undisturbed by the kaiser's skeptical minister. Then France became interested and wanted to look the proposition over. Japan, too, thought it worth attention. Finally, it came to the ears of Uncle Samuel in some roundabout way, apparently, that the kaiser would like an invitation to the arbitration pow wow. He got one, and now, through the German ambassador at Washington, has accepted it. Such is the force of good example.—New York Globe and Advertiser.

Men and Matters Before the Public

Appellate Court which liberated Glass, one of the defendants in the San Francisco graft cases, who had been convicted of bribery. More recently, the whole state was worked up over the slip-shod manner in which the Supreme Court granted Ruef a rehearing in the only bribery conviction that stands against him.

In the Ruef case, on the ground that Justice Henshaw was out of the state when the order for a re-hearing was finally signed by a bare majority of the court, Henshaw being one of the signers, the court reversed itself. Ruef did not get his re-hearing. He is in state prison, fairly itching, it is said, to tell all he knows of the corrupt practices of the corporations for whom he acted as political agent.

And now comes the Shay letter to add, however unjustly, to the unfortunate feeling of distrust of the highest tribunal of the State. The Bar Association can do much to allay this feeling by an investigation which none should welcome more promptly than the members of the court themselves.

But such an investigation, to do any good, must be free from any suspicion of "white wash." At the first hint of the "whitewash brush" any good that might result from the investigation would vanish.

For the members of the Court to arrogantly assume that the criticism of the Court comes only from the discontented and the ignorant does not strengthen the Court, for such assumption is unfortunately not in accordance with the facts.

The decision, for example, which freed Schmitz and Ruef in the extortion cases, and the arguments in support of that decision, turn largely on the legal rule of judicial notice. Perhaps there is no living authority better prepared to discuss this rule than Dean John H. Wigmore of the Northwestern University.

Dean Wigmore is the author of Wigmore on Evidence, generally regarded as the greatest work on evidence ever written. Wigmore's opinion of the decision in the Schmitz-Ruef case is accordingly worth while, and commands attention. Dean Wigmore severely criticises the decision.

In an article on the Schmitz-Ruef decision Wigmore says:

"The truth is that the learned Chief Justice (of California) in endeavoring to support his decision, weaves a logical web, and then entangles himself in it.

"Such disputations were the life of scholarship and of the law six hundred years ago. They are out of place today. There are enough rules of law to sustain them, if the court wants to do so. And there are enough rules of law to brush them away, if the court wants to do that.

"All the rules in the world will not get us substantial justice if the judges have not the correct living moral attitude toward substantial justice."

Substantial justice is all that law-abiding Californians want, but it is the very thing that public service corporations engaged in defending plunder, and public service corporations' presidents and directors caught handing bribe money, do not want.

Californians, however, have a way of getting what they want—and in the regular course of business.

Eventually, we shall have substantial justice in California, and those of us who have faith in our institutions look to see substantial justice come through the Supreme Court itself. Individual justices do not make the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court is a desirable institution. If it becomes temporarily undesirable, or even a menace, because of the misconduct or attitude of this justice or that, it is a very simple matter—or should be—to restore the usefulness of the court by removal of the undesirable or dangerous element.

This brings us to the proposed recall of the judiciary. The attitude of many conservative gentlemen on this question, reminds one of the swearing captain and the minister.

In a sudden storm, the Captain whipped his men into the rigging with a string of profanity which set his minister passenger agog with horror.

"My dear Captain," expostulated the minister, "do not use such language."

The next order was prefaced with "please," and uttered in the politest tone at the Captain's command.

The crew stopped where they were, petrified with astonishment.

A few sails went overboard, and a wave washed the desk. The minister saw the effect of his admonition, and with chattering teeth suggested, "I fear, Captain, it would be just as well to swear a little."

If in the pursuit of substantial justice, it shall became necessary for The People of California to "criticise a little," individual members of the Supreme Court, that criticism will not be held back and should not be.

Dean Wigmore, in concluding his criticism of the defense of the decision in the Schmitz-Ruef case, touched upon this very point. "The moral is," he said, "that our profession (of the law) must be educated out of such vicious habits of thought. One way to do this is to let the newer ideas be dinned into their professional consciousness by public criticism and private conversation. The Schmitz-Ruef case will at least have been an ill-wind blowing good to somebody if it helps to achieve this result."

A PLAIN BUSINESS TALK

MR. PROGRESSIVE BUSINESS MAN:

Up to now we have been building circulation so that when we asked you for an ad it would be on a business basis. The time has come when we can assure you of MORE PUBLICITY, DOLLAR FOR DOLLAR, than any weekly of general circulation published in California.

The California Outlook is the only paper in its class that has a large circulation both around the Bay of San Francisce and in Los Angeles County, besides going into practically every city and town in the State. Of thirty-two periodicals printed in the same office the California Outlook has the largest circulation. In fact it has the largest circulation of any weekly in California save one. It has NOT ALONE QUANTITY BUT QUALITY OF SUBSCRIBERS, for the bulk of them are militant, aggressive Progressives.

The California Outlook is the organ of The Progressive movement in California. It has the support of all the leaders in that organization. Out of a multitude it is the only weekly periodical in the State that stands squarely and fearlessly for popular rights as against corporate aggression. It would be to the interest of the business man to help support this paper even if it were not a "strictly business" proposition.

Up to the present time in GAINING CIRCULATION WE HAVE BEEN LOSING MONEY. The subscription price, one dollar per year, is about half the usual amount for papers in its class, and barely pays for the actual cost of paper and printing. In short, the time has come when we need your help, and by advertising in The California Outlook you will be helping yourself.
